other House of Parliament had been directed to the subject, and Bills had been introduced professedly to meet the grievances which were alleged to have been sustained; but in fact going far beyond the injuries which they purported to remedy. Two Bills had been introduced by the same hon. Member of the House of Commons, the last of which had been referred to a Select Committee, comprising some of the most eminent Members of the House, by whom that Bill was carefully and dispassionately considered. While he (the Earl of Derby) said on the one hand that their Lordships ought not to be altogether guided and overruled by the decision of a Committee of the House of Commons, especially when that decision had not been submitted to the confirmation of the House itself, yet on the other, he did not think it would be acting with courtesy towards the House of Commons and the eminent Members of its Committee if their Lordships were hastily to refuse a second reading to a Bill founded upon their recommendations. It was true the noble and learned Lord had introduced a material alteration which he (the Earl of Derby) did not regard as an Amendment; but, on the contrary, as very objectionable; yet he thought it desirable by postponing this discussion to a future opportunity, when they would have the opinions of the Select Committee before them, to be enabled to consider in all its points the evils they had to meet, and the state of the existing law; and he would not exclude from consideration the altered circumstances of the country at the present time, as compared with the time when these schools were founded. It appeared from the statement of the noble and learned Lord that up to a comparatively recent period the Court of Chancery had been in the habit of framing schemes in which it inserted something analogous to what was called in the present Bill the "conscience clause," and he instanced a case where Vice-Chancellor Knight Bruce framed a scheme for the management of a school in which it was provided that it should be conducted on the principles of the Church of England, that the service should be performed according to the doctrines of the Church of England, that the masters who were to give instruction should all be members of the communion of the Church of England, and that those children whose parents did not object should be brought up according to the principles of the Church of England; but that the children of those parents being Dissenters who did object to have their children so educated were yet to be admitted to the benefit of the charity. That high authority was subsequently confirmed by another high authority (Lord St. Leonards), who laid down a similar scheme. It subsequently appeared however, that, contrary to what had been the practice for many years, it was not competent for the Court of Chancery to insert in any scheme a provision analogous to what had been called—not very happily—the “conscience clause” of the Bill, and therefore it was now sought to modify the law so that, under certain restrictions, the children of Dissenters might be admitted to the benefits of education in endowed schools without being compelled to adopt the formularies or adhere to the services of the Church of England. He need not remind their Lordships that such a concession had at no distant period been granted in the more important cases of the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge, where Dissenters were admitted to the advantages without being subjected to the obligation of attending Divine service according to the forms of the Church of England. But the question put by the right rev. Prelate (the Bishop of London) was of great moment. It was important to know whether the national schools, professedly Church of England schools, were to be affected by this Bill. These schools had many of them small endowments, though the greater part of their support was derived from voluntary contributions. He apprehended that the Bill was not intended to apply to those schools, but to those endowed schools only which were not upon the face of the foundation deed shown to be Church of England schools, and into which schools the children of Dissenters might be admitted consistently with the wishes of the founders. For his own part he regretted the unfortunate interpretation of the law which had prevented the Court of Chancery from acting in accordance with its practice in former times. Now that only question is raised, he must be allowed to express his doubt whether the Court of Chancery was the best tribunal for deciding cases of this kind; because he was struck by the argument of his noble and learned Friend (Lord Chelmsford) that there was nothing whatever by which the discretion of the Lord Chancellor would be guided and limited. If the Lord Chancellor for the time being thought that such and such things should be done in the cases which came before him, it would be done, or vice versa; and, as had been pointed out, an appeal from him to a higher court was, in the present state of our tribunals, something of a mockery. The whole of the questions which would arise under this Bill would be decided according to the bias of the mind of the Lord Chancellor for the time being, and it would depend entirely upon him whether in one school Dissenters should be admitted, and whether in another they should be entirely excluded. With reference to the “conscience clause,” he wished to point out that it went much beyond the rule down by the Vice-Chancellor Knight Bruce. The Vice-Chancellor laid down, as he understood, that children belonging to the Church should be instructed in the doctrines of the Church, and that as far as they were concerned, the will of the founder should in all respects be complied with, but that upon application from Dissenters their children should be admitted to the educational benefits of the school, without being compelled to receive instruction in the Liturgy and Catechism. In the clause, however, there was no such exception. The Lord Chancellor might order that no boy whose parents conscientiously objected to his learning the doctrines of the Church should be forced to do so, whether the parents were members of the Church or Dissenters. The clause, therefore, went far beyond the object proposed by the noble and learned Lord—namely, the relief of Dissenters only. Then, again, considerable expense would be entailed upon the small endowments of these schools if any person were authorized to apply to the Court of Chancery—an expense which, in some cases, might absorb the whole fund available for educational purposes. For this reason he should have preferred a direct enactment, mitigating the stringency of the present law, and adapting it, if it was thought right so to do, to the altered state of things at the present day, rather than a Bill authorising the Court of Chancery to lay down these regulations. If, however, their Lordships thought that application should be made to the Court of Chancery, it would, in his opinion be better that, instead of empowering the Court to draw up rules and regulations which would be absolutely binding upon the trustees, the trustees should by an order of the Court be enabled, if they thought fit, to exempt any children in the school from attendance during the teaching of Church doctrines. Such a discretion should be vested not in the Court but in the trustees, who were necessarily acquainted with the circumstances of the locality, not permitting them, however, to deviate in the slightest degree from the obligation to carry on the school according to the principles of the Church. The other provision of this Bill was one of considerable importance, and would require serious attention. He did not wish now to discuss the clause by which all persons, whether Dissenters or not, were declared eligible as trustees unless it was otherwise expressed in the will of the founder, or the more limited proposal supported by the authority of a Committee of the other House. But the greater the discretion vested in these trustees as to the superintendence and management of the schools the more care must be taken with regard to the appointment of Dissenters, so that schools intended for the benefit and education of members of the Church should not fall into the hands of persons who did not belong to the Church. For his own part he should be anxious that their Lordships should not hastily dismiss a Bill introduced upon such high authority, and which dealt with an admitted grievance. While acknowledging, however, that this grievance might demand legislation in the direction, though not to the extent, proposed by the noble and learned Lord, he hoped ample time would be afforded for considering the measure in detail. Whatever might be his objections to the Bill in its present shape, he could not join in any vote against the second reading; but he hoped that the right rev. Bench especially would examine the clauses before the Bill went into Committee. In such a case as this he trusted sincerely that Parliament would be willing and anxious to consult the feelings and wishes of all classes of the community in such a manner as, while securing these endowments to their original purposes, would remedy any practical grievance of which, under the new interpretation of the law, the Dissenters might reasonably complain.

EARL GRANVILLE said, he was glad to find that their Lordships seemed willing to pass the second reading of a Bill which was intended to remedy an acknowledged evil. He was sure that his noble and learned Friend's object was to have every point of the measure most carefully and fully considered; and when it had been read a second time it might even be a proper subject for inquiry by a

Select Committee. From the tone of the discussion, however, he was rejoiced to find that the Bill was not looked upon as affording an occasion for party or religious strife, but had been received in a spirit of conciliation and would be fairly dealt with on all sides. As to the alterations suggested, he concurred very much in what had been stated respecting the reference to the Court of Chancery. On this point, remembering the fairness displayed by Sir Knight Bruce and Lord St. Leonards towards Dissenters in regard to these schools, he thought it was not quite fair in noble Lords opposite to cast a slur by anticipation upon any Dissenter who might hereafter rise, by his ability, to a high judicial position, and to suppose that in such a case the Church would be unfairly treated. But should questions affecting these trusts be left entirely to the discretion of the Court of Chancery? For his part he thought provision should be made in the Bill for any exceptions which Parliament might contemplate—that the Bill also should clearly define the schools to be subjected to its operation—and should lay down some broad and general principles which should apply to all cases, instead of trusting to subsequent judge-made law, or the caprice of trustees. He could not conceive any more fertile cause of religious enmity springing up in all parts of the country, than that it should be left to the trustees to decide whether or not they should make the necessary provisions by which the children of Dissenters should be admitted into the schools. By taking these precautions, moreover, the schools would be saved the great expense of applying through the Attorney General or otherwise to the Court of Chancery. With respect to the seventh clause, he thought much was to be said on both sides. The noble and learned Lord had made out a strong case in favour of his own clause and against the clause proposed by the Committee of the House of Commons. Having made these observations he should conclude by expressing his satisfaction that the House intended to give a second reading to the Bill.

THE BISHOP OF OXFORD said, that if it were distinctly understood, that in not resisting the second reading of the Bill, no further principle was conceded than the principle as limited by the noble Earl (the Earl of Derby), that was to say, that this House was committed to relieve an acknowledged grievance by legislation which should not trench upon the due rights of the Church schools, then he, for one, should rather wish to see the Bill read a second time; because he had been always anxious to manifest, as far as possible, towards his Nonconformist brethren the greatest amount of kindness and charity consistent with maintaining his own principles. He felt that so strongly that he had uniformly encouraged the clergy in his diocese to admit even to their parochial schools the children of Dissenters upon very much the same terms as those contained in the "conscience clause." But there was a wide difference between the managers of schools in their discretion allowing this latitude, and the Legislature interfering with Church schools and the establishing the admission of Dissenting children as a right. He did not feel himself prepared to admit, in the case of a great number of national schools with a bona fide endowment, that it would be a fair use of that principle to say that in such schools there should be a legal right given to Dissenters to enter them. In parishes where much ill-feeling prevailed, an attempt to establish a barren principle of that sort would involve the national schools with small endowments in litigation and expense; and parish after parish, which now worked in amity and peace upon this principle, would be given up to ill-will and ill-blood. If, then, their Lordships so understood it that they did not commit themselves to any principle beyond that, he should be glad if the Bill were read a second time. Not that he believed that in the "conscience clause," or still more in the alteration made in the Bill in the House of Commons, there was not involved a very different principle, to which he could not give his assent—he meant the principle of bona fide changing a vast number of what were in truth intended to be, and what had been found to be, and administered as, Church schools, into Church schools no longer. He hoped that he did not form any uncharitable view of the matter; because he found that one Dissenter from the Established Church, whom he had always respected greatly for the plainness and openness with which he conducted his opposition to what he thought a great evil—namely, an Established Church—shared that opinion entirely with him. Mr. Miall, speaking at a meeting of the Society for the Liberation of Religion, as it was called—that was, a society the professed purpose of which was to put down the Established Church as an establishment, and to separate altogether the Church from the State, used these words:—"The Judges have decided this matter according to the principles on which only they could decide it, whilst an Established Church is maintained." And he then went on to say, "We, Dissenters from the Church, are making a deadly thrust on the principle of an Established Church in what we are endeavouring to gain as to these endowed schools." Now surely he could not be thought unnaturally jealous as to the effect of this legislation, when those who said that they united to destroy the Established Church declared that they were aiming a deadly thrust at the principle of an established Church in the legislation which they proposed. If it were to be admitted in any way that the education of this great people through the multitude of Church of England schools which the piety of the Church of England had established for teaching to children the truth as it was held by the Church of England; if the principle was that those schools were by any chicanery or fraud to be taken out of the hands of the Church of England, and confided to other hands, then such a Bill ought not to be read a second time. But if it were limited, as it had been limited that night, to the redress of an admitted grievance, by plans which should violate no principle, he for one would be sorry to oppose the second reading. What had fallen from the noble Earl near him (Earl Granville) was well worthy of consideration, namely, whether the best way of arranging this matter would not be to refer it to a Select Committee. It was essentially a matter of detail; and in discussing details in the whole House, there was always the chance of some incautious word stirring up unkindly feelings somewhere; whereas, if the matter were discussed in a Select Committee, it was highly probable that clauses might be arranged which should preserve what was felt necessary to be preserved, and remove an admitted grievance. Such a Committee would not have to take evidence, but merely to arrange the terms of the Bill. Nothing could be lost by such an arrangement, and a great deal might be gained. He trusted, therefore, that the noble and learned Lord would adopt the suggestion of the noble Earl, and refer the Bill to a Select Committee.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR trusted that before deciding to refer the Bill to a Select Committee, the noble and learned Lord would take time to consider and watch the progress of the other Bill before the House of Commons.

THE EARL OF DONOUGHMORE inquired why the noble and learned Lord had excluded Ireland from the operations of the Bill?

LORD CRANWORTH: Because the Bill of the House of Commons had excluded it. The state of education in Ireland, and the constitution of schools there, were so different from what they were in this country, that he thought it would not be advisable to include Ireland in the measure. With regard to what the right rev. Prelate had said respecting national schools, if he understood the constitution of these schools—although they might be endowed with a house for the master or mistress—they were not substantially endowed schools, and certainly it was not his intention to apply the Bill to schools such as they.

On Question, Resolved in the Affirmative: Bill read 2^a accordingly: and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Friday, the 17th instant.

AGRICULTURAL STATISTICS (IRELAND). OBSERVATIONS.

THE EARL OF LEITRIM called the attention of the House to the state of agriculture in Ireland, as exhibited by the statistical returns recently laid upon the table. He said that no statistical returns were attempted to be made for England and Scotland; but if agriculture in those countries had fallen off as it had in Ireland, the matter was one of a most serious nature. The returns in Ireland were collected by the police, and many persons objected very much to the manner in which they were collected. He said nothing as to their correctness, but such as they were, they could not be regarded as waste paper. The noble Lord read a number of returns, showing that since 1847 there had been a serious diminution in the cereal and green crops in Ireland; and contended that, although the cultivation of potatoes, flax, and grass had increased, and there was more stock in the country, the facts disclosed by these returns showed that agriculture was in a far less prosperous state than it had been represented to be by the Lord-Lieutenant and the Chief Secretary for Ireland.

THE EARL OF DONOUGHMORE explained that the decrease in the green and cereal produce of Ireland arose from the fact that some of the farmers had found it more profitable to turn their attention to the rearing of stock. He thought the inference could not be drawn that land was less cultivated. He was himself a considerable landowner, and he had travelled much about the country; and he was able to say that when land was to be let there were plenty of tenants offering fair rents. He regretted to see a considerable increase in the cultivation of potatoes, for he had hoped that one beneficial result of the famine would have been a cessation of the dependence formerly placed in that precarious vegetable.

TROOPS FOR CHINA.

RETURN MOVED FOR.

MR. SEYMOUR FITZGERALD moved an Address for a Return of the Military Forces of all Arms under orders to proceed, or on their way from this Country, Her Majesty's East Indian Territories, or the Colonies, to China, and similar Return as to the Naval Forces.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL asked, whether the sanction of the Government to the production of these Returns had been asked and received?

MR. SEYMOUR FITZGERALD said, that the Secretary to the Admiralty had agreed to his portion of the Returns moved for, and he understood from the Secretary to the Treasury that there was no objection to the rest of it.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: I must say I think it is entirely without precedent that such a Return should be moved for without the Secretary of State for War being asked whether he had any objection.

MR. SEYMOUR FITZGERALD said, he was quite willing to defer the Returns as to the military forces, so that the Secretary of State for War might be consulted, if it were desired. The Return of the naval forces had been assented to, as he had before stated, by the Secretary to the Admiralty.

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT said, he had no objection to the hon. Member having the information he desired ; but it was obviously inexpedient to make a public Return of the strength of a hostile expedition. The hon. Gentleman had seen the General Order giving the number of regiments proceeding to China, and he must say he thought it would be very inconvenient to publish the Return asked for.

Motion negatived.

FIRE-WORK MANUFACTORIES.

QUESTION.

MR. JOHN LOCKE said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been drawn to the explosion of a Fire-work Manufactory which took place last month in Regent Street, Lambeth Walk, resulting in the death of three persons ; and, if so, whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to adopt any measures for the removal of such buildings out of crowded neighbourhoods ?

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, that a memorial upon the subject of the explosion to which his hon. and learned Friend referred had been received at the Home Office, and had been referred to the Chief Commissioner of Police for his report, which had not yet been received. With respect to the general question, he would take that opportunity of stating that his attention had been called during the recess to the frequency of accidents arising from the manufacture of gunpowder and of different other explosive substances, and the defective state of the law upon that subject. He had at present under consideration a Bill for the consolidation and amendment of the law relating to the manufacture of those substances, and he hoped before long to be able to bring that measure under the notice of the House.

DEMANDS OF THE ALLIES UPON CHINA.

QUESTION.

MR. SEYMOUR FITZGERALD said, he wished to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether any Convention had been entered into between Her Majesty's Government and the Government of the Emperor of the French with reference to the demands to be made by both Governments on that of China, and with the view of settling the bases of the combined operations of the French and English Forces in that country, and especially with reference to a permanent occupation by either Power of any portion of the Chinese Territory ; and, if any such Convention has been made, whether Her Majesty's Government have any objection to lay it on the table of the House ?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL was understood to say that there was an ordinary private Convention which was on the point of being signed, but there was no such general Convention as the hon. Member had indicated.

THE SHIP "ACCRINGTON."

QUESTION.

MR. ALDERMAN SALOMONS said, he would beg to ask Whether Her Majesty's Government has received any information relative to the sickness and mortality on board the ship Accrington, which left Liverpool for India on the 30th of last September, with the wives and families of soldiers ; and also as to the reported acts of cruelty and violence committed on board that ship, resulting, as it is alleged, in the murder of the captain and chief officer ?

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, that some information had been received upon that subject from Her Majesty's consul at Pernambuco, but not all the particulars that were to be desired. It was evidently a most lamentable case. The facts were simply these. When the vessel conveying the families of soldiers to India had arrived at Pernambuco, it was found that a very large mortality had taken place among the children. It was also ascertained that the captain, who was accused by all parties of having been guilty of great tyranny and oppression towards the emigrants, was dead, as well as his chief officer ; and there was reason to suspect that these men had been poisoned by the cook or by some other person on board. With respect to the mortality among the children, a full and rigid inquiry must be instituted, and as regarded the deaths of the captain and mate the consul had already set on foot a full inquiry into that subject, as their case involved a charge of murder. He would add one word with regard to this lamentable occurrence on behalf of the Emigration Commissioners. He had to remind the House that the vessel was not one of the ordinary emigration vessels in charge of the Emigration Commissioners. It was a vessel chartered to carry the families of soldiers to India, that duty having been undertaken by the Emigration Commissioners at the request of the War Department. In all other cases the Commissioners exercised a discretion as to the selection of the emigrants on board, and they strictly limited the number of children to be conveyed in any particular vessel. But in the present instance they were bound to take the emigrants as they found them, and out of sixty-seven deaths which it was found had occurred when the vessel reached Pernambuco, sixty were those of children under four years of age. He mentioned these facts for the purpose of showing that there was no prima facie appearance of neglect in that case on the part of the Commissioners.

TASMANIA—THE LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL. QUESTION.

COLONEL SYKES said, he rose to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies if any and what proceedings have taken place consequent upon the transmission of a Petition to the Queen, signed by more than 5,000 inhabitants of Hobart Town, Tasmania, complaining of an Act passed in great haste by a minority of the Legislative Council, affecting the Constitutional privileges of the Electors.

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, that the facts with respect to that Tasmanian Act were as follows:—An Act had been passed to amend the constitution of the Legislative Council of Tasmania; and among other provisions, but not the most important of the whole number, was one which for the future would exclude all the Judges of the Supreme Court from seats in the Legislative Council. The immediate effect of that provision was to exclude from the Council a gentleman of great distinction and influence in the colony, Mr. Justice Horne, lately Member for Hobart Town. That exclusion had been very much objected to by the constituents of the learned gentleman, and the petition presented that evening by the right hon. Baronet the Member for Droitwich (Sir J. Pakington), and very numerous signed, proceeded solely from those constituents. The provisions of the Act had nothing in them objectionable, and they probably formed an improvement on the pre-existing law. With respect to the mode in which the law was passed, he had to state that it was passed legally when a quorum of the Legislative Council was sitting; and although passed in a way which we should consider in this country as rather sharp practice, yet the Government thought it was not a case in which Her Majesty should be advised to interpose her veto, and especially inasmuch as if there were anything substantially unfair in the way in which the law was passed, the constituencies of Tasmania had in their own hands a remedy in the powers which a free constitution gave them.

THE IRISH POOR-LAW COMMISSIONERS. —CASE OF THE REV. PETER DALY.

QUESTION.

MR. GREGORY asked the Attorney General for Ireland, Whether the late proceedings in the Court of Queen's Bench, Ireland, on the part of the Poor Law Commissioners, against the Rev. Peter Daly, were instituted under the direction of the Law Officers of the Crown; and, if not, under whose direction; and, also, from what funds the costs given against the Poor Law Commissioners will be defrayed?

COLONEL FORDE said, he also desired to ask the Attorney General for Ireland to answer a similar question as regards the Poor Law Commissioners and the Board of Guardians of the Newtownards Union, as that put to him by the hon. Member for Galway.

MR. O'BRIEN said, he would take that opportunity of putting the Question of which he had given notice. He would ask the Attorney General for Ireland, Whether the proceedings by the Poor Law Commissioners against the Guardians of the Clonmel Union were taken under the advice of the Irish Law Officers, and also from what fund the costs awarded against the Commissioners would be defrayed?

MR. J. D. FITZGERALD said, that he had to give substantially the same answer to all the three Questions. The late proceedings in the Court of Queen's Bench, Ireland, on the part of the Poor Law Commissioners against the Rev. Peter Daly, which were intended to oust that gentleman from the chaplaincy of the union, were not instituted under the direction of himself or of his learned Colleague the Solicitor General, nor of the present or of the late Law Officers of the Crown. He presumed that the Commissioners acted on the advice of the standing counsel, an eminent barrister, and that the costs would be paid out of the annual sum of £300 voted in the Estimates for the legal expenses of the Commissioners.

HIGHLEIGH PREBENDAL SCHOOL.

MR. FREELAND said, that he rose with feelings of pain and regret to submit to the consideration of the House the Motion which stood on the notice paper in his name. His object, he said, was to obtain, through the interposition of the authority of the House, and in connection with an important and public educational trust, a statement of facts which he could arrive at through no other channel, or at all events only at the expense of a considerable and altogether indefinite outlay. The Home Secretary had consented to the Motion. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Kilmarnock had given him in writing the grounds of his opposition to it. He was, therefore, obliged to trouble the House with a statement, which should be as short as he could make it, consistently with a due regard to the object which he had in view. The school in question had, he thought, strong claims on public sympathy. The learned Selden had been educated in it. Collins, one of the greatest if not the greatest of our lyric poets, had received in it a portion at least of his education. It was founded by Bishop Storey in 1497, for the gratuitous instruction of scholars from all parts of the diocese. He founded it, he said, Propter ignorantiam sacerdotum et proborum raritatem ministrorum Diocessus Cicestrensis. The diocese, however, no longer deserved the reproach of the truthful and outspoken Prelate. The chief points to be borne in mind were that the school was founded for purposes of gratuitous instruction; that the number of free scholars was not at first limited; that it was limited in 1828 by a statute of Bishop Carr to ten, whom the Dean and Chapter were to nominate. That the burden of teaching was thrown on the prebendary of the prebend of Highleigh for the time being, who as such was master of the school. By the statutes no payments were to be made either by the pupils or their parents. If the master took any presents he was to be twice admonished, then fined £10. If after a third admonition he offended, he was to be deprived of his canonry and prebend. The present master had been master between twenty and thirty years. During that period only three boys had been presented for gratuitous education, as he had ascertained from the chapter clerk, whom the Dean and Chapter had instructed to supply him with the information which he required. He wanted to know what had been the receipts of the prebendary during this period. He wanted to know what the tithe-rent charges, fines and quit-rents were. All this, in the case of a public educational trust, the public had a right to know. The Charity Commissioners had attempted to deal with this school between 1853 and 1859, though without result; but this shewed that they considered it a public educational trust. In 1854 the House had ordered a somewhat similar return; but the rev. Gentleman answered that it did not come within his power or that of any other person now living to make it. It was, however, within the power of the rev. Gentleman to make the return for which he now asked, and he therefore begged to move for—

“Returns from the Rev. Thomas Brown, Prebendary of Highleigh, in Chichester, as such, and as Master of the Prebendal School in that city; of date of his appointment; amount of tithe commutation rent-charges in Sidlesham, Ferring, and elsewhere; of annual value of prebendal residence; amount of fines since appointment; of rents or other emoluments.”

Of the number of Boys presented to the School by the Dean and Chapter since the said Prebendary's appointment. Of the number of Scholars on the Foundation who have received a gratuitous Education in each year; of the highest number at any one time; and of the usual numbers on an average. And, of the names of any Scholars on the Foundation at present.

COMMERCIAL TREATIES WITH FRANCE. QUESTION.

MR. LIDDELL asked the President of the Board of Trade whether any Commercial Treaty or Treaties (other than that recently ratified) are in force between this country and France; and, if so, whether there is any objection to lay copies of the same on the Table, with the dates at which they were entered into?

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, he had to state in reply to the hon. Gentleman that there was a treaty, or rather a convention, in force between England and France relating to commerce and navigation, and bearing the date of January, 1826. It related almost exclusively to the direct trade, and under its provisions each nation agreed to place the ships of the other on the same footing as national vessels. But there could be no necessity for placing that treaty upon the table of the House, as it was already published in Hertslet's Collected Treaties, a copy of which would be found in the library of the House. He might add that there was also a French decree of the year 1854, consequent upon the repeal of the English navigation laws, which made certain relaxations in favour of our vessels engaged in the indirect trade.

NEWSPAPERS TO AUSTRALIA. QUESTION.

LORD ALFRED CHURCHILL asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether the Government have re-considered their plan for levying upon Newspapers to Australia an extra penny to meet the cost of transit through Egypt, and, if so, what course they propose to adopt; and whether, in any contemplated alteration, it would take effect previous to the departure of the Australian Mail on the 12th instant?

MR. LAING said, he had had an opportunity of communicating upon that subject with gentlemen connected with the Australian colonies, and he had reason to believe that the inhabitants of those colonies would prefer paying their share of the extra charge for the transmission of newspapers through Egypt rather than that charge should be met by levying an additional penny upon the postage of those newspapers. Under these circumstances, the imposition of the additional penny had been withdrawn, and would not be again enforced if the Australian colonies would consent to defray their portion of the cost of transit.

ARMS OF THE TROOPS IN THE CHINESE EXPEDITION.—QUESTION.

MR. O'BRIEN asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether it is correct that the Troops forming the Expedition to be sent from India to China are to be armed with the smooth bore instead of the rifled musket?

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT said, that all the troops despatched from this country to China would be armed with the Enfield rifle, and all the battalions of European troops which went from India would be similarly armed. But, as he understood the General Order published in India to which the hon. Gentleman no doubt referred, the case was as follows. The Native Indian troops, almost without exception, had not hitherto been armed with the rifle. They were furnished with a weapon of a smaller and lighter construction and having a smooth bore, and the intention of the Indian Government was, no doubt, to arm all the Native troops with the same description of weapon.

VOLUNTEER RIFLE CORPS. QUESTION.

MR. HOPWOOD said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for War if he will explain the reason for the long delay in issuing Commissions to Officers in the Volunteer Rifle Corps.

LORD HOTHAM said, he had that morning received a letter stating that a considerable impediment was thrown in the way of the enrolment of Volunteers by the delay in issuing commissions to officers.

MAJOR SIBTHORP said, he would take that opportunity of asking the Secretary of State for War whether officers who had been elected by Volunteer corps, and approved of by the Lords-Lieutenant of counties, but who had not received their commissions from the War Office, would be allowed to attend Her Majesty's levee on the 7th of March.

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT said, he would answer the last Question first. Her Majesty had arranged that she would receive at the Levee to be held on the 7th of March all those officers who had been recommended to Lords-Lieutenant and approved by Lords-Lieutenant, and whose names upon transmission had been approved by the Queen, without waiting for the commissions to be published in the Gazette. With respect to the other Question, as to the tardiness of issuing commissions to officers, he regretted that there should be any such complaint; but it must be recollected that before the services of a company could be accepted and before the officers could be nominated, the Government required certain preliminaries to be observed. There must be the requisite number of volunteers to form a company. There must also be a practising ground selected and approved by a competent officer, and a storehouse with a person to take care of it, approved by the Lord Lieutenant. It was not always possible to get all these things done off-hand. The correspondence, too, on the subject of Volunteers was not direct, but had to pass through a third channel. Some allowance must also be made for the enormous increase of business which the volunteer movement had cast on the War Office. When he first went into office there were about 20 papers a week on this subject on which it was necessary to give a decision, while the number of papers received last week was 620—the number disposed of 621, and the number of letters written 467. There had never been such an enormous amount of business undertaken for the first time and conducted with so little complaint as this connected with the Volunteer Department, which he had intrusted to Lord De Grey, and he was very glad to have this opportunity of stating the opinion he had formed of the tact, punctuality and courtesy with which the noble Lord had conducted this portion of the business of the War Office.

STEAM-BOAT ACCOMMODATION AT HOLYHEAD.—QUESTION.

LORD JOHN BROWNE said, he rose to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland what provision is being made at Holyhead for the accommodation of the large Steamers which will commence running to and from Kingstown in June next; and whether it is true, as reported, that the recent extension of the old Pier has been found quite useless for that purpose, in consequence of its being too much exposed.

MR. CARDWELL replied, that as to the extension of the old pier so far from its being useless the boats now regularly ran to it. It was true, that it was exposed to points NNE., but during the whole of the late tempestuous season the railway-boat had only been prevented using it three times. The noble Lord, the Secretary of the Admiralty, had under his consideration at the present moment what new alterations were necessary.

POST-OFFICE ARRANGEMENTS.—EDINBURGH.—QUESTION.

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON said, he rose to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether it is intended to proceed with the new General Post Office in Edinburgh, for which land has been purchased and plans decided on; or whether there is any intention of departing from the recommendations of a Committee of this House, which sat in 1854, in favour of keeping up separate Post Office Establishments in Edinburgh and Dublin?

MR. LAING stated that the Post Office had recently had very heavy demands made upon it for the erection of new buildings in several of the principal towns of the country. Steps had been taken to ascertain whether in some cases an extension of the existing buildings would not suffice; and that had been found to be the case in Manchester and Liverpool. The Post Office authorities had been led to believe that by a small alteration of the establishment at Edinburgh it might be possible to continue the Post Office in the present building. It was true a site had been actually purchased from the town council at a cost of £60,000; therefore its abandonment would involve the necessity of applying to Parliament for an Act for the purpose. But he thought the House would not object to such a measure if it could be shown to be otherwise desirable, and to have the effect of saving £50,000 or £60,000. The inquiry was in progress, and in due course the parties interested in Edinburgh would be called upon to state their case. There had certainly never been any intention of departing from the recommendation of the Committee of 1854, that separate Post Office establishments should be kept up at Edinburgh as well as Dublin. The only suggestion was to withdraw one branch, the accountant's, from Edinburgh; but upon that point no decision would be come to without giving the parties interested a full opportunity of stating their views.

MR. GLADSTONE AND THE BUDGET. QUESTION.

LORD HENRY LENNOX said, he would beg to inquire of the noble Lord at the head of Her Majesty's Government whether the right hon. the Chancellor of the Exchequer is sufficiently recovered from his recent illness to enable him to proceed with his financial statement to-morrow, and, if not, whether the Government will lay on the Table the Treaty of Commerce with France?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: I saw my right hon. Friend a very short time ago, and I cannot undertake positively to say that he will be well enough to go through his statement to-morrow evening. I expect to receive a communication from his medical attendant in the course of the evening which will enable me to speak with more certainty. If he should not have recovered his strength of voice sufficiently to enable him to go through that which must necessarily be a long statement, I am persuaded the House will indulgently give him until Monday; for it would be unsatisfactory to the House as well as to him, if, not having entirely recovered his strength, he were to find himself, in the middle of a long statement, unable to go on. My noble Friend the Secretary for Foreign Affairs will, at all events, to-morrow lay on the Table the recent Convention with France.

PREVENTION OF BRIBERY. LEAVE.

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, that in asking permission of the House to introduce a Bill for the prevention of bribery, it was not his intention to enter into any lengthened discussion on the subject. Since he had placed his notice on the paper, the question had been brought before them by the hon. Member for Marylebone (Mr. Edwin James); and the hon. Member for Nottingham (Mr. Mellor) had also given notice of a Motion on the subject; besides which, the noble Lord the First Minister of the Crown had intimated that the subject was under the consideration of the Government, and that it was not unlikely that a Government measure would be introduced. In addition to all this, the noble Lord the Member for London had informed the House that it was his intention, on the 20th inst., to introduce his long promised and long expected, if not much-desired, measure of Parliamentary Reform. Under those circumstances, he (Sir FitzRoy Kelly) felt that his duty was limited to a short and concise statement of the objects of his Bill; he should then ask leave to lay it upon the table. He would at once say that it was not his intention to move the second reading of his Bill until after the Reform Bill of the noble Lord had been considered, and until they knew what measure, if any, the Government had it in contemplation to propose for the repression of bribery; but he could hardly believe it possible, after the recent disclosures at Wakefield and Gloucester, that this Session would be allowed to pass away without some measure on this subject being brought forward under the direct sanction of Her Majesty's Government. After that, he should, if necessary, proceed to bring this Bill before the House. He might say at once that it differed to some extent, but not greatly, from the provisions originally introduced in the Corrupt Practices Bill of 1854. His first object was to compel the candidate to pay all monies to be expended for election purposes, and under his own control, through the hands of a public officer, and thus to render it certain that unless that public officer should himself be a party to bribery, it would be impossible for bribery to occur. His second object was to make the offence of bribery disgraceful—one which no man could commit and afterwards hold up his head in society, and such as no gentleman, or any one aspiring to be a Member of that House, could contemplate without fear and shame. His third and last, but not least difficult object, would be to provide, if possible, some legislative means to render it probable, if not certain, that when bribery had been committed it should be followed by prosecution and punishment. With respect to the first of these objects, it might be secured if the money first found its way into the hands of the election auditor, for then he thought it might fairly be said that bribery would be almost impossible. It was true that no man, however much he might disclaim any resort to corrupt influences, could in all cases prevent money being improperly spent; but inasmuch as an oath or declaration equivalent to an oath must be made under this Bill by the candidate, that he would pay no money for election purposes except through a specified public officer, it became impossible without perjury that money should be passed, as it was now from the candidate through various channels to persons by whom it is at last applied to corrupt purposes. He could not conceive that any gentleman really desiring that such money should be applied legitimately, would hesitate to make this declaration. The evidence recently laid before the House proved that the money expended in elections was often paid by the candidates into the hands of parties unknown in the locality, who went down from London, and appeared in the town under assumed names. By them the money was paid to others, through whom at length it reached the hands of the electors; and thus the system of corruption was carried out. Now, if the candidates, and all to whose hands the money should come, were made liable to all the penalties of perjury, unless it were paid to the election auditors, it was impossible to suppose but that they would apply it accordingly, and the bribery would thus be prevented. A series of clauses was inserted in this Bill, enacting that every candidate should make a declaration, with all the solemnity of an oath, that he had not paid, and never would pay, directly or indirectly, any money for election purposes except to the election officer. But it had been said that effectually to prevent bribery it was necessary to turn against it the current of public opinion, and to make it a disgraceful offence of which any man would be ashamed. How could this be more effectually done, then, by rendering it impossible for the candidate to be a party to bribery without at the same time being guilty of perjury? Bribery, he was afraid, might have been treated with indifference or lenity; but no one has any sympathy with perjury, and if this Bill should become law, and a candidate were to violate the oath to be taken, public condemnation would be directed against him, and he would be disgraced in the eyes of society. The Bill, in addition to the penalties of perjury, provided that any candidate violating this solemn declaration, and paying or sanctioning any application of money, except through the election auditor, in addition to all other penalties should be incapable of sitting in that House, or of holding office under the Crown, or any municipal office in the kingdom. Other provisions of the Bill would facilitate the prosecution and punishment of offenders; but there was also a proviso in the Bill calculated to meet the numerous applications of money to corrupt purposes which were made without the sanction of the candidate, but where the money passed from or through some relative or friend, or the member of some political club, to prevent money being so devoted to any but lawful purposes, there was a clause which made it a misdemeanour in any one whomsoever to pay or apply any money for the purposes of an election except through the auditor. At present it often happened that when bribery is to be resorted to some one unknown to the candidate advances the necessary funds; and after the return, and when the time for petitioning is past, the Member is told that an advance has been made on his behalf, which it would be well for him to discharge, and many Gentlemen felt bound in honour to pay such advances. But if the candidate made oath that he never would pay any money except through the election auditor, he would at once be furnished with a decisive answer, and the result would be that these zealous friends would not advance their money, and the bribery would not be committed. He thought the adoption of these clauses would have a great effect in deterring persons from resorting to corrupt practices at elections. He might be told that it would be possible to evade the provision of the Bill which he had just sketched out by means of false accounts rendered by the agents, and indeed it could not be denied that such evasions had occurred under the existing law. He had therefore endeavoured to provide against the recurrence of such a state of things by giving power to the election auditors to scrutinize every item of expense, and to disallow all that should appear illegal or colourable. The next question to be considered related to the election auditors themselves.

The Corrupt Practices Act of 1854 had the effect of telling candidates that they ought to pay money through the election auditor, but no adequate penalty was imposed for any breach of the provision. A proviso similar to the one he now sought to introduce had been endeavoured to be inserted in that Act, and was supported by the leading Members on both sides of the House, but was defeated by a narrow majority; so that while the payment of money, except through the auditor, was forbidden, no punishment was annexed. He sought to provide that those persons who now acted as revising barristers should be the election auditors. He was aware that great difference of opinion existed on the question, which that was not the time for entering upon, but he hoped it would be considered in Committee upon that or some similar bill; but certainly the officers who were selected to perform the duties of election auditors should be persons whose character, ability, and experience would entitle them to general respect. He thought the election auditors ought to have the power of making a minute and specific investigation into the items composing the accounts; it would be the duty of these officers to make these inquiries; and then he thought it would be impossible that money passing through their hands should be improperly applied. The only remaining point was, perhaps, the most difficult; and that was, the means of ensuring the prosecution and punishment of offenders against the law. At present, though bribery may have been extensive and notorious, many causes conduce to prevent prosecution. He would particularly instance the case of elections where bribery had been committed on both sides, and where persons on either side were afraid to prosecute those whom they knew to be guilty, owing to fear of retaliation. It was not likely that private individuals would undertake the work of prosecution. What he proposed by this Bill was that the election auditor, whom he would assume to be a barrister, or some one acquainted with judicial proceedings, should within a certain time after the election, if he thought fit, institute an investigation—supposing that he had reason to think that bribery or corrupt practices had been resorted to—and that he should have the power to hold a court to which he might summon the candidates, their committees, friends, and partizans—in short, any witnesses whose evidence he might deem likely to be of importminated. This state of the law operated as a great discouragement to petitions. He believed that those best acquainted with the subject were convinced that in the immense majority of cases in which bribery was committed no petitions were presented against them; and it was well known that although every general election was followed by a great number of petitions, the number in which they were effectively followed up was small. He attributed that state of things to the defective state of the law in this respect. It was that which he believed gave the greatest encouragement to bribery. The plan he would suggest—a plan which was not then for the first time submitted to the House, but which had never been fully considered—would enable them to give the honest candidate a mode by which he might enter Parliament as the Member for even a corrupt borough, without having participated in any corruption. He was aware that that was not the time for proposing any such measure; but unless he saw it taken up by a more competent Member he should feel it his duty, upon a future occasion, to state more fully the principles upon which he believed that any measure to be effective in putting down bribery should be based.

MR. EDWIN JAMES felt that, in order to have some well-digested scheme of legislation on this important subject, it would be extremely desirable that the various measures which had been or might be laid on the table, should undergo some scrutiny and investigation before a Committee. Some parts of this Bill were perfectly impracticable; and he trusted would be reviewed by his hon. and learned Friend before the second reading. One objection he ventured to urge was this,—it took for its basis the Corrupt Practices at Elections Act, and sought to amend the system as respects the appointment of the election auditor. Immediately after 1854, when this machinery first came into force, it proved to be an entire failure. It had no operation at all, because, there being no time fixed upon when accounts were to be furnished, and the auditor was to make his report, it often happened that election petitions came on for trial without any report being made by the election auditor. It did appear to him to be a great mistake to make election auditors of revising barristers. The revising barrister of a district was to be the election auditor of the borough. A candidate could not move without a revising barrister at his elbow; and inasmuch as frequently several elections in the same district were held simultaneously, his hon. and learned Friend would almost require to make his revising barristers ubiquitous. A revising barrister would have several boroughs in his district, and there must necessarily be a much larger number of revising barristers appointed. Then—what appeared to him a most extraordinary proposition—these revising barristers were to be constituted into a Court of Inquisition, with power to summon persons before them, and if they did not appear, these young gentlemen might issue their warrant to run to all parts of the country—England, Scotland, and Ireland, and he supposed to commit them if they refused to answer any question put to them. This would be an apotheosis for those young gentlemen who were to act as grand inquisitors in order to ascertain whether an offence had been committed against any of the provisions of this Bill. His hon. and learned Friend could hardly be serious in sanctioning a system of machinery of this kind. It would be absolutely necessary, if these points were not corrected before the second reading, that the Bill should be referred to a Select Committee.

MR. CROSS thought the House ought to provide some protection for the candidate to prevent him being entrapped into bribery by the acts of his agents, for all of which he was now responsible. He believed that there would be much less bribery both in towns and counties, if paid canvassers, messengers, and other paid agents could be got rid of. The only plan was to allow Members to incur certain limited expenses for these purposes. Boroughs, for example, were at present divided into certain polling districts by the municipal authorities; candidates might be allowed to engage a Committee-room and a certain staff in each polling district, proportioned to the number of electors or the area of the district. So many messengers and paid agents might be permitted, and the employment of any greater number should be strictly prohibited. He believed that if the House adopted such a provision, and if they declared that all paid agents thus employed should be restricted from voting, they would do more to prevent bribery than had ever yet been done.

MR. DENMAN remarked that it was perhaps premature to discuss the provisions of this Bill; but he thought there was a view of the matter which it was highly important the House should take, and that was this, that though there had been a great deal of useless legislation there had also been some useful legislation on this subject. He thought the House was deeply indebted to the hon. and learned Gentleman for bringing in this Bill, and also to all the other Gentlemen who had prepared independent measures on the same subject. He did not see that any harm was done by bringing forward separate measures for the prevention of bribery, nor could he see any good reason for abstaining from legislation on the subject from time to time in order to await the time when they could consider the subject as a whole and pass a complete measure. His hon. and learned Friend the Member for Marylebone (Mr. E. James) was of opinion that all Bills connected with this subject should be submitted to a Select Committee, and considered together. He (Mr. Denman) thought that an inexpedient mode of proceeding, as tending to unnecessary delay, and not promising so great a security for the punishment and prevention of all the various phases of this detestable offence, as would be given by assisting the independent efforts of individual Members, each endeavouring to meet one or more of those phases, by several remedies. He believed that every Bill on the subject laid upon the table of the House had some good in it and that the several provisions of those Bills were not inconsistent with each other. Let the House strike rapidly and in earnest at the offence of bribery wherever they could find it, and then eventually it would be put down. With that view he hoped the House would allow this Bill to be brought in, and give their best assistance to carry through all the provisions in it which were most efficient.

MR. MALINS said, that he, for one, would give his cordial assent to any measure calculated to put down bribery at elections. He would, however, make one suggestion in regard to the inconvenience arising from employing paid messengers and clerks. As soon as the poorer class of voters could be brought to believe that the possession of the franchise was not to be made a pecuniary advantage to them, directly or indirectly, this system of bribery would be abolished, and the moral condition of the people would be improved. That desirable state of things was, however, hopeless of attainment, unless professional men were determined to refuse fees from candidates for their services. Those gentlemen would shrink from horror at being charged with bribery; nevertheless, by accepting of professional fees from the candidates, and then giving them their votes and services at the elections, they were really committing that offence against which they exclaimed so loudly. If a man in a humble station of life took a sum of money for his vote, it was called a bribe; and however much professional men might attempt to disguise that fact from themselves, if they received retainers, as they called them, for their services at elections, those payments could not be viewed otherwise than as remuneration for the exercise of their own franchise, and for exercising their influence in behalf of the party who fed them. Those gentlemen might call this money retainers, but he called it bribery. He took that opportunity of making these observations, because he was proud of the profession to which he belonged, and of the respectable body of men with whom he associated. He was anxious that they should look the truth in the face, and that they should not allow themselves to be deceived any longer. The habit was such an inveterate one with those gentlemen, that it would not allow them to see the truth. Those fees at elections were nothing more nor less than an indirect mode of taking a bribe. They had before them the Report of the Gloucester Election Commission. Though he objected at the time to the appointment of that Commission, he was bound now to admit that the Report they had presented was a most able document. It unravelled the system of bribery, and placed in such a glaring light the practice of professional men being employed at elections, and taking retainers to give their services and use their influence for particular candidates, that the fact could not be misunderstood. He mentioned this practice for the benefit of the profession, and he did hope that those gentlemen would from that moment perfectly understand it was the opinion of the House that such conduct was deserving of censure; and that, if they wished to exercise their franchise, they should do so as free-born Englishmen, and should set an example to the voters, by showing that they would not make the possession of the franchise the means of bringing them any pecuniary advantage. He trusted it would be provided in the Bill, that if a voter should be employed at elections, he was from that circumstance to be deprived of the power of exercising his vote.

MR. CLAY said, that the difficulty of the subject might be measured by the variety of the suggestions offered. He attached great value to a solemn and most positive declaration by the candidate of his non-participation in any corrupt practices. Many Members obtained seats, who, at the declaration of the poll, sincerely believed they were elected by the unanimous feeling of their constituents, but whose election cost them thousands, where they believed it would be covered by hundreds. After the election, however, the Member was told by his agents that such and such expenses had been incurred in his behalf, and that he was bound in honour to pay them. Now, he would exact from every candidate a declaration, when he came to the table, that neither before nor after the election, and neither directly nor indirectly would he pay, or become responsible, for any expenses that were not legal expenses, or that had not been brought before the election auditor. If this were done, the business of the election auditor, which was now a farce, would become a useful reality. He might be told that the honourable man would have no chance under such a system, and that the dishonourable man would make the declaration. He did not believe that any hon. Member would take such a declaration, and then break it. If he did, he would commit an infamous offence, for which a man would be blackballed at his club, and excluded from the society of gentlemen. By means of such a declaration alone would bribery, in his opinion, be put down.

FINANCES OF INDIA.

COMMITTEE MOVED FOR.

MR. VANSITTART rose, pursuant to notice, to move the appointment of a Select Committee to inquire into the following questions connected with the Finances of India :—

"1. Whether, having due regard to all vested rights, it is practicable to introduce a new Civil Service upon a cheaper footing.

"2. Whether it is not desirable to abolish the Legislative Council at Calcutta, and the Supreme Councils of Bengal, Madras, and Bombay, and substitute for them a Legislative Council for each Presidency.

"3. Whether it is not advisable to amalgamate the Supreme and Sudder Courts.

"4. Whether, with reference to the fact of India forming a portion of the British Empire, it is not expedient to put a stop to the existing system of raising loans at the present high rates of interest."

The hon. Member assured the House that he was fully impressed with the gravity of the step he was taking ; but such was the importance which the state of our Indian finances had assumed, that he thought it very desirable that the House should come to some decided expression of opinion on the subject. He ought to mention that he placed the Resolutions to which he invited attention on the Notice Paper towards the end of last Session, and at a time when the greatest apprehension prevailed in the public mind, among the mercantile community, in the circles of private society, and in the press. At that period were heard such alarming expressions as these :—"We must give up India, or we must restore the greater portion of our possessions to the Native Princes, or we must give back the government of the country to its former rulers—the late East India Company." And deprecating then, as he did now, such timid counsels, he was anxious to press forward this discussion, but the lateness of the Session and the thinness of the House induced him to withdraw his Motion. He did not regret having done so, as it had enabled him to submit his Resolutions in a modified shape, and had given time for much feverish excitement and unnecessary panic to subside. The House would observe that the Resolutions had reference entirely to the civil administration and the financial condition of India, and that he had studiously avoided all allusion to military and other questions. He believed that now that the mutiny had been effectually crushed, and that Her Majesty's benevolent sway was recognized from one end of India to the other, it was our bounden duty to face our financial difficulties boldly and manfully, and introduce such economical reforms and salutary regulations as were imperatively called for in reference to the altered circumstances of the case. The first Resolution referred to the Civil Service. He had already, in the course of the discussions which had taken place in that House, declared his opinion that it would be very unjust to meddle with the salaries of the present incumbents ; but, at the same time, he thought that an inquiry as to the practicability of introducing a new Civil Service upon a cheaper footing might be attended with good results. It would throw impartial light upon the subject, disclose the real facts of the case, and give the civilian a more settled position in future by setting at rest those sweeping accusations which had of late years been urged against that distinguished service. That any great reduction of expenditure under that head would be proposed by the Committee which he sought to have appointed was very problematical, for the impolicy of underpaying our officials in that trying climate was pretty generally acknowledged, and such a measure would produce great discontent, discontent would produce listlessness, and listlessness would produce indifference. Any considerable reduction of salaries would sweep away the entire surplus available for accumulating a small competency to enable the civilian to revisit his native country. That would, indeed, be a poor compensation for the sacrifices entailed by a man passing the best years of his life in a remote district, cut off from the charms of civilized society. So keenly was this already felt, that he ventured to say that if any great reduction of salaries were made there would not be found fifty men in the Civil Service who, if they could recommence life with their present experience, would not deliberately prefer a clerkship in any of our Government offices in London to the life of comparative ease in India. Already candidates for the medical service were not to be obtained, and the number of competitors for the Civil Service decreased every year, although it was far easier to procure a nomination to compete for that service than one to compete for a clerkship in the Government offices in London, or for a tide waitership in the provincial towns. The Committee, however, would have the advantage of referring to several important documents and ably written minutes, which had been compiled by a high authority in India, who was deputed to inquire into the subject by the late East India Company. With regard to the second Resolution, the abolition of the Legislative Council of Calcutta as at present constructed and of the Supreme Councils would be hailed with great satisfaction. These Councils had signally failed to produce any practical advantage, and since the creation of the Legislative Council of Calcutta in 1853, no one exactly knew what were the peculiar duties of the members of the Supreme Council beyond drawing very high salaries. The Committee would, therefore, inquire into the expediency of abolishing these Councils, and whether the Lieutenant-Governors of Bengal, Madras, and Bombay might not be advantageously assisted with a separate Legislative Council, to be composed one-half of officials residing at the Presidency towns, and the other half of non-officials. He had not included the Government of the North-West and the Punjab in this arrangement, because the European community was very small in those provinces. It could not be doubted that some such reorganization and infusion of fresh intelligence was greatly needed. The whole of the evidence taken before the Colonization Committee proved that fact, and, with the permission of the House, he would read some brief extracts from the evidence of two or three witnesses. He would begin by quoting Mr. Waller, because that gentleman was a solicitor of the Supreme Court, and afterwards an advocate at the bar of the Sudder Dewanny and Nizamut Adawlut at Calcutta. These Courts were supposed to be rather jealous of each other. The Judges of the Supreme Court were appointed by the Crown from eminent barristers in this country, and the Judges of the Sudder from the covenanted civilians; and, as Mr. Waller did not appear to have got much out of either of the courts, his evidence was probably the more reliable and candid. Mr. Waller said:—

“The Supreme and other local Councils are wholly useless and enormously expensive, and the chief secretaries and the heads of departments may well supply their places. That the present Legislative Council of Calcutta possesses neither the confidence of the Europeans nor of the natives. That there ought to be a certain number of ex officio members receiving no other salary than that of their respective substantive appointments, and there should be as many non-official as official members, composed equally of Englishmen and native Christians, and of Natives who are not Christians. That the Government of each Presidency should have the power of putting a veto to, or suspending the operation of, any law passed by the Council, pending a reference to the Home Government. That the official members ought merely to receive the pay of their substantive appointments, the non-official members to receive nothing, and that it should be left to the Governors of the Presidencies to determine the selection of these non-officials and Natives for appointments in the Legislative Council.”

He advocates strongly—

“The creation of a Legislative Council for each Presidency, and that each Presidency should enact its own laws. Such a measure would give the Legislature a larger amount of experience and information than it has at present, would eventuate a great benefit to the country, and would do away with that political antagonism between the governors and the governed which exists at present; but we can hardly do so so long as we have but one Legislative Council, for how are we to introduce people resident at Madras into the Legislative Council located at Calcutta?”

The Rev. Mr. Mullens, of the Calcutta Missionary Conference, gave some valuable evidence, and, speaking of the Legislative Council, he says :—

"We have no good tribunal before which we can really bring forward the various evils which we consider to exist in the country. The present Legislative Council is by no means so open as we should like; all the members are officials, appointed by the Government, and they are so far irresponsible, except to the Government itself; and it is very hard to get a case fully taken up in the Legislative Council, and discussed on every side. In Ceylon the planters have a Council in which they have the highest confidence, and in which some of their own merchants are engaged. The Ceylon Council is composed partly from officials and partly from different sections of the country,—one or two planters, one or two merchants, and one or two natives, so that all classes are represented. A Council like that in Calcutta would be a great help to having these questions thoroughly discussed."

Mr. M'Nair, an indigo planter, complained in his evidence that—

"The European community in India have no mercantile or agricultural representative in the Legislative Council; that it is entirely composed of Government servants, and nearly every law brought forward by them is to strengthen the hands of Government, or to impose some new restriction upon the already over-restricted European settlers;" and he thinks "it would be advantageous if the Governor-General were instructed to select six non-official members from the mercantile and agricultural community, and that this plan is adopted in Ceylon and Hong Kong, and has worked well for the prosperity of those countries."

Again, several important meetings had been held at Calcutta and Bombay, at which the lamentable ignorance displayed by the Legislative Council in regard to financial matters was denounced. How, indeed, could public confidence be placed in men who could frame a measure in which especial care was taken to exempt themselves from taxation which they wished to extend to all other classes but themselves? So clumsily contrived, too, were the provisions of the measure, that while it fell with peculiar severity on petty traders struggling to gain a miserable pittance, and whose net profits amounted to only sixty-six rupees, or £6 12s. per annum, the opulent Muharjuns and Bunnyahs—the money-lenders, bill-brokers, and bill-discounters of India, whose usurious practices exceed all belief, even surpassing those of their brother craftsmen in this country—were allowed, comparatively speaking, to escape scot-free. If the second question, therefore, were to be carried in the affirmative, a very considerable saving of expense would be effected. We should obtain that happy mixture in the Legislative Councils by which the over-zeal of one party would be judiciously checked by the other, and we should gradually pave the way for enabling the Natives to take a more active part in the government of the country, while, at the same time, they should be held responsible for the income and the expenditure, without coming to England for assistance; for, depend upon it, India could be made to pay her own expenses, and, were the French or Russians masters of the country, they would quickly devise the means of effecting that desirable object. The same argument applied in a great measure to the next Resolution, because the majority of the witnesses before the Colonization Committee advocated the expediency of amalgamating the Supreme and Sudder Courts. Now that India had become a part of Her Majesty's dominions, what could be the object of maintaining two separate appellate tribunals at the Presidency towns? All that the Europeans objected to was, to be tried in criminal cases by a Native. If therefore the Judges of the Supreme Court were to be associated with a corresponding number of Judges of the Sudder Court, this objection would be still respected, and we should again have a happy mixture of sound and able English lawyers, and practical and intelligent covenanted civilians, carefully selected from our Zillah or provincial courts. Another great saving of expense would be effected by this reform, which would only be carrying out the recommendation contained in the Report of the Colonization Committee, namely :—

"The judicial system of India will never be placed on a sound and practical basis till all the Courts are organized into one harmonious whole, and until, by an amalgamation of the Supreme and Sudder Courts, the highest and most learned tribunals of the land shall be Courts of Appeal to the whole country, administering law under the same procedure."

It was unnecessary to dwell at any length on the fourth and concluding Resolution, as it opened up the question of an Imperial guarantee, which had been so frequently discussed in that House, and which, from its importance, would of itself be a fit subject to refer to a Select Committee. It appeared to him that the principle by which our Indian Ministers at home were guided in raising loans could not be sound. A few months ago the right hon. Baronet the Secretary of State for India required £5,000,000. He invited tenders, limiting the price at 97, bearing interest at 5 per cent. Seven and a half millions were immediately subscribed for, and in a few weeks the stock jumped up from 97 to 105. Now, it could not be doubted that a 3½ per cent stock, under an Imperial guarantee, would have been just as easily raised, and on so small a sum as £5,000,000 something like £87,500 a year have been saved to the revenues of India. He was aware that this course would be objected to in many quarters on the ground of the risk and liability. Well, then, why not subject all future loans raised for India to a reduction of say 1 per cent, to be put aside as a sinking fund towards the redemption of the loan? That arrangement would involve no risk, but, on the contrary, it would ensure every provident precaution for the future. That more loans would be asked for India was beyond a doubt. The right hon. Baronet the Secretary of State for India told the House so in August last, expressing a hope that he would not require more than £6,000,000. Meanwhile the Indian debt by the 1st of May of this year will have reached £96,000,000. To meet these difficulties a few extra taxes had been imposed, and from that questionable tax—the salt-tax—which had been increased 20 per cent, the greatest source of revenue was expected to be derived. All at present was in a state of uncertainty. The Legislative Council was waiting for the right Hon. Mr. Wilson; that right Hon. Gentleman was seeking an interview with Lord Canning, who had started on a long itinerant tour, in which he appeared to be disposing of Principalities with a lavish hand, and Mr. Wilson hoped to catch him at Lahore, distant upwards of 1,000 miles from Calcutta. Under these circumstances it was necessary that something should be done, for the present principle of raising loans was operating as unfavourably to India as it was favourably to the gentlemen of Capel Court. He had now brought the subject of his Resolutions under the notice of the House. He had endeavoured to do so briefly, and perhaps on that account he had executed his task imperfectly. It was probable he should be told that as a right hon. Gentleman of distinguished ability recently deputed to India to finance, it would be pre-Committee which might readings. All he could say in reply was, that such a result was, very far from his wish and intention, and he begged to assure the House that in applying for this Committee he was actuated only by a sense of public duty. He was anxious, most anxious, that the House of Commons should give an assurance to the public, both at home and in India, of its earnest desire to co-operate with that right hon. Gentleman in promoting those measures of economy and simplification which were so essential to the prosperity of our Indian possessions; and he was sanguine enough to believe that by measures which he had financial difficulties and that our Indian population and vast developed wealth—four the indomitable spiritured and consolidate of a Wellesley,—wo perishable memorial ness, wisdom and glory.

“That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire, &c.”

SIR CHARLES WOOD: I hope before I sit down to satisfy even my hon. Friend who has moved these Resolutions that no advantage will be derived from the appointment of a Select Committee. I am grateful, however, to him for bringing these questions before the House, because, varied as they certainly are in their nature, I fully admit that they are most important in relation to the Administration of India, and well worthy the consideration of every hon. Member of this House. I am also glad that they should have been brought forward by a former Member of the Indian Civil Service, as it cannot be supposed that he is inimical to the claims of those members of that service who have to perform most responsible duties in a distant clime. With regard to the first question, it is not one which has at any time escaped the attention of the Indian Government. In the Committee of 1853 it was shown that already the number of civil servants had considerably increased, while the amount of salaries had diminished, and when we look at the higher class who receive large salaries, we find that those receiving upwards of £3,000 a year have diminished one half in the last twenty years. It is therefore, unjust to preceding Governments to suppose that they have been unmindful of obtaining efficient servants at as cheap a rate as is consistent with the due performance of the duties required of them. But there may be some classes of officers whose salaries are too high, and probably others whose number may be reduced. In 1854, when I was President of the Board of Control, I desired the Board of Directors to send a despatch calling upon the local Government in India to revise the salaries of all the civil servants. The consequence was that Mr. Ricketts, now a Member of Council, was appointed specially to consider the subject, and he reported very fully to the Indian Government. That Report was revised by the Indian Government, and their report sent home and printed at the close of last Session. That Report proposed considerable reductions throughout in the salaries of the civil servants. I have received the strongest remonstrances, not only on the part of many of the civil servants, but also on the part of the Government of Madras, against carrying out those recommendations. As soon as the Indian Council met after the recess I appointed a Committee of the most experienced Members, some civil and some not civil servants, to go through with the greatest care the various recommendations both of Mr. Ricketts and the Indian Government, to consider the objections urged against them, and to report fully upon the subject. They have for two months been prosecuting that inquiry, and when it is concluded, the whole subject will be taken into consideration by myself and the Council of India, and it may perhaps be necessary to introduce a Bill upon the subject. I agree with the hon. Gentleman that, considering the responsibility and the amount of labour imposed upon them, in a climate not particularly favourable to European constitutions, the civil servants, as a body, are not overpaid; and, knowing that there is an apprehension abroad among the civil servants that they may be subjected to a sweeping reduction, I am glad to avail myself of this opportunity of stating publicly that the Home Government is not of opinion that a reduction of such a character ought to be made. No doubt, some saving may be made by abolishing certain offices and reducing others here and there, but I do not think that anything like a sweeping reduction is called for or would be right. I am afraid, however, that any saving which could possibly be effected from this source cannot afford great relief to the finances of India, since there are many places now in which for the proper administration of the country a larger staff of civil servants both European and native is necessary, and all the savings which you might effect in the way I have pointed out ought to be applied to this purpose. It is perfectly true, as the hon. Gentleman has observed, that there is not the temptation to go out to India now as in former times. The medical service and the civil service have lately been thrown open to competition, and yet in the medical service we have had more vacancies than applications; and it was only the other day that I saw a letter from a young man who had got a civil appointment by competition telling his friends that he was so much disappointed that he should be glad to exchange India for the most moderate clerkship at home. That being the case, I do not think it would be right to hold out any anticipation of a large reduction being effected in this way. If you look at the salaries paid by railway companies out there to their employés, you will find that they are quite as large and sometimes larger than those paid by the Government to their servants, notwithstanding the far greater responsibility and labours thrown on the latter. As much inquiry has been made and is going on as can be made into this subject, and I do not see, therefore, what benefit can be derived from the appointment of a Committee. With regard to the second point the hon. Member has brought under our notice, the abolition of the Supreme Councils of Bengal, Madras, and Bombay, I am not prepared to say that they may not come under the class in which reduction might properly be made. The hon. Gentleman seems to think that the Executive Council at Calcutta has nothing to do, but still they have all to do which they had before the creation of the Legislative Council by the Bill of 1854. I do not wish to give a positive opinion on the subject, but I entertain serious doubts whether it is advantageous for the interests of India to keep up the Executive Council in its present form. The theory of the Government of India is that it is the Government of the Governor-General in Council. All the papers connected with the administration go to every member of the Council, and, vast as the business is, they endeavour to discharge their duties fully and completely—the consequence of which is inordinate delay; and to such an extent has this gone that they have been obliged, of their own authority, to divide the less important business among the different members, so that it may be disposed of without the necessity of coming before the whole Council. Besides this, a great deal of business is necessarily despatched by the Secretaries of the different departments, so that it is no uncommon remark, in the junior Presidencies, "It is of no use to send such a thing before the Supreme Council, because Mr. Secretary So-and-so is known to be opposed to it." A good deal of dissatisfaction had arisen from this cause, for persons in authority naturally objected to being overruled by an official of inferior rank to themselves. It seems to me very desirable that the Council in its present state should be put an end to, and that officers of higher rank than the present Secretaries should be put at the head of each department, and should be made responsible to the Governor General for the transaction of the business in that department. Upon important occasions the Governor General might summon all of them together in a sort of cabinet council. I have been in communication with Earl Canning on the subject all the autumn, and he very much concurs in these views. The papers have been submitted to a Special Committee of the Council, and they are considering whether the alteration ought to be made, and, if so, in what manner. When Mr. Wilson went out it was with the understanding that if this alteration were carried out he would be prepared to take charge of the Finance Department; and when Sir Henry Frere was appointed I impressed upon him also that if the change were made he must be prepared to take charge of such department as the Governor General might think fit. In this way a saving will be effected, and you will have the further advantage of being able to obtain men from all parts of India, instead of from the province of Bengal morely, as is generally the case with the Supreme Council now. If, however, this plan is adopted, it will only be right to raise the salaries of the Secretaries, not indeed to those of members of Council, but so as to make the situation objects of ambition to men of the greatest talents and most experience. It will be necessary to come to Parliament for powers to carry out the Measure, if on consideration it be thought advisable. The same observations applies to the Councils in the minor Presidencies. I believe that if secretaries were appointed there in the same way to transact the business a great saving might be effected, and the business would be done in less time. The next question is the Legislative Council. What has taken place with regard to this Council is a warning against precipitate action, even where all the authorities are unanimous in its favour. Any hon. Gentleman who sat on the Committee of 1853 will remember that all the witnesses examined before it were in favour of the creation of Legislative Council; and it was in deference to that unanimous opinion that I introduced a clause into the Bill creating it. But I must admit that it has not answered my expectations or the expectations of those who originally suggested it. At the same time it is not exactly what I intended. It was obvious that the Executive Council of Bengal was not the best body to legislate for the whole of India, as it did not possess the requisite knowledge of the other portions of the country to enable it to do so; but it was hoped that with the assistance of those who were conversant with the requirements of Madras and the North-Western Provinces, and with the addition of two Judges of the Supreme Court, who would add to the general stock their knowledge of English law, a working Committee would be constituted which might elaborate the laws and improve the legislation of India. I am afraid that in their desire too closely to imitate the House of Commons they have lost sight of more important objects, and they certainly have not succeeded in gaining the general confidence of the public, though in some of the objections that have been urged there may be a little exaggeration, and possibly they have been to some extent over-stated. The question of framing a legislative body of any kind for India is a very difficult one; for, though it is of course desirable to introduce into it persons who are unconnected with the Civil Service, it is not easy to see how they can become acquainted with and advocate before the Council the interests and wishes of the great mass of the Natives of India. If we introduce an English merchant or indigo planter, a native-born merchant or learned Brahmin, into the Legislative Council of Calcutta, how is it to be supposed that he will adequately represent the interests of the landowners of the North-Western Provinces, being as ignorant of the requirements of nine-tenths of the population as the members of this assembly must necessarily be? If it were possible to suppose that we could be called on to frame a similar council here in London, does any one suppose that a city merchant would fairly represent the agricultural population of Devonshire or Yorkshire, of Perthshire or the county of Cork? If any person will fairly consider the diversities of race and language, of occupation and interests, which exist throughout the different parts of India, I think he will agree with me that it is nearly impossible to construct upon any conceivable plan a Legislative Council in Calcutta which shall afford a fair representation of the whole of India. I myself believe that the civil servants of the Crown who live in the Provinces, and are necessarily brought into daily contact with the Natives in various capacities, whether as collectors, judges, or magistrates, are in general persons much fitter to be intrusted with the administration of the general interests of India than individuals who happen merely to be residents in or near Calcutta. Of course the difficulty diminishes in proportion as the area is lessened; the facility of procuring in each province persons who may be supposed to be practically acquainted with its interests is greater; and therefore I will not say that parties, who may not be in the service of the Government, are to be excluded from the Legislative Council; but if such a change is to be admitted, I am inclined to think that a Separate Council for each Presidency will be the preferable course. But I do maintain—although it may appear rather an unconstitutional principle—that the difficulties in the way of the formation of a good Legislative Council for India render it almost an impossibility, and that practically the legislation for the whole of our Indian territories must be left almost entirely and uncontrolledly in the hands of the Governor. The difficulty may be illustrated by a reference to the important subject of the manner in which a new tax should be imposed; and here I must say that the hon. Gentleman was a little unjust to the members of the Civil Service, when speaking of what has recently occurred; because it was never their intention to exempt themselves from taxation; but their view was to introduce a Licensing Bill on trades and professions, and to tax themselves in some other way. This tax, opposed as it may seem to our notions, is not only a feasible but a popular way of raising money in India. Sir R. Montgomery has actually raised a very considerable sum in the North-West provinces in this way; but in Calcutta and in Bengal, where there are numbers of English residents, an income-tax is much more suited to their notions, and indeed is much more applicable to fundholders, officeholders, and large proprietors of land; but if this tax were applied to the ryots of Madras, not a soul from one end of the Presidency to the other would come under its operation. I think that a moderate license duty, imposed according to the feelings and habits of the Natives, is one of the least unpopular taxes that can be levied on an Oriental people. A series of mistakes appear to have been made about this Licensing Bill, which render it very doubtful whether it will be passed at all; and we have not yet heard what proceedings have been taken since the Legislative Council re-assembled. But, in one shape or another, additional taxation is required; and I hope that, having regard to the circumstances of the different provinces—for I do not think it necessary that one uniform tax should prevail throughout India—a sufficient revenue may be raised, so that, by bringing our expenditure within reasonable limits, we may be able to look forward to a period of prosperity. A great difficulty with which it has been necessary to contend, has arisen from the centralising policy which was heretofore adopted: formerly everything was taken away from the subordinate Governments and concentrated at Calcutta, and the consequence was, that great discouragement was thus cast on the minor Governments, while from the enormous pressure thrown upon the Supreme Legislative Council, and partly, also, from the defects in its constitution, results of a most unsatisfactory kind ensued. We have, to a certain extent, endeavoured to relieve the Central Government, by putting greater power into the hands of the subordinate Government. We have removed the superintendence of Baroda to Bombay, and that of Mysore to Madras. We have also taken measures to bring Singapore under the jurisdiction of the Colonial Office, and we have also intrusted the subordinate Government with greater authority in respect to the execution of public works. But the House must remember that the point on which all these provincial Governments claim greater liberty of action is precisely that point in which the supervision and control of the central legislative authority is most necessary and beneficial—I allude to the expenditure of the public funds. If the different Provinces all contributed rateably to the necessities of India, it would be only fair that they should deal with the surplus revenue as they pleased; but such, unfortunately, is far from being the case; and if some check were not exercised by the Supreme Government, the finances of the country would soon fall into irretrievable disorder. I quite agree with my hon. Friend as to the direction in which we ought to proceed, still preserving to the Central Government a general and central control. The next question is, whether it is not advisable to amalgamate the Supreme and Sudder Courts. On that point I entirely go along with my hon. Friend. I came to that conclusion as long ago as 1853, and I introduced a measure for the purpose of amalgamating those courts in 1854. But the government of Calcutta found it impossible to carry it into effect; and in 1860 what I proposed in 1854 is still undone. There is, however, a prospect of the question being settled. The plan for the amalgamation has received the support of the Judges of both Courts in Madras; they state that the scheme is not only possible, but desirable. The Chief Justice of the Supreme Court at Calcutta is favourable to it. We have again directed the attention of the Supreme Government to the subject; and I hope before the end of the Session it will be my duty to introduce a Bill to carry the amalgamation into effect. I believe it will be a most valuable measure; I have no doubt that the combination of the legal knowledge of the English Judges; and the local knowledge of the Sudder Judges will form a better court of appeal, and furnish a better example to all the other Courts throughout India than any one now existing. Probably, also, it will be a measure of economy, as it may enable the Government to reduce the number of Judges. I hardly know whether I need follow my hon. Friend through the question of Imperial guarantees for Indian loans; the subject has been thoroughly discussed. The loan that has been made has been very successful, and the credit of India in England stands high; that has reacted on India itself, where Indian credit is now higher than it was six months ago; and I sincerely trust that before the end of this year I shall be able to make a statement of the financial condition of India, that will be more favourable than the statement of last year. The three subjects which were referred to by the hon. Member—the Civil Service, the Supreme and Sudder Courts, and the question of the Legislative Council—are now under consideration by three different Committees of the Indian Council; and I hope before long to lay before the House such measures as may become necessary for carrying out the decisions which may ultimately be adopted. Under these circumstances I do not see what advantage would be gained by referring them for investigation to a Committee.

MR. H. BAILLIE said, he was not surprised that the hon. Member for Windsor (Mr. W. Vansittart), taking as he did a deep interest in the prosperity of India, should have brought this subject under the consideration of the House, and proposed a Committee of Inquiry into it. He was happy to hear that the right hon. Secretary of State for India was able to take so cheerful a view of the future prospects of Indian finance; but he did not believe that an unprejudiced person who had paid attention to the subject could come to any other conclusion than that the present state of the Indian Administration was very little creditable to the Government of this country. What were the facts? Possessed of one of the finest regions of the world, renowned from the most remote antiquity for its wealth and civilization, and containing a numerous and industrious population—possessed of all these advantages, its Government, nevertheless was practically in a state of insolvency. It had for many years past lived from hand to mouth, upon the proceeds of its ancient reputation; and the very credit on which it then subsisted would ere this have failed were it not for a general belief prevailing in the public mind, and fostered, he regretted to say, by statesmen in that House, that sooner or later the Imperial Government must take on itself the responsibility of Indian debts. He did not wish to take an exaggerated view of the difficulties of the Indian Government, he only echoed the opinions of higher and greater authorities. Sir H. Frere, late Commissioner in Scinde, and now a Member of the Legislative Council, in his Report on the re-organization of the Indian army, described the Government as being in the condition of an insolvent Irish landlord before the Incumbered Estates Bill was passed. It was impossible to be in a much worse condition than that. Such had been the result of the administration of Indian affairs from the financial point of view; but what had it been with regard to the condition of the people? A vast portion of the finest land in India—estimated by some as much as one-sixth, which previously to the establishment of the English Government was in the highest state of cultivation, had since become a desert waste. That was an answer to what they so often heard of the great advantages the Natives of India had derived from their just and civilizing administration. He did not assert that all this fertile land was thrown out of cultivation in consequence of English misgovernment alone. Many large tracts were thrown out of cultivation in consequence of the anarchy and confusion that followed the dissolution of the Empire of Delhi; but England had done nothing to reclaim them, nothing to remedy the evil the Indian Government had much contributed to produce. It might be said this was the result of past administration; that they had now established a new form of Government for India, and that now our Government was firmly established, the administration would be better. We had, indeed, a new form of Government. But it was a new Government only in name; the same men still sat in the same places, discharging the same routine duties, and carrying out the same principles. He would not say of them what had been said of some potentates, that "they had learned nothing and forgot nothing;" if they had done nothing else they had been very successful in raising loans for the Governor General in this country, for which duty their long practice under the Court of Directors rendered them eminently qualified. While speaking of the Indian Council, he might be permitted to notice the changes which had been effected of late in the management of their business by the Secretary of State for India. Those changes had, he believed, been most judicious, for previously the system had been to send all the despatches to the Committees of the Council before they were submitted to the Secretary of State. The result of that system had been, that the Secretary of State for India had been left in ignorance of the views and opinions of the able men who presided over the several departments of his office, and could only see through the eyes of the Council, which, if the former state of things continued to exist, would practically possess the functions of an executive, instead of being that consultative body which the Legislature intended. So far, therefore, he regarded the change to which he referred as one which was calculated to operate beneficially. He should next proceed to advert to the finances of India, and the means which had been resorted to with the object of removing the difficulties by which that question was beset. A gentleman had been appointed to proceed from this country to India upon that important mission, but he must take the liberty of stating that he thought a mistake had been committed at the very outset in connection with that appointment, in constituting Mr. Wilson a Member of Council. He entertained that opinion because Mr. Wilson, in that capacity, would have to wade through the enormous mass of business which came before the Council—a duty the discharge of which was quite sufficient to take up all the time at his disposal to the exclusion of financial subjects. Now, if Mr. Wilson had been appointed a Special Commissioner, with full powers to deal with questions of finance, then indeed he might have devoted himself altogether to their solution; but one of the reasons which were given for not having done so was that it would have been found impossible to give him a salary of £8,000 a year unless he had been nominated a Member of Council. But be that as it might, he should like to know with what powers beyond those of an ordinary Member of Council, Mr. Wilson was to be entrusted. Was he authorized to deal with the great military establishments of India, or was his attention to be exclusively directed to questions of finance? If the latter were the case, then might the Government as well have appointed an extraordinary Chancellor of the Exchequer in this country to draw up a scheme for the payment of the national debt. In expressing that opinion, he however by no means meant to depreciate the abilities of the Gentleman in question, but simply acted upon the belief that the great Indian difficulty was not strictly one of a purely financial character, or one which could be solved by any fiscal measures, however well devised. That difficulty, he should maintain, arose from the system of administration which had of late years been pursued in India—a system which was hateful as well to the great body of its people as to the native chiefs and nobility, and which rendered it necessary that the Government of the country should be carried on by means of large military establishments which were out of all proportion to the revenue and finances of the country. Now, the statesmen who had founded our Indian empire, and those by whom it had up to the time of the Marquess of Wellesley been governed, had invariably laid down the principle, that its administration ought to be conducted by means of the native chiefs and nobles, and, entertaining that view, they had done everything in their power to conciliate those native chiefs, and to associate them as far as possible in the Government. That system, however, had of late years undergone a change. The native chiefs and nobles had been treated with the utmost contempt, and their existence, so far as the administration of affairs was concerned, had been completely ignored. A centralized system of Government, emanating from Calcutta, had been adopted, a system which had proved so odious to the inhabitants of India that he believed it had been one of the chief causes of the rebellion which had broken out in the North-Western Provinces. The question of administration, indeed, was one of so much importance that he should advert to a single example as illustrative of the view which he was endeavouring to impress upon the attention of the House. The example which he should take was that, he believed, which was most favourable to the present system of Government in India—he alluded to the case of the Punjab, which he had heard it so frequently said had been admirably governed by Sir J. Lawrence, who seemed to be regarded by some as the beau idéal of administrators, and whose system, it was said, ought to be adopted in every part of our Indian Empire. Now, he for one was perfectly ready to bear testimony to the great abilities which Sir J. Lawrence possessed, as well as to the energy and vigour with which he had stemmed the tide of rebellion. The exhibition of those qualities, however, was altogether a different thing from the system of administration which he had established in the Punjab, the wisdom of which he (Mr. Baillie) was very much disposed to doubt, for the reasons which he was about to state to the House. Hon. Members were probably aware that when Sir J. Lawrence had first been sent to the Punjab, it was a newly conquered country, and the Government required to be reorganized. He had gone there in the capacity of assistant to his brother Sir H. Lawrence, who at the time filled the office of Chief Commissioner. It had, however, soon after been discovered that the views and opinions of the two brothers, as to the mode in which the government of the Province should be conducted, essentially differed. Indeed, so great had been the difference between them on the subject, that he had reason to believe both had addressed letters to the Marquess of Dalhousie, requesting that either one or the other of them might be removed. The views which Sir H. Lawrence entertained as to the mode in which the Punjab should be governed were those to which he (Mr. Baillie) had already alluded as characterizing the administration of our earlier Indian statesmen. He desired that all the native nobility should be confirmed in the possession of their estates, and that they should be associated with the Government in the administration of affairs. The views of Sir J. Lawrence, on the contrary, were that we should carry out in the Punjab that system which had been adopted in the North-Western Provinces—that was to say, that the talookdars, or native nobility, should be called upon to produce written titles to their estates, and in those cases in which they should fail to produce them that the estates should be confiscated, with the view of replenishing an exhausted exchequer, leaving to the proprietors of those estates only a life interest or some sort of right of curtailed occupation. Those respective views had been submitted to the Marquess of Dalhousie, and the result had been that he had decided in favour of the policy of Sir J. Lawrence, which might be described generally as of that centralizing character which prevailed in the North-Western Provinces. Sir H. Lawrence had, in consequence, been sent to Lucknow, while his brother had been installed in the Punjab, with full power to carry into execution the views and opinions which he entertained. Now, it appeared from the evidence of Mr. Mangles, who had been examined before the Committee on the Colonization of India, that the confiscation of property in the Punjab had been carried on to a greater extent than in any other portion of that country. The results of the system had, he might add, soon manifested themselves, inasmuch as the Government had received from Sir J. Lawrence constant requisitions to be supplied with fresh troops, and regiment after regiment had to be marched up to his assistance. So far, indeed, had that state of things proceeded, that the Indian Government had found it expedient to consider whether it was possible to carry out the system the adoption of which Sir J. Lawrence had recommended in consequence of the extraordinary expense which its maintenance entailed. The question, however, had been argued in the Indian Council upon the principle that the Punjab formed part of the Bengal Presidency; that they were compelled to maintain in that Presidency a certain number of troops, and that it was immaterial in what particular districts those troops happened to be quartered. For it was supposed by those who seemed to have been very ignorant of the state of native feeling that there was no necessity for the presence of British troops either in Lower Bengal or in Central India, or in the North-West Provinces, and the scheme founded upon that notable argument had accordingly been carried into effect. Regiments had been marched from every part of Bengal to the Punjab, and their places supplied by Native troops. The consequence had been that when the mutiny broke out it had been discovered that while Sir John Lawrence had a force of 13,000 soldiers in the Punjab there were only 1,300 European troops to be found between Delhi and Calcutta—a distance of more than 1,000 miles. Could any one doubt that this policy in the Punjab was the cause of the success that attended the first outbreak of the rebellion, and of its earliest and most disastrous consequences? He did not say that the rebellion would not have occurred under any circumstances; but he said that if the troops had been left in their accustomed stations,—if there had been a single regiment at Cawnpore, the horrible massacre would never have taken place there, and if a single regiment had been at Delhi that arsenal would never have fallen into the hands of the rebels; and it was only the fortunate arrival of the British troops on the sudden termination of the war in Persia that restored the prestige of our arms. Such was the immediate result of the system of government he had described in the Punjab; and what was the result as regards our present position in India? That was the important point to which he wished to call the attention of the House. He would offer no opinion of his own, but adduced that of far more competent witnesses—Sir John Lawrence himself, Brigadier General Chamberlain, and Colonel Herbert Edwardes. These three distinguished officers were appointed a commission to report on the organization of the Indian army, and one of the first questions put to them by the Governor General was this:—What should be the number of European troops for the permanent occupation of the Punjab, and what should be their ordinary distribution? Their answer was that 22,600 European troops were necessary. Then, as to the number of Native troops to be maintained there, they reported that there should be a force of 52,364 men. Why, the whole of Her Majesty's forces in India previous to the rebellion amounted to only 22,000, and now we had the astounding fact from these officers that 22,600 European troops were necessary for the government of the Punjab alone—the very last of our Indian conquests and a very insignificant portion of our empire. He would offer no comment on this statement, but leave it to be pondered by the House and the country. It was evident, however, that we were governing India just as the Austrians governed Lombardy, contrary to the wishes of the people, by the force of our battalions and bayonets. That was a system which would never last, and the people of England would soon find that even the honour and glory of governing India would be too costly a luxury if it was only to be obtained upon such terms. He thought he had shown that our great Indian difficulty was not to be solved by sending out an economist to deal with the financial part of the question. With regard to the Indian debt, he thought the right hon. Gentleman had not expressed himself very clearly. There seemed to be a feeling abroad, which he believed prevailed to some extent on the Stock Exchange, that sooner or later the Government would take on itself the responsibility of the Indian debt. If such an intention existed, he thought it should be done at once. But if, as he hoped, that House would never consent to put the burden, at least of the past debt of India, whatever might be done as to the future debt, on the shoulders of the people, he did think it very desirable that the Government should make an explicit declaration, so that the question might be settled, and those who embarked their money in Indian securities might know that while they got a larger percentage they must put up with an inferior security. There was another subject far more serious to which he wished to call attention—the necessity under which we were now becoming liable to maintain little short of 100,000 European troops locked up in India. Was it possible—he did not say in time of war, but in time of peace—to provide such a force, and also to provide for the wants of our other colonies, keeping also an army in this country sufficient to give security to the people that their hearths should not be invaded, and that in time of war we might be able to maintain, as of old, the honour of England? There could not be a doubt that the uneasiness which had prevailed in this country for some time past at the great military preparations in France arose in a considerable degree from a knowledge of this fact, that we had 100,000 trained soldiers to keep in India, while we had nothing but second battalions and embodied militia for the defence of our own shores. If these 100,000 men had been in the south of England, we might have laughed at all the preparations of France. Was it possible to provide and maintain such a number of men for India? Only last year the Minister for War came down to the House and told them that it was of no use to vote more men for the army, as the Government could not raise the number voted last year. That was a degrading and humiliating statement—that they had not been able to raise the number of men that Parliament deemed necessary for the country; and he trusted they would not have a similar statement on any other occasion. What he wanted to see was action on the part of the Government. He looked for action, but found it nowhere. In India there was the same old routine system going on, just as if there had been no great rebellion. In England, too, routine was still prevalent. Take the case of the militia—every one knew for the last five years that our militia system had broken down. If they wanted to call out the militia for defence, instead of 150,000 men Government could not bring 50,000 under arms. Last Session the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright) made a very able and important speech with reference to India, in which he stated that the Government of India was too unwieldy—that such was the enormous mass of business which came before the Governor-General that it was impossible any man could get through it, and the result was that despatches remained unanswered, not for weeks, but for months and years. They had a remarkable example of this in regard to the Principality of Dhar. A despatch was received from India while a noble Friend of his was at the Board of Control, stating that the Governor General had dethroned the Rajah and confiscated his territory. It was deemed necessary to reverse the decision of the Governor-General, and order him to restore those territories, and despatches were forwarded to that effect. During the twelve months his noble Friend remained in office no answer of any kind was returned to those despatches; but he was informed that lately—in fact, just within two years—the answer was received, that answer being that the Governor-General did not think it wise to execute the orders which had been given to him. That circumstance would give a notion of the autocratic powers assumed by the Governor-General of India. The hon. Member for Birmingham also suggested that each Presidency should have its own administration. He thought that the great difficulty which stood in the way—namely, the financial part of the question, might be got over. The question had been discussed by many able civilians, and among them by Mr. G. Campbell, who had written a pamphlet on the financial state of India. Mr. Campbell said that the Government would never succeed in remodelling the finances of India until they established that localization of finance which was so much wanted there. Local finance at present was a thing unknown, whereas every district ought to be bound to regulate its expenditure in some degree by its receipts. Sir Henry Frere said that the late alterations in the Government of India might confer upon the Governor-General the autocratic power he required, but that India must be centralized by persons, and not by departments, if the Government wished to avoid general bankruptcy and ruin. He believed that if a different system of Government were adopted in India they might dispense with one-half the European troops whom it was now necessary to maintain there. Sir J. Lawrence recommended that not less than 22,600 European troops should be maintained in the Punjab, and the Government could not do better than follow Sir John's advice, for if they allowed the European troops in the Punjab to be too much weakened they might have another rebellion. Let the Government bear in mind that upon the solution of this important question, not only the honour and character but also the safety of the country were involved. He would recommend his hon. Friend not to press his Motion.

COLONEL SYKES observed that great misapprehension existed as to the state of the finances of India. A table which he had before him, and which was compiled from official papers on the table of the House, showed that in 1800 the debt of India was £14,125,000, the interest being at £12, £10, £9, and £8 per cent. The revenue of India at that period was only £10,485,000, and the interest of the debt was £1,429,000, the pressure of the debt was therefore upwards of 13½ per cent upon the revenue. The amount of the debt increased year by year in consequence of successive wars, but by numerous financial operations the pressure of the interest had been reduced, until in 1857, though the debt was £60,000,000, the interest had a pressure of only 7·13 per cent instead of 13·65 in the year 1800, and this was owing to the rates of interest having fallen from a range between £12 and £8 per cent to 4 per cent, and in 1857 a loan of £500,000 was even raised at 3½ per cent. The revenue of the country, in fact, had gone on increasing in a greater ratio than the pressure of the debt, having risen from £10,485,000 in 1800, to £33,303,000 in April 1857. There were, in 1857, 50,000 European troops in India—the charges of the civil and military establishments were no doubt very high—but in spite of that the revenues were sufficient to cover every possible charge in India and in England, to lay out £2,000,000 on extraordinary public works, and to leave a balance of £82,432. And yet an opinion was abroad at the time and was even expressed in the House of Commons that India was bankrupt! Fifty thousand European troops were sufficient to take Delhi, to take Lucknow, and to break the neck of the mutiny—50,000 troops were sufficient to hold their own against the rebellion of the whole Bengal army,—universal insurrection in Oude, and partial revolts of Native chiefs, until reinforcements arrived from Europe. If 50,000 troops were sufficient to hold India when all the Native Princes were capable of resisting us—and many were doing so—surely, now, when there was not a Native Prince capable of standing before a brigade, and not a fortress to besiege, we did not require 100,000 European soldiers in India. We need not fear the people. They had been pretty generally disarmed—that was an act which he regretted; as it was undignified, and he would almost venture to designate it, cowardly, but such was the case; and we could not, therefore, require more than 50,000 men now. The mutiny had occasioned a very large outlay, and the debt had risen from £60,000,000 in 1857 to £98,000,000 in 1859–60, but still the pressure of the interest did not amount to what it was in 1807, when India was less wealthy. It then amounted to 15·67 per cent on the revenue; it was even now only 13·54 per cent. What reason was there, then, to despair? What reason was there for seeking to increase the revenue of India by the mischievous and impolitic means lately proposed? The people of India could only consume a certain amount of our manufactures—chiefly cottons and cotton twist—woollens and hardware, beer, spirits, stationery, &c., were of no use to them. But we required every year an increasing quantity of their produce—indigo, sugar, oil seeds, dyes, &c.—and the result is that we have to pay yearly several millions in silver to them as a balance of trade. He could not conceive then a greater financial blunder than placing a duty of 20 per cent on English manufactures, the consumption of which ought to be encouraged in India. As regarded the licensing tax, his right hon. Friend (Sir C. Wood) was mistaken in supposing that an impost of that nature had been common in India in past times; men were born to their trades and fixed in them by caste and were not licensed. There had been the moturpha, a small tax on shopkeepers and trades, but it did not resemble the licensing tax, and this was proved by the great dissatisfaction which that tax had created among the Natives. Moreover, there was no absolute necessity for imposing such a burden on the people of India. All that was required to be done was to tide over the deficiency occasioned by the mutiny by loans, and that object had been already partially accomplished by the people of England having invested their money in Indian securities, without an Imperial guarantee. The Indian loans were now at a premium in the English market. The guarantee question had been practically settled, and his right hon. Friend could now obtain any amount of money that he required on favourable terms. He would recommend him to do so, and reserve any increase of taxation in India to the time when it was absolutely necessary. Let the European force be reduced to 50,000 or 60,000 men, and there would be an abundance of money for public works. He approved the plan of giving a Council to each of the Presidencies in which the chiefs and great landowners of the interior should be represented; but a Calcutta Baboo, or Native merchant at Madras or Bombay, would be out of place in such a Council. If his hon. Friend divided the House for a Committee, he should certainly divide with him. There was an extraordinary amount of ignorance in this country with regard to the people of India, and he should rejoice in anything which tended to present the Natives in their true light.

COLONEL HERBERT remarked, that he was glad to hear that it was not the intention of Her Majesty's Government to make any large and sweeping reductions in the salaries of the civil servants of India. Generally speaking, those salaries were not, in his opinion, too high to maintain the responsibility and the honourable position of the service. He was also rejoiced to hear it was the intention to give more extensive powers to the governors of the minor Presidencies. It was a great detriment to the interests of the service to have those constant references from the minor Presidencies to the supreme Government of Calcutta. He had heard with surprise the remark of the hon. Member for Inverness-shire (Mr. Baillie), that India had for ages been celebrated for its civilization. India had been celebrated for barbaric splendour; but he did not believe that in this country, at all events, gorgeous palaces and splendid trappings were regarded as marks of civilization. All the principal monuments of India were raised to gratify the taste or vanity of despotic monarchs. The chief roads were roads from one palace to another; the chief towns were towns built by successive rulers to perpetuate a name. There were palaces built by Mogul Emperors, the cost of which was so fabulously great that the hon. Member for Lambeth would be appalled if it were proposed to spend one tithe of the amount on a palace in this country. He (Colonel Herbert) was not prepared to admit that such things were proofs of civilization. It had been customary to abuse those who had governed India during the last hundred years, and to compare their acts and monuments with those of the Native rulers. It would be found on examination that the Government of the East India Company had made great progress in recent years in useful and beneficial works. It was previously engaged in great wars, which were in most instances thrust upon it—wars for the very existence of British rule in India; and because its exchequer was emptied by wars, which, though they had been called aggressive, were in nine cases out of ten purely defensive, and because, in consequence of that state of things, it could not carry on the works that it desired, it had been held up to scorn and obloquy. The hon. Member for Inverness-shire said that if they did not take care India would become a millstone round their neck. He should like to know when England ever paid one farthing on account of India. As much as six or seven millions came from India to this country for the purchase of stores and the payment of salaries and pensions. The balances were thus far entirely on the side of England, and there was no other of our colonies which could show similar results. Therefore there was no ground for speaking of India as if she were likely to be a millstone round the neck of this country. The general conclusion which he had drawn from what he had seen and learned in India was most favourable to the administration of their countrymen in that country during the last hundred years. When he said this he could not be charged with being too partial to the East India Company, for although he belonged to a family that owed much to India, it could not be said of it that it owed much to the East India Company.

MR. KINNAIRD said, he hoped the hon. Member for Windsor would withdraw his Motion, although they were much indebted to him for the interest of this debate and for much valuable information extracted from the Government and other speakers. He rose, however, principally to express his deep regret at what had fallen from the hon. Member for Inverness-shire (Mr. Baillie), who, when the Government of the Punjab was not necessarily in question, had thought fit to introduce the differences that had existed between Sir John and Sir Henry Lawrence, and unjustly to attack Sir John Lawrence, for whom they must all entertain the highest admiration. There was this consolation, that the country would know that the attack was as undeserved as it was ungenerous. If the hon. Gentleman would bring the matter in due form before the House, he was sure that the answers of those in authority and of private Members would disprove the statements which the hon. Gentleman had hazarded. The hon. Gentleman would lead them to suppose that India was saved simply by the bravery of the English troops, when he ought to have known that the capture of Delhi was as much owing to the influence of Sir John Lawrence with the Native chiefs as to the courage of our troops.

MR. W. EWART said, he also must express his regret at the allusions made to Sir John Lawrence. He concurred, however, in one statement only of the hon. Member for Inverness-shire, that the time was near when the excessive number of the army might be diminished, and India pacified by the good administration of just laws and the courteous deportment of British subjects. He rejoiced that the Secretary of State for India was favourable to the decentralization of authority, and he hoped by that course, and by the infusion of non-official members in the Legislative Councils, great improvements would be effected. He wished to know whether the licensing system was to be modified or abandoned.

MR. T. G. BARING said, that the Bill which was first introduced by the Government in India was a Bill for licensing trades and professions. It was afterwards changed into an Income-tax Bill. The Legislative Council then adjourned, and they had not yet re-considered it. Her Majesty's Government could not, therefore, be aware of the precise position in which the matter stood. It was the income tax, and not the licence tax which had created most opposition in India, as a reference to meetings in Bombay and elsewhere would show. In the Punjab, for example, the licensing system had been introduced with success and without any opposition on the part of the people. He thought that after the discussion which had taken place the hon. Gentleman would probably not divide, and that the House would be satisfied of the intention of Her Majesty's Government to relieve the Supreme Government of that minute control over the local Governments of India which had hitherto been exercised. The effect would be to give the local Governments more power and more responsibility; and, so far from expecting extravagance to follow the exercise of power and responsibility he was convinced more inquiry would be made into every branch of expenditure. He cordially concurred with the hon. Member for Perth (Mr. Kinnaird) in regretting that the hon. Member for Inverness-shire (Mr. Baillie) should have introduced a reference to the administration in the Punjab, and more especially an attack on a most distinguished man—Sir John Lawrence. The statement of the hon. Member was that the policy in the Punjab caused the insurrection, and he inferred that Sir John Lawrence was responsible for the disposition of the troops at the time of the mutiny. Sir John Lawrence was no more responsible for the disposition of the troops at Delhi and Cawnpore than the hon. Member himself. Delhi and Cawnpore were not in his jurisdiction, and if any one were to blame for there being no more troops at those places at the time of the insurrection it was certainly not Sir John Lawrence.

However humbly connected he might be with Indian affairs, he felt it incumbent on him to say that if there was one man more than another who deserved—not thanks, for the thanks of Parliament had been given, but honour, it was Sir John Lawrence. Instead of the policy in the Punjab being the cause of the insurrection it was the policy of Sir John Lawrence which more perhaps than any other cause was the means, under God, of saving India in those critical times. It was owing to the loyalty of the people of the Punjab and the affection and cordial assistance of the neighbouring Native Princes that Sir John Lawrence was able so to strengthen the force before Delhi as to give success to the British arms. He was sure there was no Gentleman in the House except the hon. Member who would have coupled the name of Sir John Lawrence with the insurrection not only without one word of praise but with a censure which was not in the slightest degree deserved. The hon. Gentleman referred to the India Act of last year in a manner which, considering the vote he gave, and the position which he filled when that Act passed was extraordinary; and he also attacked, in very wide terms, the conduct of our countrymen in India. The hon. Gentleman had been completely answered by the hon. and gallant Member for Ludlow (Colonel P. Herbert), and he would only add that, in his opinion, the hon. Gentleman would have done well to have listened with more attention to a speech delivered last year by the noble Lord the late Secretary of State, under whom he served, as he would then have probably avoided statements which there was no evidence to support.

MR. DANBY SEYMOUR said, it certainly was an extraordinary proceeding for the Legislative Council even to entertain a finance Bill containing such exceptions as those referred to by the hon. Member who moved the Resolution. The Secretary of State for India indeed had stated that it was not true that in the first Licensing Bill the Indian Council had exempted themselves and the officials of Calcutta. The fact was, however, asserted in the Petition recently presented to that House from the merchants and other Europeans in Calcutta. The right hon. Gentleman had also said that the licensing tax was only the continuation of an old impost to which the people of India were accustomed, and which they extremely liked. Certainly the hon. and gallant Member for Aberdeen

plained, the voter can always be connected with his vote before an Election Committee, and in other respects the proceedings are identical with ours in England. In one of these cases the member was accused of treating, and he was unseated. In the other, I think, some two or three voters were bribed; and this also was proved without difficulty. There was also at the last general election a complaint of intimidation; and this undoubtedly existed, and arose from the notorious and deep-seated religious animosity in a rural district between the Roman Catholics and Presbyterians, which no system of voting could have concealed or suppressed. But, as a whole, elections have been conducted with a regularity and quiet altogether unknown before; and this in a population far more excitable, and during the agitation of questions far more exciting, than you have in this country.

I admit, Sir, that the Ballot has its weak points. I have no wish to conceal from the House what I have myself observed to its disadvantage, and I will state them to you candidly. It is unfavourable to candidates against whom local or private prejudices exist, prejudices which, with open voting, would be often concealed; and it unquestionably works better in a constituency represented by one than by more members. In the latter case, as the state of the poll is not known through the day, decided partizans of individual candidates are induced to plump rather than to vote for the whole list of their own party, when it is expected that the contest will be close; although with open voting they might have no reason, and indeed would be ashamed, to do so. I remember that at the first election for the city of Melbourne under the Ballot, although there were ten candidates and five members to be returned, the average number of votes given by each elector was barely over two. By this defect less prominent men are frequently placed at a disadvantage when standing with leaders, although their party may have a small majority on the roll; an inconvenience easily cured by subdividing the electoral districts and giving to none more than one, or at most two, members. But on the other hand, and for precisely the same reason, the Ballot altogether puts a stop to what I will call afternoon bribery. I allude to what many borough Members, who have had the misfortune of being engaged in a close contest, must know well,—the temptation to bribe arising from organisations of corrupt electors, who at two, three, or half-past three o'clock in the afternoon offer themselves to the best bidder at prices which rise as the poll approaches its close. This the Ballot manifestly intends to stop for as the state of the poll cannot be known through the day, a vote is as valuable at half-past eight in the morning as at half-past three in the afternoon; and in practice it has been found, that by thus removing all the food for excitement, and by reducing the value of unpollled votes, bribery, on the day of polling, at least becomes useless and obsolete. In this respect the success of the Ballot in Australia is unquestioned by its most determined opponents.

I trust that the hon. member has formed a venture to discuss the merits of the fact, considering many ideas to you, politics have been morbid or have been corrupted to the degree which he says. They lie table; as we have the Ballot be at any rate we need endeavour and has community, the most were present and the bring about. I say it is of society and of our constitution, to be by experiment, under our own eyes, the problem in political science, which cannot in any other way be satisfactorily solved. When the advocates of the Ballot, instead of demanding it for universal adoption, generously offer to abide by the result of its trial on such constituencies as Gloucester and Wakefield, it is, I will not say unjust, but impolitic in its opponents to decline the experiment. For my part, I hope the House will agree to give practical application

THE FINANCIAL STATEMENT.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, that perhaps it would be convenient that he should inform the House that he had that evening received a communication from his

MR. PEASE said, that to prohibit candidates in counties from conveying voters to the poll would practically disfranchise many poor electors in outlying districts. He hoped, therefore, that the Bill would be narrowly watched by county Members.

say 'understood figures as well as any man in England'—had the opportunity of seeing the subjoined account, which Mr. Lovegrove produced on the occasion of its final settlement in August, 1857. After this very candid evidence, given by a gentleman who, as ex-Lord Mayor and a member of the Stock-Exchange, must be supposed to know something of figures, the Commissioners still gave him a certificate of indemnity; but in summing up they found that W. P. Price and Charles J. Monk were not privy to or cognizant of the corrupt practices which they declared had prevailed extensively at the election of 1859. With regard to Sir R. Carden they were altogether silent. Finally, they reported that "corrupt practices have for a long period prevailed at contested elections for Members to serve in Parliament for the city of Gloucester." What was the remedy which was proposed for this state of things by the Government, or by hon. Gentlemen on the opposite side of the House? The proposals which they had yet heard were confined to making the Corrupt Practices Act more stringent. One hon. and learned Gentleman, the Member for Nottingham (Mr. Mellor) proposed to make bribery a misdemeanour, punishable with imprisonment and hard labour; and another hon. and learned Gentleman (Sir F. Kelly) proposed that if this were insufficient the sentence should be changed to penal servitude. The case of Wakefield likewise went to show that some step on the part of the Legislature was imperatively called for. The freemen, to the extent of some 300 or 400, had been greatly blamed in the Gloucester report—they strongly suspected that the freemen were very often made the scapegoats for the iniquities of other persons; but in the case of Wakefield there could be no such allegation, that borough having been called into existence by the Reform Act of 1832. The Commissioners stated that at the last election Mr. Leatham, the Liberal candidate, spent at least £3,900, of which only £478 passed through the auditor's account, and the rest was disbursed in illegal payments; that Mr. Leatham provided the money with the intention that part of it at least should be employed in bribery and corruption, and that at least between £1,800 and £1,900 was expended in bribery. They found that Mr. Charlesworth, the Conservative candidate, spent £4,150, of which only £652 passed through the auditor's hands, and that £1,600 at least was expended in bribery. They also stated that Mr. Charlesworth having provided the fund out of which the bribery, in fact, was afterwards carried on in his behalf, designedly abstained up to the election from inquiring as to the manner in which that fund was being employed, having before the election the means of knowing and good grounds to suspect the manner of its disposal. The Commissioners added that ninety-eight persons were guilty of bribery in respect of the votes of other persons, that eighty-six persons were guilty of bribery in respect of their own votes, and that twelve others were guilty of bribery not on side only, but on both. He thought those twelve men were very likely the most honest men of all. One of the agents gave it as his opinion that with the Ballot, bribery at Wakefield would cease. The Commissioners, however, found that it was generally anticipated by the partizans on both sides, for some time before the election, that recourse would be had to bribery by their respective opponents; and they added—

"That the fact that bribery was being carried on on both sides was before the election a matter of common notoriety throughout the borough, and excited but a scanty measure of disapprobation even on the parts of those who did not actually join in the work of corruption."

That was the state of moral feeling at Wakefield just before the election; and he (Mr. Duncombe) wished to know, when it was stated that the fact that bribery was being committed on both sides "excited but a scanty measure of disapprobation" among the upper and middle classes of the inhabitants, how it could be any matter of surprise that the humbler orders should have accepted bribes. The Commissioners found, lastly—

"Having regard to the length of time before the election at which the preparations for the work of corruption were commenced, to the large proportion (142 out of 886) of the whole constituency engaged in corrupt practices and guilty of bribery, to the number of persons (including fifty-six, themselves electors) who voluntarily joined in the work of offering and giving bribes, to the zeal and skill they exhibited, to the readiness with which their services were received and their acts adopted, to the open way in which bribery was carried on by the canvassers and discussed among all classes, and to the manner in which the voters received and bargained with the canvassers on both sides,—that large numbers of the electors were then not for the first time engaged in the like operations of gross corruption."

Wakefield was a borough that was called into existence under the Reform Act. The House would probably think, with him, that the electors had made up for lost time in not being sooner admitted to the exercise of the franchise, and that in the matter of corruption they were more than a match for some of the older constituencies. He wanted to know what was the remedy of the House for such a state of things. Were they going to make the Corrupt Practices Act more stringent, when they found that, in places such as Wakefield, open and notorious bribery "excited even among the upper and middle classes of the inhabitants but a scanty measure of disapprobation." He submitted that the House ought to have recourse to a measure such as he was now asking for leave to introduce. They might limit its operation to one, two, or three elections; but let them at all events make the experiment. If it failed, they would be only just where they were. But if it succeeded, they would have the satisfaction of knowing that they had checked, if not altogether crushed, that system of bribery and intimidation which was a disgrace to our representative system.

"That leave be given to bring in a Bill to make provision that, at the Election of Members to serve in Parliament for the City of Gloucester and Borough of Wakefield, the Electors thereof give their Votes by way of Ballot."

SIR GEORGE LEWIS: A short time ago I had occasion to ask the House to agree to a Motion for not issuing writs to these two boroughs of Gloucester and Wakefield without seven days' notice being previously given. That Motion was agreed to by the House, and the effect of it was that the writs for those two boroughs were to be suspended without due notice was given of the intention to move that they be issued. Upon that Motion some debate ensued. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright) addressed himself generally to the corrupt practices reported to have taken place in those boroughs and expressed an opinion that it would be desirable to punish the electors there with the suspension of their electoral privilege for a certain number of years, or at all events for a single Parliament. I did not express any opinion on that proposal; but the hon. Gentleman the Member for Finsbury now makes a Motion which in its tendency is diametrically opposed to the suggestion then made. His Motion contemplates the immediate issue of these writs,

It assumes that the provisional measure taken by the House should not be acted on; that the writs should be issued; that when the elections take place an exceptional mode of voting should be introduced in those two boroughs, and that the votes should be taken secretly, and by way of Ballot. I am not prepared immediately—even if I were favourable to the general plan of voting by Ballot—to give my vote in favour of this narrow and exceptional measure. If the system of secret voting be good, why is it to be applied as a penal measure to those two boroughs exclusively? By the Motion before the House it is distinctly applied as a measure of punishment. ["No, no!"] I will not quarrel about the word "punishment;" but what is the effect of the Motion? It was proposed a short time ago to visit those two boroughs with suspension of the electoral privilege. The hon. Gentleman says, "Don't do that, but apply to them as an exception—not as a general measure, or leading to a general measure—vote by Ballot." If that be not a punishment, it is at all events a visitation upon them. There is great difficulty in distinguishing between this and a penal measure. But if the measure of vote by Ballot is good let it be applied simultaneously all over the country. If, on the other hand, it is to be regarded as something exceptional and penal, do not apply it at once to those two boroughs. Let them be the subjects of a more deliberate investigation, and let us consider whether some other means may not be found of subjecting them to penal consequences. Further, if we consider it as a local and limited remedy, instead of a punishment, is secret voting, even in the view of its more strenuous advocates, fitted for this particular mode of electoral corruption? I have always understood that the particular electoral vice to which the Ballot has been applied, and for which it is now propounded as a remedy, is not bribery but intimidation. [Cries of "Both!"] If the voter could effectually maintain his secret—a point about which I confess I entertain the greatest doubt—the system might lay claim to the merits ascribed to it by its advocates; but we know in that country where the system of voting by ballot has been in operation for the longest time—where it has had the widest trial, and where the institutions and character of the people most resemble that of the people of this country—I mean the United States—has not led to the practical preservation of the secret of the voter. It has often been the subject of discussion in this House, and I repeat, that the testimony of all whose opinions and statements are worthy of any consideration, and who have described the state of things in America, has concurred and does concur in affirming that the mode of voting in that country is not a system of secrecy. I defy any Member of this House to produce any valid testimony in contradiction of that position. No doubt the Ballot may get rid of some of the incidents of our system; it may get rid of our poll; it may get rid of the authentic register of votes; but it does not preserve the secrecy of the voter. If it does not do this, can it be contended, with any plausibility, that it will render bribery impossible, or even difficult? We know that in the United States, notwithstanding their larger constituencies, bribery does prevail to a considerable extent. How far the Ballot would be an effectual preventive against intimidation, by far the most plausible and solid ground on which it can be defended is a question we are not now called on to discuss. Intimidation is not reported as one of the prevalent vices at the Wakefield and Gloucester elections. The evil pointed out by the reports of the Commissions was bribery, and I cannot understand, nor did I collect from the speech of the hon Member for Finsbury, how the Ballot would furnish any effectual remedy for bribery. It might, on the contrary, be argued with considerable plausibility that secret voting would render bribery not more difficult, while it would insure impunity to the persons by whom it was committed. But without going into the general question, I think this experiment is inexpedient. If the Ballot is a preservative against bribery and intimidation, are you justified in stopping at two boroughs. If, on the other hand, you wish to deal in an exceptional manner with them and inflict some penalty for their abuse of their electoral privileges as you have done on Sudbury and other places, the success of the present Motion will preclude us hereafter from any proper consideration of the subject, and anticipate the decision the House might come to on this difficult question. I shall give my vote for these reasons against the Motion.

MR. FRANK CROSSLEY said, when the Ballot was proposed as a general measure the right hon. Gentleman had uniformly opposed it. Now they had proposed to limit it to the two worst boroughs among the cases that had come before them; the right hon. Gentleman opposed that Motion also, and said, Do not try it on those two bad boroughs alone; apply it generally. But if the right hon. Gentleman had so little faith in the Ballot, why not let them try it in this small way, and see if it would not answer? The right hon. Gentleman was illogical in his argument. If the Ballot were tried on a small scale and did not answer, it would be a stronger argument against applying it generally. There was a Gentleman, a Member of that House, Mr. Childers, who had himself been elected by ballot in Australia, who had filled the office of Chancellor of the Exchequer in Victoria, and who could tell the right hon. Gentleman that it was possible to vote by Ballot with perfect secrecy; and, if a scrutiny should be demanded, it could be shown how every man had voted. ["Oh!"] He could assure those who received this statement with some degree of incredulity that till a scrutiny took place the Ballot vote was quite secret; if a scrutiny was required the secrecy was at an end, and it was known how every man had voted. If hon. Gentlemen were in earnest in condemning bribery and intimidation, they could have no objection to vote with the hon. Member for Finsbury.

MR. A. MILLS said, the perusal of the evidence given before the Wakefield and Gloucester Commissions had convinced him that they would not be justified in trying this experiment. The impression he had derived from their Reports differed widely from that of the hon. Member for Finsbury. The conclusion he drew from the evidence was this, that as long as there were Gentlemen ambitious of becoming Members of Parliament, and yet contented to represent nothing but strong beer and bank notes, no possible law, enactment, or machinery that could be devised by the House of Commons would prevent bribery and corruption at elections. No fact disclosed by the Reports of the Commissions appeared to shake this conclusion. So long as public opinion sanctioned the present system, all attempts to stop bribery would be utterly futile. The only remedy then was in a more elevated state of public feeling. The hon. Member for Finsbury, Mr. T. Duncombe, asked them to try the Ballot in these boroughs as an experiment, but the experiment had been tried; not long ago there was a contested election for the borough of Reigate. There were four or five Liberal candidates, and it was agreed that they should submit their claims to a sort of preliminary Ballot of the electors of their party. They did so, and one of the candidates who was rejected by it afterwards published an address to the electors, in which he distinctly stated that irregular and improper means had been resorted to to influence the result and secure the election. The Ballot had been for twenty-four years propounded to Parliament, and had been the subject of eighteen or twenty divisions in the House. It was now sought to apply it in a homoeopathic form—he did not know whether as a remedy or a penalty, but professedly for the purpose of trying whether it would succeed on a large scale. They knew that it had been tried in other countries. The Ballot had produced an iron despotism in France, and had not put an end to intimidation and bribery in the United States. He had been informed by a noble Lord not then in the House (Viscount Bury) that while in America a member of Congress had shown him his poll-book, a large octavo volume, containing the names of 25,000 electors, with a statement of how each man had voted during a period of ten years, and who had remained neutral. That was the system which it was proposed to introduce in this country. With respect to intimidation, public opinion had already wrought a vast change for the better since the days when Mr. Grote first brought this question under the notice of Parliament. In the face of an enlightened public opinion, it now required more courage to intimidate than to resist intimidation. He could only say that if any one would point out to him any country in the world where the system of the Ballot had acted as a preventive of bribery and intimidation he would support it, but until then he should continue to believe that the best remedy for these evils was to be found in a more elevated condition of public opinion.

Mr. ROUPELL said, that as one who was present at the Reigate case referred to by the hon. Gentleman who last spoke, he must contend that what then took place merely tended to show that the right system was not tried in the first instance. The Ballot meant secret voting, and anything by which secret voting was not assured was not the Ballot. The first experiment made at Reigate was to send a card to each elector with the names of all the candidates inscribed thereon, leaving the elector to strike out all but his chosen candidate. But the consequence was, the weakest candidate bought up most of the tickets.

That was not the Ballot, it was ticket-voting, quite a different thing. A better system was then adopted, that which had been successful in Australia. A card was given to the voter as he entered an outer room, and he wrote upon it the name of the candidate he wished to vote for. [An hon. MEMBER: "Which everybody saw him do."] He was endeavouring to inform the House from what he had himself witnessed, and he could state that this second experiment, wherein the voting was secret, perfectly succeeded, and all the candidates expressed themselves satisfied with the result.

Mr. BENTINCK said, it appeared to him that those hon. Members who were strongly opposed to the Ballot must have been highly gratified by the arguments they had heard adduced that evening in favour of the measure. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Finsbury (Mr. T. Duncombe) said that the House must wish to screen bribery and corruption if it did not adopt his proposal. But he (Mr. Bentinck) contended that the adoption of the hon. Member's Motion would be really screening bribery and corruption. The hon. Member said his plan would prevent a repetition of the late bribery and perjury. It might, indeed, prevent perjury, because there would be no means of detecting the bribery. The hon. Member for Finsbury also said that the electors of Gloucester and Wakefield were in favour of the Ballot. Of course they were. They had been proved to be guilty of the grossest venality and corruption, and as a penalty the new writs had been suspended; but the hon. Member wished to give them a period of ten years' uninterrupted enjoyment of their favourite amusement at the expense of any candidates that might offer themselves. Then, the hon. Member said, if his plan succeeded, it would prove the success of the Ballot. It would be sure to succeed, for once the Ballot system was applied to Wakefield and Gloucester the bribery could be carried on without detection. The right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department was wrong in saying that the hon. Member for Finsbury wished to inflict punishment upon those venal electors. On the contrary, it was a reward which he would bestow upon them. Upon a former occasion he (Mr. Bentinck) had stated, when the Ballot had been brought under the consideration of the House by the hon. Gentleman the Member for Bri

the result of the adoption of the Motion would be to prevent the detection of bribery, and he had suggested that the Bill of the hon. Gentleman should be called "a Bill to prevent the detection of bribery." He had never heard any advocate of the Ballot grapple with this question—how they were to detect or prevent bribery under the system of the Ballot. He wished also to call the attention of the House to the high authority of the noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs, whom he was sorry not to see in his place on the present occasion. That noble Lord followed him in the debate to which he alluded, and, as he found him reported in Hansard, he said he was convinced the argument of the hon. Member for West Norfolk was correct, that under the Ballot candidates would be found to offer £1,000 or £2,000 for their election, without inquiring how it was spent, and that thus more corruption would exist than before. That was the opinion expressed by the noble Lord on that occasion, and he only regretted that he was not present to add his powerful voice in favour of the same view now. But he (Mr. Bentinck) would like to ask whether the House, as at present constituted, was in a condition to take up this question with clean hands? He would like to ask whether there was more guilt in a poor and ignorant man who took £5 for his vote, or in some great and distinguished Statesman, who, abandoning all his former principles, acquired by gross acts of political tergiversation and political profligacy a place in the direction of the affairs of the country with a salary of £5,000 a year. [Cries of "Name."] Name! Why, their name was legion. It appeared to him the poor man only added a unit to swell the majority at a contested election, but that the distinguished public character to whom he had adverted, and who was guilty of the acts he had named, deceived and betrayed millions of his fellow-citizens who, by their confidence in his integrity and the principles he professed had elevated him to the position in which he was enabled to betray them. Was such a man as this fit to sit in judgment on the poor and ignorant fellow who accepted £5 for his vote? Why, it seemed to him very much as if a tiger that had destroyed human life, and ravaged flocks and herds, were to sit in judgment on the predatory habits of a mouse. But as long as the tigers were allowed to range with impunity, it seemed to him that the mice must be let alone. He would offer one other suggestion. The hon. Member for Finsbury was fond of trying experiments. He brought forward this measure avowedly by way of experiment, which, if it succeeded, was to be more widely extended. Now, he would suggest to the hon. Member whether it would not be better to try the experiment upon themselves at first; and he would venture to suggest to the hon. Gentleman that he should bring in a Motion which he (Mr. Bentinck) would be happy to support, that they should test the advantages of vote by Ballot in that House by taking a division by Ballot whether it would be advisable this year to deal with the question of Reform. He thought that would be a very fair way of testing the experiment, and he believed the results of it would somewhat startle the hon. Member for Birmingham and his friends. The proposal of the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Duncombe) was so monstrous that the House could not entertain it, for it would, in fact, confer a reward, where the wish was to inflict a punishment.

Mr. BONHAM-CARTER said, he would not have troubled the House on this occasion, but for the circumstance that, in the year 1853, he had himself made a similar proposition to the House. He did not think the measure had been fairly characterized by the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down. For himself, he considered the proposition wise, just, and temperate. For years they had had a series of beliefs, convictions, and speculations upon this subject, and in the present Session six or seven different ways for dealing with the evil complained of had been proposed. Every hon. Member had his own idea as to the best mode of curing the evil. Some proposed to do so by declarations, some by penal enactments, some by the general adoption of the Ballot, and some by the moderate measure now before the House; but all seemed anxious to find means by which they might set themselves right not only before this country, but before the eyes of Europe. As to the Home Secretary's argument upon the result of the Ballot in America, the voting there was entirely devoid of secrecy, and they could draw no analogy between that which was an open act and that which his hon. Friend (Mr. Duncombe) was trying to render a secret one. The Home Secretary had not once alluded to the successful operation of the Ballot in our own colony of Australia. He was sorry to find that an hon. Member who was elected by the Ballot in Australia, was not present to give the testimony of his experience to the House; but he (Mr. Bonham-Carter) had had an opportunity of speaking the other day with a gentleman who lately held office in Australia—who was, in the first instance, an opponent of the Ballot, but who told him that its influence was very great in preserving order and quiet on the day of election. And this was no small matter. They all knew that it was about half-past three in the afternoon of the polling days that the Blue Lions and the Green Lambs congregated together, and watched when the poll was running close. But by the Ballot they could not tell how the poll was going, and there would, therefore, be no temptation to hold back their votes for the chance of disposing of them at the last minute for, perhaps, £40 or £50 a piece. Then it was said that the Ballot would prevent the detection of bribery. But that was a mistake. It was not necessary to know how a man voted in order to convict the briber, for even under the present system men were found to vote both ways; and it was the corrupt offer that constituted the crime, not the vote in consequence of the offer. Then it was argued that this measure must either be a reward or a punishment. He held that it was neither, but a remedy; and in considering the remedy proposed, the House ought not to forget the number of those electors who gave their votes honestly and fairly, and who sincerely regretted the existence of this corruption. Parliament should lose no opportunity of preventing the corrupt minority from overriding the opinions of the honest majority, and should put every difficulty in the way of their receiving bribes. He did not believe that the Ballot was a panacea for every possible evil that existed; but it would be of use in restraining both intimidation and bribery, and the House would do wisely and safely in giving leave to introduce this Bill. He wished it to be tried as an experiment, and he believed that if it had been tried in 1853, the question would not be under discussion now.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: I wish to state, in a very few words, the reasons why I shall not be able to vote for the Motion of my hon. Friend. I have always opposed the Ballot on general principles. Upon former occasions I have stated at sufficient length the grounds upon which I think that, instead of being an improvement in our electoral system, it, on the contrary, tend to demoralize and degrade our national character and performance of important functions. I cannot, therefore, my hon. Friend, in applying to the Bill that which I think is in itself a poison, know very well that a poison is in very small doses sometimes of use, but I do not think this kind of thing will be at all adapted to the case of my hon. Friend wishes to correct the law were disposed to acquiesce in a proposal for the partial and location of that to which upon general principle I objected, any such disposition removed by the candour or suggestion of my hon. Friend, wishing that valuable communication by him from one of the members of the last election, said that, only now introduce the thin wedge, it would do more to cause of the Ballot generally than years of incessant agitation. I have a perfectly good reason why my hon. Friend who is a sincere advocate of the Ballot should recommend the Motion has made to-night; but he will find that it forms an equally good reason for entertaining different opinions on the general principle, should resist the Motion. Again, with regard to the effect of the measure would be calculated to prevent the prevention of bribery, I must state my opinion there is another consideration which my hon. Friend mentions shows that, so far from correcting the evil of which he complains, the effect of this Bill would be to generalise the corruption. My hon. Friend, in the course of his speech, read an extract from the report of the Commissioners, which stated that electors had been bribed by [Several hon. MEMBERS: Twelve] that makes my case so much stronger for if under a system of open voting we compel every elector to declare how he desires that his vote should be given, men are found who are bribed to vote for opposing candidates, you would not have a system of secret voting, have you? who would be so bribed. In fact, electors who were disposed to vote for opposing candidates at an election would communicate with each by means of a bribe, would accept of a bribe from the opposing candidate, would have no difficulty, at the time, in promising to vote for both.

House some information relative to the nature and working of the Ballot in Australia. At the same time I must throw myself upon the indulgence of hon. Members, not only because I now for the first time address them, but because until within the last half hour I had no idea that I should be called upon to do so. I trust that I shall receive that generous forbearance which, under similar circumstances, has been so often granted; and I anticipate it the more confidently because in the few remarks which I intend to make I shall confine myself to facts within my own personal experience.

in the house ; and if it is its operation, at any rate and simple. But before I Sir, what it is, I will tell you. In the first place it is not Ballot. There is, I think, a popular delusion than that the America has generally had for or its result secrecy in a recently established not for speed. With frequent elections to the Legislatures, but of all kinds ; with almost if not universal suffrage ; and without the we in an older country have been portioning the number of electors, oral voting was impracticable, and came absolutely necessary, and expeditious machinery. The Ballot ; and, although in some cases and within the last few years distinguished from open, secret proposed and even put in operation are only exceptions, and there so far as I can learn, likely to be adopted. This open or secret then, as giving no protection, was not established in Victoria.

Nor, Sir, on the other hand, those systems, which Mr. Stow has offer for the consideration of the meet with favour in Australia, all appeared to us open to the fact that they would afford no impersonation and to the remedy, of bad votes. I have seen a plan had ever been proposed which admitted of a scrutiny before an Election Committee, once given, however bad the mischief was done ; and we were convicted of personation for any other cause were permitted to elect, as there was no means of knowing how his vote was not be struck off. We feel that an extended suffrage, an increased facilities for perjury, whatever system we might adopt, evil would be greatly aggravated. The Ballot in its usual form ; and, therefore, by a very large majority, reject that form.

But we did introduce a system, noxious to neither of the systems I have alluded. And I will now report to the House : premising, in other respect, as to the rights of voters, as to nominations, of expenses and petitions, &c.

plained, the voter can always be connected with his vote before an Election Committee, and in other respects the proceedings are identical with ours in England. In one of these cases the member was accused of treating, and he was unseated. In the other, I think, some two or three voters were bribed; and this also was proved without difficulty. There was also at the last general election a complaint of intimidation; and this undoubtedly existed, and arose from the notorious and deep-seated religious animosity in a rural district between the Roman Catholics and Presbyterians, which no system of voting could have concealed or suppressed. But, as a whole, elections have been conducted with a regularity and quiet altogether unknown before; and this in a population far more excitable, and during the agitation of questions far more exciting, than you have in this country.

I admit, Sir, that the Ballot has its weak points. I have no wish to conceal from the House what I have myself observed to its disadvantage, and I will state them to you candidly. It is unfavourable to candidates against whom local or private prejudices exist, prejudices which, with open voting, would be often concealed; and it unquestionably works better in a constituency represented by one than by more members. In the latter case, as the state of the poll is not known through the day, decided partisans of individual candidates are induced to plump rather than to vote for the whole list of their own party, when it is expected that the contest will be close; although with open voting they might have no reason, and indeed would be ashamed, to do so. I remember that at the first election for the city of Melbourne under the Ballot, although there were ten candidates and five members to be returned, the average number of votes given by each elector was barely over two. By this defect less prominent men are frequently placed at a disadvantage when standing with leaders, although their party may have a small majority on the roll; an inconvenience easily cured by subdividing the electoral districts and giving to none more than one, or at most two, members. But on the other hand, and for precisely the same reason, the Ballot altogether puts a stop to what I will call afternoon bribery. I allude to what many borough Members, who have had the misfortune of being engaged in a close contest, must know well,—the temptation to bribe arising from organizations of corrupt electors, who at two, three, or half-past three o'clock in the afternoon, offer themselves to the best bidder at prices which rise as the poll approaches its close. This the Ballot manifestly intends to stop; for as the state of the poll cannot be known through the day, a vote is as valuable at half-past eight in the morning as at half-past three in the afternoon; and in practice it has been found, that by thus removing all the food for excitement, and by reducing the value of unpolled votes, bribery, on the day of polling, at least, becomes useless and obsolete. In this respect the success of the Ballot in Australia is unquestioned by its most determined opponents.

I trust, Sir, that I have now shown you that the Ballot is not so impracticable as the hon. Member opposite confidently informed us; but I would, in conclusion, venture to allude to the special case under discussion. I take it that the constituencies of Gloucester and Wakefield have, in fact, committed political suicide. Like many instances, which will at once occur to you, of men highly distinguished in politics or science, whose better principles have been momentarily overthrown by some morbid over-excitement, these two boroughs have been brought down, by a small and corrupt minority in their bodies corporate, to the disgrace and the political death which has now justly overtaken them. They lie, as it were, on our dissecting table; and it is for us to deal with them as we think fit. Whether or not the Ballot be un-English and degrading, so far at any rate as their interests are concerned, we need not determine. But if, as I have endeavoured to show, the Ballot may be and has been carried out in a British community, and by the side of British institutions, not only without mischief, but with the most perfect success; if the evils which were predicted of it have been unknown, and the good which it was designed to bring about has been accomplished; then I say it becomes our duty, in the interest of society and of our constitution, to test by experiment, under our own eyes, this problem in political science, which cannot in any other way be satisfactorily solved. When the advocates of the Ballot, instead of demanding it for universal adoption, generously offer to abide by the result of its trial on such constituencies as Gloucester and Wakefield, it is, I will not say unjust, but impolitic in its opponents to decline the experiment. For my part, I hope the House will agree to give practical application to a principle which is dear, not only to the greater part of those who sit on this side, but to the majority of the people; and I shall therefore give the Motion of the hon. Member for Finsbury my most cordial support.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY appealed to the Government, after the speech they had just heard, showing the entire success of the ballot in Australia, to withdraw their opposition to a Motion which was supported by the Liberal party in that House. Everything said by the Home Secretary had been contradicted by what had fallen from the hon. Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers).

MR. T. DUNCOMBE replied, he was sure the House felt exceedingly indebted to the hon. Member for Pontefract for the very able and interesting statement he had made in reference to the Ballot, and he personally begged to thank him for the valuable support he had given to his Motion. With regard to the argument of the noble Lord at the head of the Government, he had only to say that he put this forward as an experiment, and nothing else. He wanted the experiment to be tried, and he used the expression of one of the candidates for Gloucester when he said that he wanted to get in the thin edge of the wedge, hoping that he would soon be able to drive it home. Great measures were not carried in a day. They must proceed by slow degrees. It was thus they carried Jewish emancipation. It was by taking Baron Rothschild from behind the bar and placing him in one of their Committees and to meet the Peers in conference that they were enabled to convince all rational men that the contest was at an end, and the result was, they had now four hon. and distinguished Members of the Jewish persuasion representing in that House large and important constituencies, while the British constitution and the Established Church, which it was said would perish the day a Jew took his seat, stood exactly where they were; and so it would be with their representative system after the Ballot was introduced. Its effect would be equally harmless.

THE FINANCIAL STATEMENT.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, that perhaps it would be convenient that he should inform the House that he had that evening received a communication from his right hon. Friend, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who stated that he felt perfectly competent to be in his place to-morrow and make his financial statement.

CONVEYANCE OF VOTERS, &c.

LEAVE.

MR. COLLIER said, he rose to move for leave to bring in a Bill to prohibit the payment of the expenses of conveying voters to the poll, and to facilitate polling at elections. The provisions of the Bill he proposed to introduce were the same as those of the measure he had brought in last Session, and as that Bill had been read a second time in the last Parliament by a large majority, it was not necessary for him to make a long statement to the House. The state of the law on the subject was that it was lawful to convey a voter to the poll, but it was bribery if money was given for his conveyance. This state of things was clearly absurd, and it was clear that they must either make the payment of these travelling expenses, including the conveyance of voters to the poll, absolutely legal or illegal. He trusted the House would permit him to introduce the Bill and to proceed with it at no distant period. He believed it would have a tendency to insure the purity of elections, or, at all events, do away with some clear and manifest evils of which everybody complained.

MR. COLLINS said, he did not rise to oppose the introduction of the Bill, but to deny the statement of the hon. and learned Gentleman that the payment to voters themselves of the expense of their conveyance to the poll was bribery under the Corrupt Practices Act. The Huddersfield Committee decided last Session that such payment, though it might be a misdemeanour, was not bribery within the meaning of the statute. He should oppose the second reading of the Bill.

MR. PEASE said, that to prohibit candidates in counties from conveying voters to the poll would practically disfranchise many poor electors in outlying districts. He hoped, therefore, that the Bill would be narrowly watched by county Members.

MR. JOHN LOCKE remarked, that whatever the decision of the Huddersfield Committee might have been, the Courts at Westminster had declared that to pay the voters themselves the expense of their conveyance to the poll was bribery.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITHS said, he had a great respect for the Courts at Westminster, but their decisions could not affect what was the end and object of bribery—a seat in that House. The decision of the Huddersfield Committee on the contrary, was one of a practical character, and, therefore, entitled to considerable weight.

LORD JOHN BROWNE expressed the hope that candidates in counties would not be prevented from conveying voters to the poll.

MR. BOOTH suggested that some provision should be made for multiplying polling places.

MR. COLLIER stated that a clause to that effect formed part of the Bill.

MR. LIDDELL said, that this was the third measure for reform of the representation in one shape or another that had been introduced that evening by private Members; and he doubted whether, seeing that the Government were about to introduce a general measure of Parliamentary Reform, the former exercised a wise discretion in bringing forward Bills dealing with small parts of the subject.

Leave given.

Bill to prohibit the payment of the Expenses of conveying Voters to the Poll, and to facilitate polling at Elections, ordered to be brought in by Mr. COLLIER, Mr. MELLOR, and Mr. BAINES.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Friday, February 10, 1860.

ANNEXATION OF SAVOY AND NICE TO FRANCE.—QUESTION.

THE MARQUESS OF NORMANBY said, he wished to obtain an explanation from the noble Earl (Earl Granville) relative to an apparent discrepancy of the Elements as to what was the end and object of the annexation of France. It was his knowledge that there had been a great discrepancy and difference of accounts, and it was necessary that there should be given some statement to furnish what had been said authoritatively, without doubt with the letter for Foreign Office on a previous occasion (of Normanby) to the annexation of their Lordships containing a statement of a French minister in communication with the other House of the House of State of France stated that, as they went, they did the same time communication between the French Elements on the month of July. It was probably made on Government; but of these transactions in the administration of France. A letter from the Belge, with which the French Minister came in that statement given in this statement complete. Now never think of that public opinion sort of communication Minister, as we were apt to be authoritative to letters to newspapers bond fide signatures had no triumph of red one end and they were coming this mode of communication journals represented did so and so; in this country at a later period made by Count Walewski to Lord Cowley, that in consequence of the interference—the active interference—of England for the purpose of procuring the annexation of the Central States of Italy to Piedmont, the Emperor of the French had thought it necessary to revert to the intention of annexing Savoy and Nice to France. He was not going to pronounce any opinion on this new application of the “logic of facts.” The communication went on to state that no doubt what transpired between Count Walewski and Lord Cowley would be communicated to the Government of England; and the letter, speaking in the name of Count Walewski, stated that whenever the matter was presented to both Houses of Parliament, it would be found that these circumstances were accurately stated by him. He would not now pronounce an opinion on the subject, but should be glad to hear that no such circumstance had occurred; because if there was no contradiction, it showed that what was stated in the other House was not a complete account of the whole transaction. Should this statement prove to be correct, and should there have been such a communication between the two Governments at a later period other than that stated by Lord John Russell, the public would not have been in full possession of the facts. If what Count Walewski is supposed to have stated, or to have authorized some one to state, on the subject was correct, there was no person, however much inclined to retain their notions of the disinterested patriotism of the King of Sardinia, who could doubt that the French Government would never have spoken in that way of their projects unless they were already sure, by something that had passed before, that the King of Sardinia was ready to agree to barter away his ancient hereditary dominions and the affections of his subjects for the possessions of another Power, which perhaps were of more value and more gratifying to his personal ambition. In conclusion, he wished to ask whether it was true that the French Government, during the administration of Count Walewski, made any communication to Lord Cowley on the subject of the annexation of Savoy and Nice, subsequent to those which had been stated to have taken place in the other House of Parliament by the Foreign Secretary; and if so, at what period such communication came to the knowledge of the British Government; and whether, supposing any such communication to have taken place, any allusion was made to the policy of the British Government in Central Italy, and as regarded the annexation of Savoy and Nice?

EARL GRANVILLE said, he could not enter into the statements in an anonymous letter in a Belgian newspaper, but he had no hesitation in telling the noble Marquess that Her Majesty's Government had received no official communication of any such communication having been made by Count Walewski to Lord Cowley. At the same time he was not in a position to deny that some conversation might have passed on the subject between the late French Minister for Foreign Affairs and Lord Cowley.

THE MARQUESS OF NORMANBY thought he had laid the ground for explanation, if it so happened that the Foreign Minister of this country refused, or did not consider it consistent with his duty, to present an official communication of what passed between the two Governments; and the account which was offered instead of documents did not agree with the statement of the other party to this transaction, it would be satisfactory to have stated the final purport and effect of any communication that passed between the Ambassador at Paris and the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs on the subject of the annexation of Savoy and Nice.

EARL GREY remarked that his noble Friend (Earl Granville) had told them that there had been no official communication between the French Minister and the British Ambassador at Paris; and he should like to know whether by that their Lordships were to understand merely that there was no written communication—because he for one believed, and he thought their Lordships would agree with him, that any communication of such great public importance made verbally by the French Minister for Foreign Affairs to the British Ambassador was an official communication. Therefore he wished to know whether it was in that sense only that Her Majesty's Government were not informed that this annexation was in contemplation.

LORD WODEHOUSE said, his noble Friend did not mean to rest his answer on there being no written statement. A communication might be made without its being written. The fact was, that there were no despatches, no communication at all of a formal character between the two Governments between the times stated by his noble Friend the Secretary for Foreign Affairs, when he made his statement in July last to the House of Commons, and a recent time, when some further communications had taken place between the French Government and Her Majesty's Government on the subject of Savoy. When his noble Friend said he could not deny that some conversation had passed between Lord Cowley and Count Walewski, all his noble Friend meant to convey was, that between July and January the subject may have been occasionally alluded to in conversation between Count Walewski and Lord Cowley, but there was no official communication of the views of the French Government made by Count Walewski to Lord Cowley, which the latter was bound to transmit to his Government. The subject was, so to speak, dropped between July and January, and his noble Friend the Foreign Secretary had stated most accurately all that had passed on the subject.

EARL GREY said, it had been rumoured that a distinct warning had been given by Count Walewski, that in the event of a certain line of conduct being followed by this country, the measure for the annexation of Savoy would be pressed by the French Government. Was he to understand that such a state of things was generally unfounded?

LORD WODEHOUSE said, that he did not mean to assert that there had been no mention in conversation between Count Walewski and Lord Cowley of the annexation of Savoy from July, when the communication was made to which his noble Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs had alluded in the other House, up to the date of the recent communications between the two Governments on this subject; but that nothing had passed which had been considered by Lord Cowley as matter for a despatch to his Government, and it was therefore strictly correct, as had been stated by his noble Friend (Earl Granville), that no official communications had passed between the two Governments on the subject of Savoy since last July till very recently.

THE MARQUESS OF NORMANBY said, he knew Lord Cowley well enough to be convinced that he would have dealt with anything communicated by Count Walewski as a matter of diplomatic communication. He begged to draw the attention of the Under Secretary of State to the fact that as yet there had been no statement with reference to what was alleged to have passed between Count Walewski and Lord Cowley which might not, in his opinion, if the report were correct, be made the subject of communication. The only denial his noble Friend had made was, that Lord Cowley did not consider any statement made by Count Walewski of a nature to make it a matter of official communication; and if so, the statement attributed to Count Walewski might be erroneous, as far as Lord Cowley was concerned, since it was impossible that a person of Lord Cowley's experience must not have felt that a communication or conversation of a probable change of policy on such an important point notified by the French Minister and based on the objections felt to the conduct of his own Government, was subject-matter for immediate official report on his own part.

ST. GEORGE'S-IN-THE-EAST.

LORD BROUGHAM presented a Petition from the Rev. Bryan King, M.A., Rector of St. George's-in-the-East, complaining of interruption of Divine Service in the Church of St. George's-in-the-East, and praying for relief. With the petitioner he had no acquaintance whatever, but he had been asked to present this petition, and of the truth of its statements he could have no knowledge. But the party had a right to be heard. He should therefore desire that the clerk at the table might read it. This was done. The petitioner, after stating that he had been rector of the parish, which contained a population of some 50,000, for sixteen years, related in some detail what appeared to him the causes of the disturbances in the church, laying particular stress, as an exciting cause, on the appointment of a Sunday afternoon lecturer by the parishioners in 1859. He adverted to the proceedings in the Court of Queen's Bench, arising out of that appointment, and to the unsuccessful mediation of the Bishop of London with a view to the suppression of the disturbances. He also referred to the circumstance of his having had recourse to the Chief Commissioner of Police, Sir Richard Mayne, and to the Home Secretary, to interfere to protect him in the discharge of his sacred duty; that that interference had not been equal to the emergency; and he prayed the House to take such steps as might seem necessary to secure him and those who assisted him in his ministrations from personal violence, and the celebration of Divine Service from interruption. The noble and learned Lord expressed a hope that the Government had made arrangements for putting an end to the repeated desecration of the Church of St. George's-in-the-East and the interruption of the services, which had become an intolerable nuisance to the neighbourhood, and was offensive to the moral feelings of the whole community. His opinion was that the difficulty of dealing with this nuisance was not insuperable, if Sir Richard Mayne would direct the police to enter the church and watch and control the conduct of the disturbers and their tools during the service. At all events the Acts of Parliament should be put in force. He had no doubt the course he recommended was the right one, and that the law, as it now stood, was sufficient for the suppression of the disturbances.

Petition read, and ordered to lie on the Table.

DIVINE SERVICE AT PUBLIC THEATRES.

NOTICE POSTPONED.

VISCOUNT DUNGANNON, who had a notice on the paper,

"To call Attention to the Performance of Divine Service at Sadlers Wells and other Theatres by Clergymen of the Church of England on Sunday Evenings; and to move a Resolution, that such Services, being highly irregular and inconsistent with Order, are calculated to injure rather than advance the Progress of sound religious Principles in the Metropolis and throughout the Country;"

intimated that in consequence of a suggestion that had been made to him, and owing to the interest attached to the proceedings in the other House that evening, he should postpone until Friday, February 24th, his Notice for calling the attention of their Lordships to the performance of Divine Service at Sadler's Wells, and other theatres, by clergymen of the Church of England on Sunday evenings, and concerning which he proposed to move a Resolution to the effect that such services, being highly irregular and inconsistent with order, are calculated to injure rather than advance the progress of sound religious principles in the metropolis and throughout the country. It was a matter of the most serious importance, both as regarded the interests of true religion and the stability of the Church in this country. It was a question on which he thought there ought to be the fullest and freest discussion, both on the part of their Lordships generally, and particularly the right rev. Bench of Bishops; and he therefore would postpone his Motion to the 24th February.

LORD PORTMAN trusted the noble Lord would reconsider his determination to bring this matter forward for discussion between this and the 24th February. No topic was more calculated to disturb the tranquillity and equanimity of their Lordships' House, and he trusted he would reconsider whether it was wise to raise a discussion on the subject.

VISCOUNT DUNGANNON: I am bound distinctly to state that in bringing forward this Motion I conceive I am doing nothing more than making use of my privilege as an independent Peer of Parliament, and that I am endeavouring to discharge my duty as a sincere and honest Churchman; and nothing can induce me to withdraw it.

THE MARQUESS OF WESTMEATH thought the subject altogether had better be left in the hands of the right rev. Prelate of the diocese of London, who, by his great good sense, and the judicious exercise of the powers entrusted to him, had attracted the good feeling and admiration of all the members of the Church of England. It might be safely left in his hands, and he trusted that the Motion would not be persevered in.

VISCOUNT DUNGANNON repeated that he could not withdraw his Motion.

THE EARL OF RODEN concurred in the expediency of not bringing forward the subject for discussion. It involved very delicate questions which would be far better dealt with by the Bishops. He thought it had better be withdrawn.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR observed that if in bringing this Motion forward, it could be shown that its object was to deal with anything in the shape of irreverence or breach of decorum, or anything of which a good Christian had a right to complain, the House and the country would be much obliged to the noble Lord for calling their attention to it and animadverting upon it; but if these services were conducted with piety, propriety, devotion, and decorum, he thought there was no reason why they should be dealt with or interfered with.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY said, he had only to express an opinion in unison with that of the noble Lord who suggested the withdrawal of the Motion. He felt convinced that the noble Viscount who had brought the subject before the House was solely actuated by zeal for religion and reverence of the Church. At the same time it must be borne in mind that if the new system merely attracted by its novelty and curiosity, then alterations would soon cease, and the whole practice would come to a natural end. If, on the contrary, the system was founded on other grounds—was productive of good, and likely to benefit those who greatly needed benefit—he was sure the House would be unwilling to interfere or place an obstacle in the way.

THE BISHOP OF LONDON said, as the noble Marquess had made allusion, in connection with this movement, to himself, he might state that in considering this question he had felt it to be a difficult and a delicate one, but that he had in no respect interfered with it in one way or the other. What had been done had been done by individuals on their own responsibility. He confessed that when the movement was first mentioned it appeared to him to be a sort of incongruity to have services in such places, and he privately expressed an opinion with the view of advising the clergy to be cautious in the matter. It was a very delicate and difficult question, and one on which he was unwilling at present to express an opinion. By doing so he might prevent clergymen from that which in their consciences they felt bound to do. Therefore neither he nor his right rev. Brother of Winchester, in whose diocese the same practices had taken place, had expressed either approbation or disapprobation of the movement.

VISCOUNT DUNGANNON said, he had listened with great attention to the suggestions that had emanated from one he so highly respected as the Archbishop of Canterbury, but he felt a conviction in his own mind that these proceedings were utterly at variance with decency and order, and that therefore he had a duty to discharge from which he would not shrink.

HARBOURS OF REFUGE COMMISSION. QUESTION.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he would beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, whom he was glad to see in his place, Whether it is the intention of Government to take any steps in the present Session with a view to carrying out the recommendations of the Harbours of Refuge Commission?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, it would be difficult for me, within the limits of an ordinary reply, to give to the question of my right hon. Friend the answer which its importance deserves. If he will permit me, I would simply say that Her Majesty's Government have in preparation a measure on the subjects of Harbours of Refuge, and my right hon. Friend, the President of the Board of Trade will take as early an opportunity of explaining their views in regard to it as the pressure of other parts of public business will permit.

MR. GLADSTONE'S MISSION TO THE IONIAN ISLANDS.

QUESTION.

MR. MAGUIRE said, he would beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether he has any objection to produce the papers relating to the Mission of the Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone as High Commissioner to the Ionian Islands; and also, if it is the intention of the Government to produce them, at what time they are likely to be laid on the Table of the House?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Sir, Her Majesty's Government have no intention of laying any papers upon subjects referred to before Parliament; and I do not conceive there is any necessity for their doing so.

ALLOWANCE TO MAJOR-GENERALS.

QUESTION.

SIR HENRY TRACEY said, he wished to put the following question to the Secretary of State for War,—As officers promoted to the rank of Major-General from the Household Cavalry receive £1 9s. 2d. per diem, and Officers promoted to the rank of Major-General from the Infantry of the Line receive £1 5s. per diem, why Cavalry Officers of the Line, promoted to the same rank, and who have been required to attain that rank, to expend for the regulated price of their commission £1,675 more than the sum required as the regutaken to prevent a recurrence of the lamentable scenes which took place in St.

if loss of life should unhappily occur, who will be held responsible?

Mr. HENLEY said that in the early part of the week the Secretary of State for the Home Department was reported to have said,—“The House will understand that the law does not arm the Police with the power of summary interference in cases of noisy disturbances, or interruptions of silence and order during public worship.”
He wished to know whether from that the police or other constables are not authorized and required, when requested by the proper authorities, who are the minister and churchwardens of the church, interrupting public worship, either within or without the church?

Mr. CLIVE said, he would beg leave, in the absence of his right hon. Friend (Sir G. Lewis) who, he regretted to say was unable to be present from indisposition, to answer the three questions which had been put. In reply to the question of the noble Lord (Lord H. Lennox), he had to say that the paragraph in The Times which he had referred to had not escaped the observation of the Home Secretary or of the Chief Commissioner of Police. Upon the appearance of that paragraph Sir Richard Mayne wrote to Mr. Lee to the following effect:—

“I observe in The Times a letter with your signature, in which it is stated that ‘Mr. King was kicked by a man, who easily managed to get away from the crowd. Another man, calling me a name not usually printed, struck me a violent blow on the stomach, in which act the bystanders, with one exception, seemed to sympathize with him.’ I request you will let me know where you were at the time, and whether the assault took place after the service was over—also that you will give as correct a description as you can of the party. It is mentioned in the Police report that Inspector Harrison was called to go to the church, as Mr. King had been assaulted, but Mr. King said he did not know the man who assaulted him.
It was not mentioned to any one or made known to the Police that you were assaulted. I have a report from three of the Police who were in the church in plain clothes, who followed close behind down the aisle, who did not see any assault committed upon you, nor did they hear of it till they saw your letter. If communication had been made to the Police at the time the party would have been taken into custody, and if you will give me information the Police will do all in their power to apprehend him.”

No answer had yet been received to that letter. As to the question of the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Butler) there had been nothing in the disturbances hitherto, so far as he could judge from the reports of the police, to raise any apprehension that loss of life was at all probable. No doubt most improper and indecorous interruptions of the public worship had taken place, but there appeared no necessity for further precautions than those already taken. ["Oh, oh!"] He would be glad if hon. Members would hear him out, and he would tell them what those precautions were. For six successive Sundays the Chief Commissioner of police sent between thirty and forty constables, with a superintendent, to attend the church at all the services. They accordingly attended during part of the month of November and the whole of the month of December, and reported that, although there were interruptions by the shuffling of feet and reading the responses in a disrespectful manner, nothing whatever occurred which they could lay hold of to justify the arrest of any person. As the functions of the police were interrupted, and other duties were neglected, it was thought desirable at the end of the six weeks to put a few men in plain clothes within the building. Since the 1st of January a certain number of men had attended the services, and they also reported that they had been unable to fix on any person who had committed any such outrage as would justify his apprehension. Mr. Inspector Harrison's report, which applied to what took place last Sunday, contained this statement:—

"I beg to report that on Sunday last I was called to the church and informed that Mr. B. King had been assaulted. I saw Mr. King, and asked whether he wished to give any person into custody. He said no; he did not know the man who had assaulted him. At that time Mr. King was surrounded by fifteen or sixteen gentlemen, his personal friends. I heard nothing of an assault on Mr. F. G. Lee, except by his letter in The Times newspaper."

In addition to the body of police within the church a large body were placed outside within a few yards, and the churchwarden was informed that on notice of their being required they were ready to enter. He apprehended that it was not within the duties of the police to suppress manifestations of disapprobation, but that it would undoubtedly be their duty to take into custody any person whom they saw committing an outrage, or assault, or in any way misbehaving himself. With respect to the question as to the laws, the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Henley) was, no doubt, perfectly aware that a police constable could not arrest any person for a common assault unless he witnessed it. The police had, therefore, naturally looked to the churchwarden or any person who was assaulted to give information; of course, had they witnessed the assault they would have taken the person committing it into custody. The churchwarden intimated to the police that they should be at the door to assist him. They were at the door, and when the churchwarden was asked if he wished their interference, the answer was that he did not. The only statute which would authorize a constable to arrest any person was that of Queen Mary, the words of which were directed against any person who should "molest, disturb, vex, trouble, or unlawfully ill-use any preacher or preachers while celebrating mass or any Divine service." A subsequent statute gave no power of arrest, but merely of issuing a summons, upon which the party summoned might be bound in recognizances to keep the peace.

MR. HENLEY said, that as no definite answer had been given to his definite question, he should renew it upon a subsequent evening.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, he wished to know what steps the Government intend taking to prevent a scene of disgraceful riot next Sunday.

MR. CLIVE said, he had already answered that question. The same strong body of police which had been on duty at that church for the last eight or ten weeks would be there again. He did not know whether any hon. Gentleman had anything else to suggest. There would, of course, be also police outside the church and ready to be called in.

PUBLIC-HOUSES AND BEER-HOUSES. QUESTION.

MR. FRANK CROSSLEY said, he would beg to ask whether it is the intention of the Government to bring in a Bill during the present Session respecting Public-houses and Beer-houses.

MR. CLIVE said, the Government had no intention to introduce a Bill on this subject during the present Session.

ATTEMPTED EXCLUSION IN A FREE CHURCH.—QUESTION.

SIR JOHN TRELAWNY said, he wished to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has read in the Report of a Committee on means of Religious Instruction, presented to this House, the evidence of Archdeacon Rushton on a case which he witnessed of "repeated and violent" attempts to turn "a poor devout worshipper" out of a church "professedly free" (Trinity Hulm); and of another case in which only one free seat (and that a bracket in the aisle) was provided in a church which, under an Act of Parliament, ought (as Dr. Rushton states) to have had one-third of its seats free.

MR. CLIVE said, that in answer to the hon. Baronet, he would ask him whether he had read this blue-book (producing a very thick volume). Early next week, no doubt he should be able to answer the question.

VOLUNTEER CORPS (IRELAND).

QUESTION.

MR. M'EVOY said, he would beg to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland whether it is the intention of the Government to introduce a measure for the purpose of repealing the Acts which at present prevent Her Majesty's subjects in Ireland from co-operating in the formation of Volunteer Corps?

MR. CARDWELL stated that Government had no intention of repealing any Acts which at present prevented Her Majesty's subjects in Ireland from co-operating in the formation of Volunteer Corps with their fellow subjects in England and Scotland.

THE TREATY WITH FRANCE.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL appeared at the bar, and on being called by the Speaker, brought up Papers by command.

The CLERK at the table read the title:—"Treaty of Commerce between Her Majesty and the Emperor of the French."

ADJOURNMENT OF THE HOUSE.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: I rise, Sir, to make the usual Motion that this House at its rising do adjourn to Monday, and in doing so I will put it to those hon. Gentlemen who have Notices on the Paper of questions and discussions founded on that Motion whether they will have the goodness to postpone them so as to enable my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer immediately to make his statement of the finances of the year.

Motion agreed to.

THE FINANCIAL STATEMENT.

The House, according to Order, resolved itself into a Committee on the Customs Acts.

MR. MASSEY in the Chair.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER rose and said: *Sir—Public expectation has long marked out the year 1860 as an important epoch in British finance. It has long been well known that in this year, for the first time, we were to receive from a process not of our own creation, a very great relief in respect of our annual payment of interest of the national debt—a relief amounting to no less a sum than £2,146,000—a relief such as we never have known in time past, and such as I am afraid we never shall know in time to come. Besides that relief, other and more recent arrangements have added to the importance of this juncture. A revenue of nearly £12,000,000 a year, levied by duties on tea and sugar, which still retain a portion of the additions made to them on account of the Russian war, is about to lapse absolutely on the 31st of March, unless it should be renewed by Parliament. The income-tax, from which during the year we shall have derived a sum of between £9,000,000 and £10,000,000, is likewise to lapse at the very same time, although an amount not inconsiderable will still remain to be collected in virtue of the law about to expire. And lastly, an event of not less interest than any of these, which has made public feeling thrill from one end of the country to the other—I mean the commercial treaty with France which my noble Friend the Foreign Minister has just laid on the table—rendered it a matter of propriety, almost of absolute necessity, for the Government to request the House to deviate, under the peculiar circumstances of the case, from its usual, its salutary, its constitutional practice of voting the principal charges of the year before they proceed to consider the means of defraying them, and induced the Government to think they would best fulfil their duty by inviting attention on the earliest practicable day to those financial arrangements of the year which are materially affected by the treaty with France, and which, though they reach considerably beyond the limits of that treaty, yet, notwithstanding, can only be examined by the House in a satisfactory manner when examined as a whole.

This must be our apology, if any apology be needed, for asking the House to take into its earnest consideration the matters which I am about to submit to it. And, Sir, every consideration both of gratitude for the kindness of the House to myself and likewise of public duty will ensure that, if I have an extensive field to traverse and many subjects to open and discuss, I shall not, at least, make any wanton trespass on the time and attention of the House. The results of the finance of the last year, inasmuch as it has not positively reached its close, can only be presented in a form founded partly on account and partly on estimate. At the same time they will be given in figures on which the House may place reliance as being for every practical purpose perfectly safe. It is necessary for me here to remind the House that, as is not usually or frequently the case, circumstances have occurred during the latter portion of the present financial year which tend materially to influence its results. The expedition to China has made it necessary to enlarge the proposed military and naval expenditure of the year, even beyond the liberal scale of provision supplied by Parliament in the last Session; and likewise the arrangements coming into force under the commercial treaty with France, in case the provisions of the treaty shall receive the sanction of the House—will act materially upon the Customs revenue for the residue of the year. I will, therefore, Sir, with your permission, first present to the Committee the state of the account as it stood, entirely apart from these disturbing causes, and I will then in a few words show the Committee how, since these causes have come into action, it is at present likely to stand. The results of the year in a financial point of view—at least, so far as receipts are concerned—have been eminently satisfactory. The Customs revenue, which I estimated at £23,850,000, and which I estimated at that amount so lately as the month of July last, will produce—apart from the causes to which I have referred—and I beg the House all along to bear this parenthesis in mind—£24,750,000. The Excise I estimated at £19,310,000; it will produce £19,724,000. The Stamps, however, show a small deficit, having been estimated at £8,100,000, while they will produce only £8,000,000. The Land and Assessed Taxes were estimated at £3,200,000; they will produce the same sum. The Income tax was estimated at £9,940,000; it will produce £9,894,000. The Post-office revenue was estimated at £3,250,000; it will produce that sum. The Crown Lands were estimated at £280,000; they will about fulfil that estimate. The Miscellaneous Revenue was estimated at £1,530,000; it will produce £1,480,000. The general result will be this:—The revenue was estimated to produce £69,460,000, and it would have produced £70,578,000. On the other hand, looking at the side of expenditure, we should have stood as follows:—The interest of the funded and unfunded debt, estimated at £28,600,000, will amount to £28,638,000; the Miscellaneous and Consolidated Fund charges amount to £1,960,000, the sum at which the estimate was taken; the Army was estimated at £13,300,000, and it would, independently of the recent measures, have cost £13,550,000, in consequence of an excess of expenditure handed over from the preceding year. The Navy was estimated at £12,782,000; it would have cost £12,630,000. The expenses of the Civil Service—called miscellaneous—were estimated at £7,825,000; they would have cost £7,700,000. The Revenue Departments were estimated at £4,740,000; they would have cost £4,447,000. The total result is that, whereas the estimated charges of the year were £69,270,000, the total expenditure would have been somewhat less, or £68,953,000. Comparing this expenditure of £68,953,000 with the receipts of £70,578,000, the Committee will perceive that we should have had a surplus of income over expenditure of not less than £1,625,000. That surplus would have been the result of the liberal and wise provisions made by Parliament in the past Session to meet the expenses of the year. As matters now stand, indeed, it will not be available for the reduction of the National Debt, for it has almost entirely been absorbed; yet, nevertheless, it may serve for a good example of the prudence of that rule which always induces this House, when appealed to for the purpose, to provide ample means to meet the public expenditure, inasmuch as Parliament will by means of it be enabled, if it shall think fit, to carry forward measures of great importance without any new financial provision.

But, Sir, after Parliament had adjourned, as I have stated, we had to encounter additional charges; and I come now to what I have called the disturbing causes which have acted on the revenue.

The necessity of making provision for the expedition to China—an expedition to be the bearer, in the first instance, of peaceful remonstrance—cast an addition on the votes for military expenditure, which, together with an excess in the army expenditure in the year 1858-9, stands as follows:—Army, £900,000; Navy, £270,000. Then has arrived the treaty with France. It is very difficult indeed to estimate for so short a time as that which has to pass before March 31st what the results and effects of that treaty will be upon the Customs revenue, more especially as a question may arise with respect to certain payments which it may be requisite to make to a limited class of persons who are affected by some of the peculiar arrangements of that treaty. However, we have assigned what we think an ample amount; and I have therefore to deduct from the estimate which I have submitted to the Committee for the Customs revenue of the current year a sum of £640,000. We, therefore, stand worse than we should have stood by £1,170,000 for additional charges on the army expenditure, and also by £640,000 likely to be lost on our Customs receipts in consequence of the treaty with France. The total of these two is £1,810,000, which, being deducted from the surplus we should have had, would appear to place us on the wrong side of the account. But deliverance has come in from a quarter from which, perhaps, it would not have been expected.

Quod minimè reris, Græci pandetur ab urbe."

A friendly kingdom has undertaken to pay us a debt, and this at the very moment when she herself is engaged in war. Spain, not under any peculiar pressure from us, but with a high sense of honour and duty, not wishing to avail herself of the plea which, I do not hesitate to say, she might under the circumstances have advanced for time, has remitted to us a sum in bills which will shortly come due, of nearly £500,000, of which £250,000 will come to the credit of the revenue before March 31st. And now, Sir, if the Committee will take the trouble to compare the figures, it will be seen that we set out with a probable surplus of £1,625,000; adding to that surplus the £250,000 of which I have spoken, it becomes £1,875,000, against which we have a charge of £1,810,000; a state of the account which will leave the Chancellor of the Exchequer with a surplus—undoubtedly one of the narrowest on record, but still a surplus not a deficit.

This, then, Sir, is the probable state of the account for the present year, ending with the 31st of March. I now proceed to approach the more extensive and more difficult part of the subject—that which relates to the charge and expenditure of the coming year 1860-61.

First, Sir, the estimated charge for the funded and unfunded debt in the coming year is only £26,200,000, which shows a decrease of £2,438,000—a sum considerably larger than the annuities which the reason of—manner declared its intention of appointing, should be enabled to enter on its labours at an early period, and shall prosecute them with such vigour and success as to enable us to carry further the process of retrenchment, I assure the hon. Gentleman who moved, the hon. Member for Birmingham who supported, and the other Members of the majority who carried the Motion for its appointment, that it will be a result acceptable to Her Majesty's Government.

The estimate for the Revenue Departments, standing at £4,700,000 presents an apparent increase of £225,000; but do not suppose that this is a real increase of the charge; it is due, to speak in general terms, to an increase of accommodation in the Post-office Department, which I have no doubt will continue to be fully balanced by the increase of revenue in that branch of the public service. The total amount of the six sums which I have stated to the Committee is £70,100,000.

With respect to one great and conspicuous head of increase—that on the Military and Naval Estimates—it is not my intention at the present to enter into any discussion; but it will be the duty of my right hon. Friend and of my noble Friend who represent those departments respectively, to explain that subject to the Committee at the earliest date, and to lay before them the nature of the special, and, we may hope, in a great degree temporary, causes which have rendered it necessary to make so considerable a demand on the country. Now, Sir, when we look at the estimated income for the coming year, it is a matter of which the first view will hardly be found satisfactory. And I confess I am not sorry that the figures should be such as will at least draw serious attention to the whole subject. For it is well that, in addition to your annual review of the income and expenditure, there should be special junctures with circumstances so marked that you are obliged to institute a deeper and more comprehensive examination, and to consider more at large what is the proper scale both of taxation, and likewise of expenditure, for this great country.

The estimated income for 1861 will be taken by me in the first instance with reference simply to the law as it stands; except that I shall assume that the Committee would, almost as a matter of necessity, think it right to renew the taxes on tea and sugar at rates not less than that which they deliberately adopted in 1853. Pray understand that I am assuming the renewal of these particular duties at what would be called the minimum rate, but I shall assume nothing else beyond what is absolutely given us by the law, so that I may exhibit to the Committee, as fully and as clearly as I can, the nature and the whole extent of the deficit which they will have to supply, in order that they, on their part, may exercise the largest and the freest choice with respect to the means which they may think proper to adopt for that purpose.

Approaching the subject from that point of view, we estimate that the Customs will yield £22,700,000; the Excise, £19,170,000; the Stamps, 8,000,000; and the Taxes, £3,250,000. The Income-tax, that is one half-year still outstanding at the rate of five-pence in the pound, would yield £2,400,000; the Post-office, £3,400,000; the Crown Lands, £280,000; and the Miscellaneous Revenue, 1,500,000. The total of these receipts would be £60,700,000. The total charge which I have exhibited is one of £70,100,000; and the apparent deficit, I need hardly state to the Committee, amounts to £9,400,000.

I am not representing a brilliant state of affairs as respects the revenue and expenditure of the country, nor do I pretend to place on it any such colour. We have a prosperous country, a wealthy country, a country rapidly growing in wealth and power; but the relative state of your revenue and expenditure is such as I have described. And pray observe that in that charge of £70,100,000 we get the benefit of the 2,000,000 and upwards of annuities which will fall in during the year. I am bound, also, to say that I am not in a condition to ask you to do all that might under other circumstances have been desirable. I frankly own that I do not feel myself in a position to propose, as I otherwise might have proposed, that you should make provision for the payment of the sum of £1,000,000, which will be due for Exchequer bonds in November next. Such as it stands, without any such provision, you have the deficit before you.

And now, Sir, it would be perfectly possible for me to close, were it not for the treaty which I have to discuss; it would, at any rate, have been perfectly possible for the House, if such were the view which they entertained, to close the whole account by a very simple, but, I must say, a very rude process. £9,400,000 is wanted. I will suggest to you two modes, by either of which you might have thought fit to supply it. You might have said, or

, we shall keep the tea at their present rates; it would supply a sum of £2,100,000 taken from the less formidable, the sum of £7,300,000. I think the Committee to ob- think with the Govern- ge and ample provision out to propose for the entry is a necessary out- to make good the deficit respective of any treaty ny relief to the people, ent of the commercial ion whatever of taxes af- lustry, even to the extent g. Our ns dated 1853 are to be d, and from that indu- have within the last two efreshed my own recol- computations I find are esented in a very simple ned that we should gain lor of the Exchequer upon revenue in the interval between 1853 and 1861 in the following proportion:— from new taxes then proposed, including the succession tax, £2,549,000; from les- ened charge on account of the national debt, £1,264,000; at the same time we knew that terminable annuities would fall in in 1860 to the amount of £2,146,000. Adding together these three chief sources of relief, they make a sum of £5,959,000, which is as nearly as possible the sum to which the income tax, at the rate of 7d. in the pound, was estimated for the year 1851. The actual estimate was £6,140,000, which, with this sum of £5,959,000 to set against it, we should have been able to surrender. With regard to these calcula- tions, they have suffered some damage; they have suffered considerable damage from what has since occurred. But that damage is not the cause of our not being able to dispense with the income tax. I can show demonstrably that this is not the case. The succession duty failed to produce what we expected of it, partly, or rather mainly, because it was found that by the usual course of succession real pro- perty goes in the direct line in a much greater number of cases than personal pro- perty; so that if £100,000,000 a year in real and settled property came under the succession duty, that amount would not yield the same average of duty as if it had been personal property. I do not now speak of a fact known to the Committee, that only life interest is valued with respect to real property, but, over and above that, real property descending in the direct line from father to son and grandson pays only 1 per cent duty. That course of direct descent prevails in a much greater number of instances in real than in personal pro- perty, and consequently, while the revenue from this source attains its maximum more slowly than we anticipated, that maximum itself will also be lower. At the present moment, for the year 1860-1, we stand worse than we reckoned in 1853 by £1,000,000 on account of the failure of the succession duty. Besides this, instead of being able to apply an annual surplus of revenue towards the extinction of debt, that surplus has been required by the necessities of war, and its application to the diminution of debt was stopped for three or four years. That likewise tended to disturb our calculations. The amount of this surplus may be taken at £320,000. But the most serious item of all was the additional debt contracted on account of the Russian war. It created an additional charge upon us of £1,400,000 per annum. Under these three heads, therefore—the deficiency in the amount of the succession duty, the stoppage of the surplus applicable to the extinction of debt, and the additional charge created by the Russian war—we stand worse than in 1853 by the sum of £2,720,000 a year. But, Sir, that sum has been fully compensated from other sources. The experiment I commenced with a timid hand in 1853, of raising the spirit duties, was again followed up by myself in 1854, and by my successors down to 1858. That increase has added a permanent revenue to the country of perhaps from £1,500,000 to £2,000,000 a year; and if, along with the general productiveness of the revenue, your expenditure had continued to be anything like what it was, you might at this day have done what you please with the income tax. In 1853 the annual expenditure was £52,183,000. To that sum I add on account of the additional debt, £1,400,000, and £4,700,000 for the collection of the revenue; this would make the actual charge £58,283,000. But the estimate of the revenue for the year 1860-61, with the tea duty and the sugar duty each reduced to the minimum as fixed for a time of peace, is not only £58,283,000, it is £60,600,000, leaving a surplus at your disposal, without looking to any removal of the income tax, of £2,317,000, if your expenditure had continued what it was. A larger sum, I need hardly remind the Committee, than the amount of income tax which will still be outstanding on the 1st of April. And now I come to the true explanation of your altered power. It is to be found simply and entirely in the comparison of charge at the respective periods. In 1853 the whole amount voted for Supply and Services of every description, including the Miscellaneous charges on the Consolidated Fund, was £24,279,000—that was the proportion of the public charge or expenditure that was under the control of Parliament. But in 1860-61, instead of £24,279,000, these charges amount to £39,000,000, showing an increase in your expenditure of £14,721,000. This increase is, as nearly as may be, the exact representative of what would be in itself an income tax of 13½d. in the pound. I ask now, Sir, from my learned Friend, whether I have not redeemed my pledge?

Sir, the period at which I address you is a period of so much interest and so much importance that, even at the risk of occupying a few minutes of your time, I wish to dwell a little on the subject of public expenditure, because I admit that my statement thus far, though true, and I hope clear, is an imperfect statement. It would not be fair to speak of the great increase in the expenditure of the country without considering the great extension of the means by which that increase is supported. The country is richer than it was in 1853 in a degree really astonishing. Permit me to lay before the Committee, as well as I can, a criterion by which we may arrive at some idea of the truth with respect to the increase in the wealth of the country; and then we can institute a just comparison between the rate of increase in this wealth and the rate of increase in the public expenditure. The best mode of making an estimate of the rate of increase in the wealth of the country is to resort to the income tax. No other criterion is comparable to it, for, though it may not be an exact index of the truth in this matter, in any one year, yet, as between any one period and another, I believe it is an index on which we may safely rely. But, in taking the income tax as a measure of the income of the country, I beg to object to two out of the five schedules of the tax. Schedule C does not, I think, represent any portion of the wealth of the country in the sense of its productive power. It represents income from the funds, that is to say, a charge imposed upon the property of the country at large, just as a mortgage is imposed upon a particular estate. Schedule E represents the income of the fraternity to which I myself have the honour at present to belong, including the salaries of what are termed officials, that is to say, Ministers and others who are receivers of public allowances. But I do not take an increase in the salaries of these gentlemen as any material augmentation of the wealth of the country. What this House has been about I do not exactly know; I believe there has been a considerable transfer of officers from D to E, which may have imparted to the latter schedule something of a factitious augmentation; assuredly, however, the growth of that most respectable company of salaried gentlemen must have been viewed with delight by all who take an interest in the body. But the test of the wealth of the country by comparison must be taken principally from Schedules A, B, and D. The profits derived from lands and tenements, from all real and moveable property, are included in Schedules

But, besides wine imported from a colony, there is another element affecting the wine revenue, and that is the manufacture of what is called British wine. While the consumption of foreign wine has fallen from an average of 6,225,000 gallons to 5,893,000 gallons, there has been an increase in the manufacture of British wine. British wine—I mean that in the hands of highly respectable manufacturers, and I am not referring at all to what is sold for fraudulent purposes—is made very much with raisins, sugar, and brandy. The duty paid on these materials is reckoned as amounting to 1s. 2d. a gallon. Therefore you have a duty on foreign wine of 5s. 10d. the gallon—on colonial wine of 2s. 11d. the gallon, and on British wine of 1s. 2d. the gallon. The result is that the consumption of foreign wine diminishes, the consumption of colonial wine has increased, and the consumption of British wine has doubled within the last ten years. This case, then, has all the essential characteristics of a trade carried on, and a revenue pinning, under the influence of differential duties. I therefore say that the present wine duty is a protective and differential duty with respect to the three classes which enter into our consumption, namely, foreign, colonial, and British wines, they all paying different rates of duty to the revenue.

Out of the enormous quantity of foreign wine manufactured abroad no doubt it is true that only a small fraction would become available in this country. The great bulk is a wine which an Englishman would not take in exchange for his beer; but it is also true that between that common and coarse wine and the fine wines there are ten thousand intermediate shades, and there is an immense capacity for producing wines fitted for the English market and for the taste of the middle and lower middle classes in this country, which capacity is at present entirely stifled by the operation of the wine duty.

There is a notion gone abroad that there is something fixed and unchanging in an Englishman's taste with respect to wine. You find a great number of people in this country who believe, like an article of Christian faith, that an Englishman is not born to drink French wines. Do what you will, they say; argue with him as you will; reduce your duties as you will; endeavour even to pour the French wine down his throat, but still he will reject it. Well, these are most worthy members of the community; but they form their judgment from the narrow circle of their own experience, and will not condescend for any consideration to look beyond that narrow circle. What they maintain is absolutely the reverse of the truth, for nothing is more certain than the taste of English people at one time for French wine. In earlier periods of our history French wine was the great article of consumption here. Taste is not an immutable, but a mutable thing. If you go back to what an eminent living poet has called

you will find that the most delicate lady in the land did not scruple then to breakfast off beefsteaks and ale. Down to the revolution, French wine was very largely consumed here. I have seen it stated, and have no reason to doubt the assertion, that in 1687 there were imported into this country 3,800,000 gallons of French wine, or nearly two-thirds of the whole quantity of foreign wine which we now consume. How was this consumption subsequently checked and discouraged? By the influence of prohibitive duties. The prohibitive system grew up by degrees, and by degrees the English people were positively punished and starved out of their taste for French wine. But for 100 years, after that the taste itself remained, for when Mr. Pitt made the treaty of 1786, what was the result? According to the interesting paper written by Lord Chelsea, in the year preceding 1786 the import of French wine into England was under 100,000 gallons. In the six years from 1787 to 1792 the import grew to 683,000 gallons. Then, with the outbreak of the war, or not more than two or three years afterwards, a nearly prohibitive, at all events a high differential, duty was imposed, and the average import fell to 161,000 gallons. At that average it remained till 1824, when the differential duty, instead of 4s. 5d. became 2s. 5d., and the consumption rose to 379,000 gallons. I must admit that when the duties were finally equalized in 1830, the consumption of French wine did not increase. It seemed as if by that time, after the pressure of heavy duties for a century and a half, the taste for it was nearly forgotten. It had become the luxury of a very limited class in the community, and of a class the variations of whose tastes are but little controlled by price. But it is remarkable that in conjunction with the very changes of taste which have been proceeding of late years, we may likewise perceive, even under the operation of the present wine duties, and without any fiscal change in their favour, proofs of a growing taste for French wine; for whereas from 1825 to 1830 we only consumed 379,000 gallons a year, and after 1830 that consumption was reduced to something like 310,000 or 315,000 gallons, on the average of the last ten years we have consumed 584,000 gallons; so that both the importation of French wines is absolutely increasing, and the percentage of the total consumption is relatively increasing. Taste, I say, is mutable. It is idle to talk of the taste for port and sherry and the highly brandied wines as fixed and unchangeable. There is a power of unbounded supply of wine if you will only alter your law, and there is a power, I wont say of unbounded demand, but of an enormously increased demand, for this most useful and valuable commodity.

wine, unless he is fortunate enough to live in the immediate neighbourhood of some rich and charitable friend. Consult the medical profession; ask what sort of wine is supplied to boards of guardians in this country; go on board the Queen's ships, and see the wine supplied there. Some time ago I had the honour of being on board Her Majesty's ship Scourge, at a time when an accident had happened to one of the sailors. I went to see the man when he was recovering from the effects of an operation. "What wine do you give him?" I asked. "We give him the wine of our own mess," the surgeon told me; "we cannot give him the wine supplied to the ship." He moreover insisted on my drinking some of the ship wine, and certainly it was with great difficulty I succeeded in accomplishing the operation. Now, this wine had without doubt been taken out of bond, and had paid no duty; but our system of duty vitiates the entire trade, and, except with regard to the higher and most expensive class of wines, makes it almost impossible to obtain a sound or wholesome article. Certainly, Sir, I cannot think that, under those circumstances, the Government can require further justification for making proposals which will lead to an effectual diminution of these duties.

I believe I have now gone through the principal heads of the Commercial Treaty with France. I do not think that the friends of free trade, or those who are anxious respecting the revenue, will find fault with the provisions of that treaty. I believe myself that you never were called upon to make a sacrifice—that is, an immediate sacrifice—of revenue which promised to be more fruitful of good. I believe that the trade which will be created will be immense; and I know very well that the expedition imparted to trade, and the economy brought about in the public establishments by abolishing the duties on manufactured goods, will form results of no common value. Again, everybody appreciates facility of personal intercourse with the Continent, and the changes we propose in our tariff will immensely facilitate that intercourse, by enabling the Customs' authorities to withdraw the greater part of the annoying restraints which are now found necessary.

Sir, I cannot pass from the subject of the French treaty without paying a tribute of respect to two persons at least who have been the main authors of it. I am bound dule A. Schedule B represents the tax levied upon the occupiers of land, and it varies mainly with the amount of rent paid. Schedule D includes the profits derived from trades and professions. I will take two periods; the period from 1842, when we commenced our great career of commercial legislation, to the year 1853, when we closed it—I hope to be renewed—under the pressure of war. I will also take the period from 1853-4 to 1857-58, because it is the last year in which the returns are made up; and I will carry it on for two years by estimate, assuming the same rate of increase to have continued to 1859-60. Now the net amount shown by these three schedules of the income tax conjointly is as follows:—In 1842, £154,000,000; in 1853, £172,000,000; in 1857-8, £191,000,000; and in 1859-60, £200,000,000. The increase in the wealth of the country between the first period and the second was 12 per cent in eleven years; the increase between 1853 and 1860, as thus returned, was 16½ per cent in six years. That undoubtedly shows a very large increase in the wealth of the country. I think it will also be interesting to the Committee to know in what proportions that increase has been distributed between the classes represented by three of the Schedules to which I have referred; for I must say that the statement is one which throws a very considerable light upon the condition of the landed interests, and more especially upon that of our old friend, the farmer. I shall take the period from 1853-4 to 1847-8, a period of four years, for which we have the latest possible returns; and I find that during those four years the income under the head of Schedule D, which embraces the profits on trades and professions, grew from £64,974,000 to £70,703,000, or at the rate of 9 per cent; while that under the head of Schedule A, which represents real and immovable property, grew from £96,129,000 to £106,972,000, or at the rate of 11½ per cent. At the same time, Schedule B—which represents the profits of the farmer, but having, also, no small degree of reference to the rent of the landlord—grew no less than from £11,123,000 to £13,436,000, or at the rate of 19 per cent. That being the case, I rejoice to think that we now live in times when any hon. Gentleman may, if he thinks fit, attend an agricultural dinner, and congratulate his hearers upon the prosperity of their condition without being considered to offer them an insult. I must at the same time observe, lest I should appear to be representing the condition of this particular class in colours too sanguine, that during the period which elapsed between 1842 and 1853, the case was far different with it, inasmuch as Schedule B exhibited during that time, unfortunately, no increase whatever. A change has since taken place, and I am happy to say it is a change which must be satisfactory in the highest degree to the community at large.

Having thus spoken of the increase of wealth in the country, the Committee will, perhaps, permit me very briefly to compare it with the rate of increase in our expenditure. I shall in the first instance compare the growth of wealth with the total expenditure—that is to say, with the whole State as well as the whole local expenditure, as far as the latter can be ascertained; for the local expenditure of the country is likewise beginning to form a very considerable item in our financial calculations, and it shows a disposition to grow to an extent which makes it well worthy of the serious attention of the Committee. I may, in the first place, state that my right hon. Friend the Secretary for the Home Department has been good enough to obtain for me certain returns in connection with this local expenditure, which are trustworthy, although I do not mean my statements will be literally accurate, as they must in part be founded upon estimate. Well, then, to proceed—the gross expenditure of the State was in 1842-3, £55,223,000, and the local expenditure in the three kingdoms was in the same year £13,224,000; making a total, in round numbers, of £68,500,000. In 1853-4 the total State expenditure was £55,769,000, or very nearly the same amount as in 1842-3, and the local expenditure £15,819,000; making together, in round numbers, 71 millions and a half, instead of the 68 millions and a half which was the amount in 1842-3. In the year 1859-60 the gross State expenditure had grown from £55,769,000, which it was in 1853, to £70,123,000. The local expenditure—no doubt actuated by a spirit of honourable rivalry—increased in the same period from £15,819,000, which it was in 1853, to at least £17,458,000. The total expenditure for the year 1859-60 thus reached £87,697,000. It thus appears that in the eleven years from 1842-3 to 1853-4, the expenditure of the country under the two comprehensive heads which I have mentioned, increased at the rate of justice of that doctrine I for

And upon the part of the I do not hesitate to say that, so marked and signal in our story as the year 1860, it is that it is the duty of Parliament some steps in advance in that commercial improvement which, more than any other cause, has to confirm the prosperity of the country, and the security of its industry, under the auspices of the Government whose rule it is our happiness in the present year special we should pursue such a policy which I refer. The first of these is the cessation of the Long Annuity to be told that when a sum of £100 and upwards annually, have hitherto been obliged to contribute to the national debt, comes into our hands, not only remains for us to cast into the great gulf of expenditure, but is swallowed up and to disappear? Is it a mighty engine for the purpose of relief, while for the purposes of such as expenditure is now, relatively unimportant. Applied as a means of relief, you may by its aid bring a thousand blessings over the country into the scale of your expenditure, represents, after all, but the difference between the £13,000,000 which is yearly added to that expenditure and £1,000,000 which you might

The next of these reasons is the state of the tea and sugar duties. They have continued to be increased for years at a rate exceeding what was fixed for time of peace, even while the income tax was reduced from 7d. to 5d. I do not say that we should choose these particular duties for reduction unless we find that a reduction of them will be the best of all means that may be within our power. I do confidently urge that the Government should offer a strong reason should endeavour to afford on the subject a considerable relief, and give effect to the claims of the people, as well as the claims of trade, on which the prosperity of all classes mainly depends. It is another special reason. It is a reason before sitting down to propose to the Committee that they shall limit the expenditure of the year to not less than £1,400,000, which is the proposed taxation of the year, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer year, but which will be obtained by rendering available another portion of the malt credit, and the credit usually given on hops. That may, under our present circumstances, be a salutary measure; but if we are employing in aid of the year extraordinary resources which form no part of its public burdens, that is a reason why we should also include in its arrangements special benefits, and make use of the means thus supplied for carrying forward the great work of public improvement.

But, Sir, I am not satisfied to place this duty on narrow grounds of whatever kind. It is not simply because annuities are falling in—it is not simply because we have considerable funds to be drawn from this source or that. We must look at the question from another point of view. We must take it for granted that for the present we have attained to what may be called a high level of public expenditure, and that we are likely to remain on that high level for some time at least. Is that a reason, or is it not, why we should arrest the process of reforming the commercial legislation of the country? I say that is no reason for stopping—I say more, it is a distinct reason for persevering in that process and carrying it boldly and readily to its completion. Let us, however, glance for a moment at our position. If we were, in the year 1860, to hold our hands, let us consider what aspect our procedure would bear. For seven years, under the pressure of war and of demands for increased expenditure, we have intermitted the course of commercial improvement on which we had entered: we have now arrived at a year of unexampled financial relief as regards the charge of the public debt, a year of which the Ways and Means will be enlarged by special resources, and a year which obliges us to reconsider the existing duties on tea and sugar. If, after such a period of years, on a review of a juncture like the present, we stop in 1860, will it not be supposed that we stop for ever? In truth, if this be not a fitting opportunity for endeavouring to give increased effect to the beneficial principles of your legislation, I, for one, must frankly own I know not when such an opportunity will arise. But, Sir, I come now to the broader view of the truth of the case. Our high taxation is not a reason for stopping short in our commercial reforms; it is a reason why we should persevere in them. For it is by means of these reforms that we are enabled to bear high taxation. What, I ask, has the country done during the last six months? It has paid an income tax, which, during the half-year, was at the rate of 1s. 1d. in the pound. Would that tax, so suddenly imposed, have been borne as it has been borne without discontent, but for the strength which the country has derived from the recent commercial legislation? In stating that this great and sudden augmentation of the income tax has been borne without discontent—[An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear!]—I speak in general terms. Indeed, I now remember that I myself had, about a fortnight ago, a letter addressed to me, complaining of the monstrous injustice and iniquity of the income tax, and proposing that, in consideration thereof, the Chancellor of the Exchequer should be publicly hanged. Of course I do not mean to say there has in no individual case been a murmur; but, upon the whole, speaking with the necessary latitude that must attach to general expressions, I am justified in saying that this high rate of taxation has been borne throughout the country with a most extraordinary, laudable, and honourable forbearance. It was, I think, Lord Londonderry who complained of the people of England as exhibiting an 'ignorant impatience of taxation'; but I think, were he to rise from the dead and again take his place in this House, he would be very much more likely to describe them as distinguished by an ignorant patience of taxation.

I wish, however, Sir, to show more particularly the connection that subsists between commercial reforms, as affecting trade and industry, and the power to pay the high taxes you have imposed. These two subjects are inseparably locked the one in the other. You shall have the demonstration in figures. I again ask you for a moment to attend with me to the experience of two periods. I take the ten years from 1832, the crisis of the Reform Bill, down to 1841, during which our commercial legislation was, upon the whole, stationary; and I take the twelve years from 1842 to 1853, within the circuit of which are comprehended the beneficial changes that Parliament has made. In the ten years from 1832 to 1841 this was the state of things:—You imposed of Customs and Excise duties £2,067,000, and you remitted £3,385,000, exhibiting a balance remitted over and above what you imposed of £1,317,000, or at the rate of no more than £131,000 a year. Now, observe the effect on the state of the revenue. During these ten years the Customs and Excise increased by £1,707,000, or, at the rate of £170,000 a year; while the increase of the export trade was £15,156,000, or at the annual rate of £1,515,000. Let us next take the twelve years from 1842 to 1853. You remitted during that period of Customs and Excise £13,238,000, and imposed £1,029,000, presenting a balance remitted of £12,209,000, or an annual average of £1,017,000. What was the effect on the revenue? The Customs and Excise increased £2,656,000, or at an annual rate of £221,000. When you remitted practically nothing, your Customs revenue, in consequence of the increase of the population, grew at the rate of £170,000 per annum; and when you remitted £1,017,000 a-year, your Customs and Excise revenue grew faster than when you remitted nothing, or next to nothing at all. I ask, is not this a conclusive proof that it is the relaxation and reform of your commercial system which has given to the country the disposition to pay taxes along with the power also which it now possesses to support them? The foreign trade of the country, during the same period, instead of growing at the rate of £1,515,000 a-year, grew at the rate of £4,304,000. I say, then, Sir, without hesitation, that it is the duty of the Legislature, both on account of the special circumstances of the juncture, and likewise, and still more, on the broad ground of general and comprehensive principle, at this time to make considerable remissions; and if that be so, the next question is on what principle you should make them.

When we have arrived at this stage of the question, the subject of the tea and sugar duties may naturally occur to the mind of every one as having a presumptive claim, at any rate, to the first consideration. I am bound, however, to say that these are not the subjects on which it has appeared to the Government that they might operate with the greatest advantage. No doubt the duties on tea and sugar are taxes most desirable to be reduced. They are harmless and beneficial articles—articles of universal consumption, and I trust the time may arrive, and arrive at no distant date, when we may be able to recur to our former standard in regard to these taxes. But, on the other hand, there never was a time when the people were so well able to pay these taxes as now. The increase in the consumption of these articles is rapid, and the revenue is a growing resource. If we are to have a very large amount of expenditure and a very high income tax, the burden will fall on the shoulders of the labouring property, that it is otherwise.

It is not the labouring man who has more share of the burden than will be palpable given to him, rather than in that it will be taken from their

Sir, I take my stand more on this consideration;—the duties on sugar, whatever else they are singly revenue duties. They are not in the system of Casto give relief in the price of the article. But I do not hesitate to say it is a mistake to suppose that the duty of giving benefit to the labouring man simply to operate on the article imposed by them. If you want to increase the amount of good, you should enter on the articles which give maximum of employment. What has brought about the great improvement of late years? you have legislated here and

and principal element in their cost and it is the price their labour is, not the price of cheapened commodities, that forms the main benefit they receive. That is the principle of a sound political economy applicable to commercial legislation, and that is the principle on which we will to-night invite you to proceed.

I may simply state, therefore, in passing, in regard to the tea and sugar duties, that we shall ask Parliament to renew them,—not to renew them for any lengthened period, but only for one year, with the further addition of three months till July, 1861; an addition for which we shall ask on the simple ground that the 1st of April is an inconvenient period, as it restricts too much the time within which Parliament has to consider the question.

Sir J. PAKINGTON: You propose to leave the duties as they are?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I mean to ask for the duties precisely as they now stand; that is, 1s. 5d. per pound on tea, and the duties on sugar, which are classified at various rates on the various descriptions, but which may be represented on the whole as being about 3s. the cwt. above the minimum point at which they stood fixed in 1853.

Having thus far stated to the Committee the conviction of the Government that we ought to have remissions, and large remissions of duty—and further that we ought to have those particular remissions in preference to all others by which we may most effectually act upon the trade and commerce of the country, and upon the demand for the labour of the people—I come now to the question of the commercial treaty with France. And, Sir, I will confidently recommend the adoption of the treaty to the House, as fulfilling and satisfying all the conditions of the most beneficial kind of change in our commercial legislation.

But, perhaps, Sir, as the Committee has not yet had an opportunity of reading the treaty, it may be convenient that I should in the first place state to them very briefly its principal covenants. First, I will take the engagements of France. France engages to reduce the duty on English coal and coke from the 1st of July, 1860; on bar and pig-iron and steel from the 1st of October, 1860; on tools and machinery from the 1st of December, 1860; and on various goods in flax and hemp, including I believe jute,—an article comparatively new in commerce, but one in which a great and very just interest is felt in some important districts,—from the 1st of June, 1861. nant into which France enters. Her second and great engagement is postponed to the 1st of October, 1861. I think it is probably in the knowledge of the Committee that this postponement is stipulated under a pledge given by the Government of France to the classes who suppose themselves to be interested in the maintenance of prohibition. On the 1st of October, then, in the year 1861, France engages to reduce the duties and to take away the prohibitions on all the articles of British production mentioned in a certain list, in such a way that no duty upon any of those articles shall exceed 30 per cent ad valorem. I do not speak of articles of food, which do not materially enter into the treaty; but the list to which I refer, Sir, includes all the staples of British manufacture, whether of yarns, flax, hemp, hair, wool, silk, or cotton—all manufactures of skins, leather, bark, wood, iron and all other metals, glass, stoneware, earthenware, and porcelain. I will not go through the whole list, but I am not aware of any great or material article that is omitted. France also engages to commute these ad valorem duties into rated duties by a separate convention. But if there should be a disagreement as to the terms on which they shall be rated under the convention, then the maximum, chargeable on every class at 30 per cent ad valorem, will be levied at the proper period, not in the form of rated duty, but upon the value, and the value will be determined by the process now in use in the English Customs. That is to say, the importer will declare the value, and it will be in the option of the Custom-house authorities in France to appropriate the article upon paying the price which he has declared, with a per centage added. And I must say that I hold it to be a signal proof of earnestness and liberality on the part of the French Government that it has introduced this administrative regulation into its code, borrowed, as I believe, from our own, for the purpose of disarming suspicion and insuring the efficacious execution of the treaty. There is a further provision, Sir, that the maximum of 30 per cent shall, after a period not exceeding three years, be reduced to a maximum of 25 per cent.

And I may be permitted to remind the Committee that this rule of 30 per cent, to which France is nominally about to pass from a system of prohibition, is the very rule which was adopted, nominally adopted, by the British Parliament when Mr. Hus-kisson was our Minister for trade, and when we first set about making important commercial relaxations. But there is, I am bound to say, this difference between the two cases—that the rule was accompanied in England with such modes of operation that duties far exceeding 30 per cent were, in a multitude of instances, nay, are in many instances to this day, kept alive; whereas, as far as the terms of this instrument go, France has, I think, given us a security that 30 per cent will really be the maximum. And I need hardly observe that if this be the maximum, then, with a system of rated duties, it must happen that, in a great multitude of instances, the duties will be much below that rate on many classes of our manufactured goods.

I come next, Sir, to the English covenants. England engages, with a limited power of exception, which we propose to exercise with respect only to two or three articles, to abolish immediately and totally all duties upon all manufactured goods. There will be a sweep, clean, entire, and absolute, of manufactured goods from the face of the British tariff. She engages to reduce the duty on brandy from 15s. per gallon to the level of the colonial duty—namely, 8s. 2d. per gallon. She engages to reduce immediately the duty on foreign wine. In the treaty it is, of course, French wine which is specified; but it is perfectly understood between France and ourselves that we proceed with regard to the commodities of all countries alike. England engages, then, to reduce the duty on wine from a rate nearly reaching 5s. 10d. to 3s. per gallon. She engages further to reduce that duty from the 1st of April, 1861, to a scale which has reference to the strength of the wine as measured by the quantity of spirit it contains. That scale is as follows:—On all wines in bottles, whatever the strength, and on all wines having 26 degrees and upwards of proof spirit, 2s. per gallon; on wine having 15 and under 26 degrees of proof, 1s. 6d. per gallon; and on wine with less than 15 degrees, 1s. per gallon. The maximum of 40 degrees, beyond which no liquid is admissible as wine will remain without change. A power is also reserved to us of increasing our duty on wine in case we should increase our duty of Excise chargeable on spirits. We have also reserved a general power of augmenting or imposing duty upon purely fiscal considerations. The exercise of this power is subject to the condition that we urge upon any article of French a greater sum than may be a corresponding duty on the of domestic production, to an allowance for any extra and ges to which the English prob- be put in consequence of the gulations of our Inland Revenue

But further, Sir, as respects the charge of subserviency to France, I know that this Treaty may be said to bear a political character. The commercial relations of England with France have always borne a political character. What is the history of the system of prohibitions on the one side and on the other which grew up between this country and France? It was simply this:—That finding yourselves in political estrangement from her at the time of the Revolution, you followed up and confirmed that estrangement, both on the one side and the other, by a system of prohibitory duties. And I do not deny that it was effectual for its end. I do not mean for its economical end. Economically it may, I admit, have been detrimental enough to both countries; but for its political end it was effectual. And because it was effectual I call upon you to legislate now for an opposite end by the exact reverse of that process. And if you desire to knit together in amity those two great nations whose conflicts have often shaken the world, undo for your purpose that which your fathers did for their purpose, and pursue with equal intelligence and consistency an end that is more beneficial. Sir, there was once a time when close relations of amity were established between the Governments of England and France. It was in the reign of the later Stuarts; and it marks a dark spot in our annals, because it was an union formed in a spirit of domineering ambition on the one side, and of base and vile subserviency on the other. But that, Sir, was not an union of the nations; it was an union of the Governments. This is not to be an union of the Governments; it is to be an union of the nations; and I confidently say again, as I have already ventured to say in this House, that there never can be any union between the nations of England and France except an union beneficial to the world, because directly either the one or the other begins to harbour schemes of selfish aggrandisement, that moment the jealousy of its neighbour will powerfully react, and the very fact of their being in harmony will of itself be at all times the most conclusive proof that neither of them can meditate anything which is dangerous to Europe.

There is another class of objections of which I do not complain, but which I hope to remove. There are those who say that a commercial treaty is an abandonment of the principles of free trade. Well, certainly a commercial treaty would be an abandonment of the principles of free trade, in the latitude in which we now employ that phrase, if it involved the recognition of exclusive privileges. In this sense I admit that Mr. Pitt's commercial treaty would, if we had now adopted it in the terms in which it was expressed, have been on our part an abandonment of free trade; but, at the same time, I cannot mention that treaty without saying that I think it was, for the time at which it was made, one of the best and one of the wisest measures ever adopted by Parliament, and has contributed at least as much as any other passage of his brilliant career to the fame of the great statesman who concluded it. We, however, have no exclusive engagements; we have not the pretence of an exclusive engagement. France is perfectly aware that our legislation makes no distinction between one nation and another, and that what we enact for her we shall at the same time enact for all the world.

I am, however, a little surprised at the number and variety of these objections which come rushing from all quarters. It is like the ancient explanation of the physical cause of a storm—all the winds, north, east, west, and south, rushing together:—

"Unâ Euræque Notusque ruunt, creberque procellis Africus."

Sometimes a treaty is an obsolete and antiquated idea; sometimes it is a dangerous innovation. In the view of one class it is an abandonment of free trade. There are also another class of men, of opinions diametrically at variance with these, and those are gentlemen with whom we shall have much difficulty in dealing. These are they who find fault with it—and that I must say is by far the soundest objection, inasmuch as it is unquestionably founded on the facts—because it is an abandonment of the principle of protection. This treaty is an abandonment of the principle of protection. I am not aware of any entangling engagement which it contains; it certainly contains no exclusive privilege, but it is an abandonment of the principle of protection, and a means, I hope complete and efficacious, of sweeping from the statute book the chief relics of that mis-called system which still remain upon it. The fact is, and you will presently see that it is so, that our old friend Protection, who used formerly to dwell in the palaces of the land, and who was dislodged from them some ten or fifteen years ago, has since that period found very comfortable shelter and good living in holes and corners; and you are now invited, if you will have the goodness to concur in the operation, to see whether you cannot likewise eject him from those holes and corners. I told you that we are to remove the duty from all manufactured goods. Now, Sir, there is hardly one of that class of duties which is not, in point of fact, the representative of a strictly protective duty; nay more—and mark my words—in many cases of a prohibitory duty.

Perhaps the best method of giving a summary view of the case will be by my stating to the Committee what will be the financial results of the treaty as it stands. I will not enter into any of the smaller details, and will take three branches of reduction only—the reduction of the duty upon wine, the reduction of that upon brandy, and the abolition of the duties upon manufactured goods. The reduction of the duty upon wine from 5*s.* 10*d.* to 3*s.* per gallon will afford to the consumer a relief of £830,000, and will entail upon the revenue, after allowing for an increase of consumption to the extent of 35 per cent, a loss of £515,000. The reduction of the duty upon brandy from 15*s.* to 8*s.* 2*d.* a gallon will give to the consumer a relief of £446,000, and, assuming that the consumption will be raised to the point at which it stood in 1850, just before the disease of the vine commenced, it will cause a loss of £225,000 to the revenue. Before I give the chief items of manufactured goods I will mention some minor cases, with which we propose to deal for the time as exceptions. There are three small articles the abolition of the duties on which we propose to postpone for a short period, in the meantime reducing it by one-half. One of them is the article cork, which has been the subject of a great deal of debate in this House. I must say that although there never was a stronger apparent case made out for protection, and although, in consequence of the measures which were adopted, there has been a considerable shock to the trade, and a con-

are alarmed at the treaty. Are the manu- facturers of British brandy the guardians of the British revenue? Are the im- porters of Cape wines the guardians of the British revenue? Have the manu- facturers of British wines a peculiar in- terest in the well-being of the exchequer? The manufacturers of Spitalfields, and those of Coventry, who have an incom- parable organ in my right hon. Friend (Mr. Ellice), are most excellent citizens, and no doubt contribute their share to the revenue; but my right hon. Friend will not tell me that their great activity, their speed in rushing up to London, and urging their representations upon this subject, has arisen from their interest in the British revenue. It has arisen from something very different. These gentlemen do not enter my room to tell me that they come there as the guardians of the British revenue; they tell a much more simple and a much more intelligible tale. They say this— that the duties which now stand upon your tariff are, and it is perfectly true, levied upon articles consumed by the rich. But why are they not levied upon articles con- sumed by the middle, the lower middle class, and the poor? Because they will not let them in; because they are pro- hibitory as against those articles. That is the explanation of the whole case. Our manufacturers give over to France the highest qualities under cover of duties, which are as good for their purpose as prohibitions, and reserve for themselves the making of the lower qualities, and the power of exacting from the British con- sumer a higher price than they will be able to obtain if this treaty is confirmed by Parliament. I took the liberty of saying to one of the deputations, "It seems to me this is much the case of the corn law over again." Now do not let there be any mistake. What is wanted is, a higher price than that at which the public can get goods from France. That is the Alpha and Omega, the beginning and the end of it. I asked then, "Is not this the case of the corn law?" The answer was, "Oh dear, no; not the least like the corn law." In fact, there is generally, on the part of the most respectable classes, a desire for the protection of their own business. They show that though they are without excep- tion adherents of free trade, they are not adherents of free trade without exception. They make no secret of it, nor should there be any secret made of it here, that the duties in which they take an interest

Let us now, Sir, proceed to consider some of the circumstances which have rendered it allowable and desirable, in the view of Her Majesty's advisers, to make a special arrangement in this case. I entreat the Committee to look at the present state of the trade between England and France; it is not a little instructive. Consider, in the first place, the relative positions of England and France. It is perfectly true, that France is a foreign country, but she is a foreign country separated from you absolutely by a narrower channel than that which divides you from Ireland; and while nature, or Providence rather, has placed you in the closest proximity, it has also given to these two great countries such diversities of soil, climate, products, and character, that I do not believe you can find, on the face of the world, two other countries which are so constituted for carrying on a beneficial and extended commerce. I believe, indeed, that the prohibitory system subsisting between England and France is but little less unnatural as to every commercial—I think I may add as to every moral and political—result than if you were to revive those prohibitory systems which formerly separated England from Scotland, and Great Britain from Ireland. I shall be told, perhaps, that our system is not prohibitory. And certainly in respect of many articles the statement is a true one, for we have considerable importations from France; but when I remember how much we still practically prohibit, I have no hesitation in saying that, although our system is far better than that of France, yet, on the other hand, it is far indeed from being what it ought to be. And now let us look for a moment at the question on the French side. The doctrine is that we should attend to our own interests, and leave France to manage hers. What, then, is the state of the trade as regards France? In 1858 the total value of exports from England to France—not British exports only, but exports of whatever origin—was £14,821,000. Of that amount the home consumption in France took £10,465,000. A portion of the articles are unenumerated, and I cannot get at the details, but I have obtained the particulars of articles to the value of £9,819,000, about nineteen-twentieths of the whole. Observe how they are distributed. Of this large proportion of the goods sent to France in 1858, amounting to £9,819,000, raw materials, upon which no labour whatever had been employed, and the great bulk of which were not of British origin, but merely passed through our warehouses, were £8,070,000, and half-manufactured articles were £1,060,000. The total amount of manufactures which we send abroad every year is about £130,000,000; but in 1858 our exports of manufactured goods to France were only £688,000. It is worth while to go yet one step further in the analysis. Of that £688,000, £208,000 were for Cashmere shawls, which merely came here in transit, and £217,000 for machinery, which our friends over the water have been pleased to admit under some notion of special advantage. The value of all the other manufactured articles sent from the United Kingdom to France was £263,000. I want to know whether that is a state of things so satisfactory that when we have an opportunity of amending it we should refuse to do so. I understand the statement of the moderate Free Trader who says that half a loaf is better than no bread, that all breaking down of restrictions is good, and that it is wiser to break down our own restrictions and leave those of our neighbour standing if we cannot touch them than to perpetuate both. That is true and reasonable; but I cannot understand those immoderate and unmanageable Free Traders who come from other quarters, many of whom have not long been thus fastidious and jealous on behalf of free trade in its most rigid purity, and who seem to think it is a positive evil to induce our neighbours to break down their restrictions. They do not see that what they condemn is a doubling of the benefit. They think there is a chivalry in free trade, which is degraded if it becomes a matter of bargain, whereas it appears to me that bargain is really the true end and aim of the whole. The only reason why we have not made bargains similar to the present in former years was simply because we could not make them. It was not for want of trying. For four or five years this was almost the chief business of one or more departments of the State, and yet no progress could be made. Why? Because they set out upon a false principle—the principle that the concessions which each party made to the other were not a benefit but an injury to itself. We have not proceeded upon that principle. We have never pretended to France that we were going to inflict injury upon ourselves.

considerable change of its nature and of the course which it takes, the House has nothing to repent. On the contrary, the total consumption of cork wood in the domestic manufacture is much larger now than it was before the duty was reduced. On account of the importance of the present change, however, we propose to give until the 1st of April, 1861, for the reduction of the duty on cork; and we also propose a delay of the changes affecting two other trades, upon the simple ground that they are trades carried on almost entirely by widely-diffused rural labour, to which it is not desirable to give a sudden shock. These are the glove trade and the trade in straw plaiting. In the meantime the duties will be reduced, and next year they will be taken off.

I pass now to state the mode in which the treaty deals with manufactured goods in general. The amount of duty on these articles, which will be abolished, is no less than £432,000. The principal articles are silk manufactures, £270,000; gloves, subject to a short delay, £48,000; artificial flowers, £20,000; watches, £15,000; certain oils, £10,000; musical instruments, £9,000; leather, £9,000; china, £8,000; glass, £7,000, and many others yielding smaller amounts. There are a great number of minor articles of industry produced largely in France, especially in Paris. The total relief to the consumer—that is the gross amount of duty remitted under the French treaty—will be £1,737,000; the loss to the revenue for the first year will probably be £1,190,000. Now, Sir, the objections which are taken to this treaty in the interests of Free Trade will not, I am quite sure, be very long-lived; but there is one objection which turns upon another point, and with which I must endeavour to deal. It is that which tells us that the duties we are about to repeal are, forsooth, revenue duties, and duties which are levied upon luxuries, but which do not affect the poor man. Compassion for the poor man is a very fine feeling, and I should be very sorry to say anything that appeared to depreciate or undervalue so sacred a sentiment, but I must say that it is entirely out of place here. There is not one of these duties that is a revenue duty—no, not one of them. How they work with respect to poor men, how they work with respect to those who are not rich men, we will presently inquire. But if these are revenue duties, it is very curious to notice which are the classes that are alarmed at the treaty. Are the manufacturers of British brandy the guardians of the British revenue? Are the importers of Cape wines the guardians of the British revenue? Have the manufacturers of British wines a peculiar interest in the well-being of the exchequer? The manufacturers of Spitalfields, as those of Coventry, who have an incomparable organ in my right hon. Friend (Mr. Ellice), are most excellent citizens and no doubt contribute their share to the revenue; but my right hon. Friend will not tell me that speed in rushing their representation arisen from the revenue. It is different. They have no room to object as the guardians of the revenue; they tell a more intelligent story that the duties on the tariff are, and upon articles why are they summed by the class, and they do not let them prohibitory as against the explanation of manufacturers highest quality which are as prohibitions, the making of power of ex-sumer a higher to obtain if Parliament. to one of the me this is more over again." mistake. For four or five years this was almost the chief business of one or more departments of the State, and yet no progress could be made. Why? Because they set out upon a false principle—the principle that the concessions which each party made to the other were not a benefit but an injury to itself. We have not proceeded upon that principle. We have never pretended to France that we were going to inflict injury upon ourselves.

We have offered France our best aid in breaking down her own vicious prohibitory system. In doing so, we may have given a greater benefit to France than to ourselves. I shall not attempt to measure it on one side or the other. What we have done is good—nay, doubly good—good for ourselves if France had done nothing at all, doubly good because France has done a great deal. And now, Sir, one word upon our exports to France at a former period. About twenty years ago there was a trade in English manufactured goods with France. It was in linen and linen yarns. In 1842 we greatly reduced our table of Customs duties, not by treaty, and independently of France, but in such a manner as greatly to extend our trade. How did that country reply to us? France was under a very friendly Government at the time, but how did she meet the immense changes we had made in favour of her commerce? She met it by smiting this single branch of trade in British manufactures with prohibitory duties. She raised her duties upon linen yarn, which before 1842 had been from 9 to 12 per cent, to from 13 to 27 per cent. Her duties upon linen cloths, which before 1842 had been from 15 to 23 per cent, were increased to from 20 to 36 per cent. The result may be anticipated. In 1841 we sent to France linen and linen yarns to the amount of £1,090,127, whereas in 1858 we sent only £151,483. Such is the state of trade between England and France; and I confess I am not so well satisfied with it as not to think that it admits of some improvement. As an hon. Friend whom I see opposite said the other day with respect to our wine duties, so I say of our trade with France, it is not in "the best" possible state, but, on the contrary, might be amended with advantage.

I have promised, however, to show what is the real meaning of the allegation urged against the treaty that we are here dealing with revenue duties. Take the article of brandy. I presume nobody will pretend that a duty of 15*s.* upon French brandy, compared with a duty of 8*s.* on British spirits, is a revenue duty. There is indeed an article manufactured in this country which some of us may have been happy or unhappy enough to taste. It is called British brandy. In consequence of the immense price to which French brandy is raised by our duty, which has the effect not only of raising the price of the best French brandies, but of excluding entirely everything but the superior French brandies, our middling and indifferent British brandy comes into the place which is kept empty for it by means of the prohibitory power of our duty. As far as brandy is concerned, therefore, we are not dealing with revenue duties. Can we, then, regard the duties upon silk and wine as revenue duties? The mystery of the wine duty is a very deep one. Here especially we are met by the cry that wine is the rich man's luxury. It is the rich man's luxury, but I shall show presently that those who are not rich are making desperate struggles to get at it, and that, too, with some limited and qualified success, but under grievous discouragement. But wine, forsooth, is the rich man's luxury. Is tea the rich man's luxury? No. It is the poor man's, and, above all, the poor woman's luxury. But I speak in the year 1860. In 1760, tea too was the rich man's luxury. In 1760 there was no more tea consumed per head of the population than there is wine now. In 1760 there were 4,000,000 lb. of tea consumed; now the annual consumption is 76,000,000 lb. The price of tea which is now sold at 3*s.* per lb. was somewhere about that time advertised by the cheap houses at £1 per lb. Wine is the rich man's luxury, and you may make tea, or sugar, or any other article of consumption, the rich man's luxury if you put on it a sufficient weight of duty. By that means you will not only effectually bar the access of the poor man to it, but will reserve to yourselves the proud satisfaction of saying with literal truth, "Our indirect taxes are paid by the rich; none are levied upon articles consumed by the poor."

Let us consider now the necessary operation upon an article like wine of a uniform rate of duty. Wine, I suppose, more than almost anything else that is produced from the earth by the labour of man, varies in quality and price. It is not too much to say that the price of wine runs from 1 up to 100. Upon all qualities we lay the same rate of duty. What is the effect? That we tax even the highest wines somewhat heavily; the next to the highest we tax very heavily indeed, and all except those limited classes we in effect totally and absolutely prohibit. Let me give one illustration from a simpler case than that of wine, which very clearly explains how this matter stands, and let me thus dispose, once for all, of the notion that we are dealing with revenue duties, laid upon the luxuries of a class, and not upon articles wanted for the consumption of the poor. It is the very simple case of gloves, which was stated to me by a most intelligent and respectable deputation, who, as became them, made no secret at all about the matter. Our import duty upon gloves is 3s. 8d. a dozen. We imported in 1859 about 300,000 dozen. The value of the gloves we import is about 24s. a dozen wholesale; the retail price of such articles probably ranges from 30s. to 36s. and upwards. Our duty is something like 15 per cent, which seems very moderate, and enables those who are so disposed to say, "Ah! we do not discourage the importation of French gloves; we merely lay upon them a duty of 15 per cent, simply for the sake of revenue." How does this work? It works in this way, that it causes the French to furnish us with the finer qualities of gloves, while they leave to the British producer the supply of the poorer qualities. Abolish the duty, and you will find that a quantity of gloves would be imported from France, Naples, Germany, and Belgium. They will not be gloves at 24s. a dozen, but gloves at 18s., 15s., 10s., and even, as I am informed, at 6s. a dozen. These lesser-priced gloves cannot pay the duty, for the duty, when applied to gloves of 10s. a dozen, is 37 per cent, and when applied to gloves of 6s. per dozen is 58 per cent; and those gentlemen, whose words I heard with implicit belief, told me distinctly that if this duty were removed a large quantity of gloves would be imported here at 10s. and 12s. the dozen. Therefore the duty is not a revenue duty, but it is a protective duty on the higher qualities, while as regards the bulk of the trade, and as regards the bulk of the British consumers, it is to every practical intent and purpose a duty not of protection but of prohibition. Even so it is with the wine duties. Is that doubted? Let us then see how the wine duties operate as a system of protection. We have heard of Cape wine, and if we visit places much frequented by what may be termed the lower middle classes we see advertisements representing large tuns surrounded by jovial people, with the words Cape port and African sherry written on them. In all probability that is not Cape port or African sherry. Some of those who import Cape port and African sherry know how to make a better use of them. There is a system of promotion and preferment in wines. The African wines are used for mixing with foreign European wines, and, to employ language familiar to my right hon. Friend the Secretary for War, vice the African wine promoted, some new comports are brought forward and delivered to a discerning public, with what results it is not for me to say. The colonial wine has a differential duty in its favour of nearly 3s. a gallon; and, if there really be this great care for the revenue from wine, I beseech those who feel that anxiety to go along with us in reforming the wine duties; for they will find that the decrease in the receipt of duty from year to year would, apart from any treaty with France, but from fiscal considerations, compel them in the course of a few years to reform the wine duties.

To afford the proof of what I have just stated, I take for each period of three years, during the last nine years, the consumption of foreign wine and Cape wine in the United Kingdom. The average of foreign wine consumed in the three years, 1851-3, was 6,225,000 gallons. During the same period the average consumption of colonial wine was 254,000 gallons. In the period of 1854-56 the average consumption of foreign wine was 6,393,000 gallons, being an increase of 168,000 gallons over the previous period. It is worthy of notice that this increase took place when the disease of the vine was at its worst; and I mention this particularly, because, as this represents the consumption of foreign wine during the disease, it shows that the increase which has taken place in the consumption of Cape wine cannot be owing to the disease in the European grape. When that disease was at its worst the consumption of foreign wine increased, as I have already stated, by 168,000 gallons; the average consumption of Cape wine during the same period—1854-56—rose from 254,000 gallons to 298,000 gallons. During the latest term of years—1857-59—the disease of the vine was very much mitigated, but the average consumption of foreign wine showed a decrease of 500,000 gallons as compared with the consumption of 1854-56. The average consumption of foreign wine in 1857-59 was 5,893,000 gallons, while the consumption of the colonial wine had increased by no less than 357,000 gallons, the average consumption in this last period being 655,000 gallons, more than double the consumption of the former triennial period. The colonial wine is, in fact, rapidly displacing the foreign. The present duty is purely a protecting and

But, besides wine imported from a colony, there is another element affecting the wine revenue, and that is the manufacture of what is called British wine. While the consumption of foreign wine has fallen from an average of 6,225,000 gallons to 5,893,000 gallons, there has been an increase in the manufacture of British wine. British wine—I mean that in the hands of highly respectable manufacturers, and I am not referring at all to what is sold for fraudulent purposes—is made very much with raisins, sugar, and brandy. The duty paid on these materials is reckoned as amounting to 1s. 2d. a gallon. Therefore you have a duty on foreign wine of 5s. 10d. the gallon—on colonial wine of 2s. 11d. the gallon, and on British wine of 1s. 2d. the gallon. The result is that the consumption of foreign wine diminishes, the consumption of colonial wine has increased, and the consumption of British wine has doubled within the last ten years. This case, then, has all the essential characteristics of a trade carried on, and a revenue pinning, under the influence of differential duties. I therefore say that the present wine duty is a protective and differential duty with respect to the three classes which enter into our consumption, namely, foreign, colonial, and British wines, they all paying different rates of duty to the revenue.

Out of the enormous quantity of foreign wine manufactured abroad no doubt it is true that only a small fraction would become available in this country. The great bulk is a wine which an Englishman would not take in exchange for his beer; but it is also true that between that common and coarse wine and the fine wines there are ten thousand intermediate shades, and there is an immense capacity for producing wines fitted for the English market and for the taste of the middle and lower middle classes in this country, which capacity is at present entirely stifled by the operation of the wine duty.

There is a notion gone abroad that there is something fixed and unchanging in an Englishman's taste with respect to wine. You find a great number of people in this country who believe, like an article of Christian faith, that an Englishman is not born to drink French wines. Do what you will, they say; argue with him as you will; reduce your duties as you will; endeavour even to pour the French wine down his throat, but still he will reject it. Well, these are most worthy members of the community; but they form their judgment from the narrow circle of their own experience, and will not condescend for any consideration to look beyond that narrow circle. What they maintain is absolutely the reverse of the truth, for nothing is more certain than the taste of English people at one time for French wine. In earlier periods of our history French wine was the great article of consumption here. Taste is not an immutable, but a mutable thing. If you go back to what an eminent living poet has called

you will find that the most delicate lady in the land did not scruple then to breakfast off beefsteaks and ale. Down to the revolution, French wine was very largely consumed here. I have seen it stated, and have no reason to doubt the assertion, that in 1687 there were imported into this country 3,800,000 gallons of French wine, or nearly two-thirds of the whole quantity of foreign wine which we now consume. How was this consumption subsequently checked and discouraged? By the influence of prohibitive duties. The prohibitive system grew up by degrees, and by degrees the English people were positively punished and starved out of their taste for French wine. But for 100 years, after that the taste itself remained, for when Mr. Pitt made the treaty of 1786, what was the result? According to the interesting paper written by Lord Chelsea, in the year preceding 1786 the import of French wine into England was under 100,000 gallons. In the six years from 1787 to 1792 the import grew to 683,000 gallons. Then, with the outbreak of the war, or not more than two or three years afterwards, a nearly prohibitive, at all events a high differential, duty was imposed, and the average import fell to 161,000 gallons. At that average it remained till 1824, when the differential duty, instead of 4s. 5d. became 2s. 5d., and the consumption rose to 379,000 gallons. I must admit that when the duties were finally equalized in 1830, the consumption of French wine did not increase. It seemed as if by that time, after the pressure of heavy duties for a century and a half, the taste for it was nearly forgotten. It had become the luxury of a very limited class in the community, and of a class the variations of whose tastes are but little controlled by price. But it is remarkable that in conjunction with the very changes of taste which have been proceeding of late years, we may likewise perceive, even under the operation of the present wine duties, and without any fiscal change in their favour, proofs of a growing taste for French wine; for whereas from 1825 to 1830 we only consumed 379,000 gallons a year, and after 1830 that consumption was reduced to something like 310,000 or 315,000 gallons, on the average of the last ten years we have consumed 584,000 gallons; so that both the importation of French wines is absolutely increasing, and the percentage of the total consumption is relatively increasing. Taste, I say, is mutable. It is idle to talk of the taste for port and sherry and the highly brandied wines as fixed and unchangeable. There is a power of unbounded supply of wine if you will only alter your law, and there is a power, I would say of unbounded demand, but of an enormously increased demand, for this most useful and valuable commodity.

And now, Sir, I think cause enough has been already shown for an alteration in the present system of wine duties. But I beseech the Committee to remember the immense masses of evil which are connected with that system. Look at the fraud and adulteration to which it gives rise. Many of the houses engaged in the wine trade bear as high a character as any in England; but those gentlemen will tell you of the difficulties they have to encounter in holding their ground against persons of inferior character who are brought into that trade. And why do persons of inferior character embark in it? Because our law invites them to do so. Because the restrictive operation of your tariff is so severe that it affords temptations which they cannot resist to counterfeit the article on which you have laid such heavy duties. That is the way in which the wine duties work; and let me, in concluding my remarks on this subject, ask the Committee to consider yet one thing more. We hear of the rich man's luxuries, and of contemplated reductions of duty upon articles which the poor man does not consume. Now, I make my appeal to the friends of the poor man. There is a time which comes to all of us—the time, I mean, of sickness—when wine becomes a common necessary. What kind of wine is administered to the poor man in this country? We have got a law which makes it impossible for the poor man when he is sick to obtain the comfort and support derived from good wine, unless he is fortunate enough in the immediate neighbourhood of a rich and charitable friend. Can a medical profession; ask what so is supplied to boards of guards in the country; go on board the Queen and see the wine supplied there? At the time ago I had the honour of being on board Her Majesty's ship Scot when an accident had befallen one of the sailors. I went to see him when he was recovering from the effects of an operation. "What wine do you give him?" I asked. "We give him of our own measure," the surgeon answered. "We cannot give him the wine of the ship." He moreover insisted on drinking some of the ship wine, and it was with great difficulty that he succeeded in accomplishing the purpose. Now, this wine had without doubt been taken out of bond, and had paid duty, but our system of duty vitiates the trade, and, except with regard to the higher and most expensive class, makes it almost impossible to obtain a sound or wholesome article. Certainly I cannot think that, under those circumstances, the Government can receive any justification for making alterations which will lead to an effectual reduction of these duties.

I believe I have now gone through the principal heads of the Commerce with France. I do not think I am a friend of free trade, or that I am anxious respecting the revenue, or that I have fault with the provisions of that system. I believe myself that you never will be upon to make a sacrifice—that I am not prepared to make a sacrifice—of revenue for the sake of a trade which I believe to be more fruitful of good than any other. I believe that the trade which will be opened up will be immense; and I know that the expedition imparted to the economy brought about in the establishments by abolishing the duties on manufactured goods, will form no common value. Again, even the facility of personal intercourse with the Continent, and the economy proposed in our tariff will immensate that intercourse, by enabling the authorities to withdraw a part of the annoying restraints now found necessary.

Sir, I cannot pass from the subject of the French treaty without paying a tribute of respect to two persons at least who have been the main authors of it. I to bear this witness at any rate with regard to the Emperor of the French—that he has given the most unequivocal proofs of sincerity and earnestness in the progress of this great work, a work which he has prosecuted with clear-sighted resolution, not doubtless for British purposes, but in the spirit of enlightened patriotism, with a view to commercial reforms at home, and to the advantage and happiness of his own people. With regard to Mr. Cobden, speaking, as I do, at a time when every angry passion has passed away, I cannot help expressing our obligations to him for the labour he has, at no small personal sacrifice, bestowed upon a measure which he, not the least among the apostles of free trade, believes to be one of the greatest triumphs free trade has ever achieved. Rare is the privilege of any man who, having fourteen years ago rendered to his country one signal and splendid service, now again, within the same brief span of life, decorated neither by rank nor title, bearing no mark to distinguish him from the people whom he serves, has been permitted again to perform a great and memorable service to his Sovereign and to his country.

The point to which I have now brought the Committee in this, to them, I fear, laborious and irksome inquiry is this:—I have asked them to sacrifice £1,190,000 of the existing revenue in order to effect a relief to the consumer of, I think, £1,737,000, by giving effect to the provisions of the Treaty with France. That treaty would bring about a sensible reform in the Customs' establishments of the country. At the same time, it would not effect a reform which would have any pretensions to the character of completeness, and there are many other duties still remaining on the tariff of a description which we think calls for the attention of Parliament, and by the reduction or removal of which immense advantage might be conferred upon the country. I have thought it best to separate them entirely from those articles which we deal with by the Treaty, with a view to the convenience of the Committee and their clearer understanding of the whole subject. But this being the state of the case, and the Government wishing to give, as far as may be, the character of completeness to their reform of the Customs—which, indeed, is essential to the attainment of some of the objects in view—I now come to what I may term the supplemental measure of Customs reform.

It is our intention, Sir, to propose to the Committee a further change in the Customs laws, which will entail at first a loss of £910,000, giving at the same time a relief to the consumer of about £1,040,000; but we propose also, in a manner which I will explain to the Committee, to meet the charge of that loss by certain impositions upon trade of a character which I hope will not be deemed exceptionable. I will take these two subjects next. They together form the supplemental part of the Customs reform proposed by the Government.

This second portion of the Customs reform contains many abolitions and some reductions of the duty. I will read the principal abolitions contemplated. But, Sir, at this point my memory reminds me of an omission of which I have been guilty with reference to an important point in the treaty with France—I mean the proposal to give immediate effect to the changes on the English side, notwithstanding the postponement of the changes intended by France. The provision which we have adopted to this effect was not pressed upon us by France; on the contrary, we have reason to believe that she would have given us the time which she was compelled to require for herself, but the arrangement I have stated to the Committee for early change in preference to general postponement, was owing to the deliberate judgment of the English Government that it would be, on the whole, more advantageous to the English people.

Apologizing to the Committee for this omission, I now come to the abolition of duties which forms part of the second or supplementary part of the measure we propose for the alteration of the Customs law. We propose to abolish entirely and immediately the duty on butter, which yields £95,000; the duty on tallow, which yields £87,000; the duty on cheese, which yields £44,000; on oranges and lemons, yielding £32,000; on eggs, £22,000; on nuts, £12,000; on nutmegs, £11,000; paper, £10,000; liquorice, £9,000; dates, £7,000; and various other minor articles, the total of these abolitions amounting to £382,000.

We propose likewise a reduction of duties upon five articles of great importance, one of which strikes at the principal differential duty, except those which we shall, I hope, abolish by the French treaty—namely, the duty on timber. I propose to reduce the duty on timber from 7s. 6d. and 15s. to the colonial rate of 1s. and 2s.

There will be on this article a relief of £400,000 to the consumer, but we reckon on a considerable recovery by increased consumption. The next article, the duty on which I propose to reduce, with the approval of the House, is the duty on currants. There is no article of greater importance to the mass of the community. All those of the labouring classes who are in good circumstances are large consumers of currants. The duty now charged on currants ought to have been reduced many years ago—I mean in 1853; but it was impossible to recommend the change to Parliament at that period in consequence of the almost entire failure of the crop, which made it impracticable to act upon consumption by any reduction of the duty which we might have made. The duty on currants is now 15s. 9d.; we propose to reduce it to 7s. per cwt., which will involve a loss of £170,000. This, however, will in part be compensated by increased consumption. We propose to reduce the duty on raisins from 10s. to 7s.; on figs, from 10s. to 7s. I also propose to reduce a duty with regard to which I shall have to give a further explanation—the duty on hops. I propose to reduce the duty on hops, not immediately, however, but on and after the 1st of January, from 45s. to 14s. The total amount of these reductions will be £650,000, and the abolitions £382,000. There will also be a small article, namely, plaiting, the reduction on which will be postponed, and which will raise the gross loss to £1,035,000, but the increase of consumption will probably reduce this loss, as estimated, to £910,000.

I will presently state the general condition in which these changes, if they are adopted entire, will leave the tariff; but for the present, I will go on to state the mode in which the Government propose to supply the revenue to compensate for the loss that will follow these last-named changes. I am afraid, from the sensation that is expressed, that I may cause some disappointment, for, in point of fact, I am not now going to fill up the great chasm that lay before us a short time ago, but only to deal with the little chasm created by parting with the sum of £910,000. The general principle of the measures I am about to propose will be an extension of a minute kind of taxation, which may be called generally penny taxation. The penny taxation has answered the purpose of assisting the revenue, but has not been unacceptable to the public. It seems to have shown that at least there is of "penny wisdom" that is not folly," for it has been at once productive. We propose to lay goods imported and exported, registration due, a duty which general be charged at the rate of per package. It has often been argued that when the tariff was so many articles, a small duty have been retained to cover the registration for statistics, and of services performed on behalf of the Customs' establishment. The argument of very considerable there has been one argument, of conclusive weight the other has determined successive Governments and Parliaments not to retain it on the tariff, and that is, that if small duties on your tariff, they are charged with nearly all the incidents of duty. They require the same inspection, the same following the same delay, and the same system of accounts, as if you were levying productive duties. But none of these objections apply to the measure I propose. It would be a measure of the simplest kind, levied at the rate of per package, and, on goods in bulk, to the unit under which they are charged. There must be a few cases of articles, such as salt, coals, and coals, as of packages of small value, it will be necessary to alter the unit to prevent the penny from becoming a charge; either with reference to the value, or because, not being small parcels, but by the whole not being warehoused, they give trouble to the Customs. All this, however, will be matter of consideration in the Bill, and it will be for the Government, in the administration of the law, to place the matter under the considered general rules. But the idea it gives of the wealth and this country, that to levy a small duty per package, and a similar duty on goods in bulk, will produce £1,000,000 per year. This will be levied with reference to the goods whatever, without any detention or examination to be taken off the ship's papers as charges incidental to the receipt and dispatch of the ship.

The Committee are aware that the original object of the warehousing system was to enable the importers of goods to obtain two most important advantages—one the postponement of the payment of the duties, and the other to retain for themselves the option to the latest moment between entering the goods for home consumption and entering them for a foreign market. With neither of these do we propose to interfere or to saddle them with any charge whatever. But it has here a consequence of one system of heavy and restrictive duties, particularly with regard to certain articles, such as spirits, and most of all wine, that we should endeavour to mitigate their pressure by a system of expedients. Hence there has grown up a most complicated system of operations of every kind, which are performed in bond at a great disadvantage in respect to delay, in respect to charge upon the Customs establishment by consuming the time of its officers, to the risk of fraud affecting injuriously the owners of the goods, and to the loss of revenue, which is a loss to the country. But great as are these evils, they are some of the necessary results of the state of our law. That state is now reverting to a more moderate range of duties and to a more simple arrangement. It is, therefore, clear that all these extraordinary operations which lie beyond the proper scope of the warehousing system, and were of the nature of additional accommodation, should be subject to some charge. We accordingly propose to fix moderate sums chargeable on all removals, on bottling, on vatting, "fortifying"—I might weary the Committee with the vocabulary of the system—in a word, on all those extra operations which have grown up as excrescences on the warehousing system properly so called. The Committee will, I think, be glad to hear that we hope to find in this method of charge a mode of solving a very difficult question, which has excited a great deal of interest in many important communities. It is known as the question of inland bonding. The great inland towns of this country have always complained that they are excluded from the facilities given sometimes to what are little more than mere hamlets, and in many cases of no importance as measured by trade or population, if they chance to be ports, and this with respect to articles which they do not themselves import. But under the system we propose certain charges will attach to removals in warehouse, whether they are on the coast or in the interior, which will place them all on an equal footing. Of course, I do not mean to say that even with this safeguard which we now propose, the warehousing system can be applied to every town in the country. The Government will have to consider carefully the sufficiency of the accommodation which may be offered, the amount of trade and population, and the probable results to the revenue; but the principle of the plan will be first to return to the country in part the cost of the warehousing establishment, and secondly, to enable them to deal with equity and justice towards the little ports that enjoy these privileges because they happen to be ports within the meaning of the term, and at the same time to enable great communities like Manchester, Birmingham, and other large towns, which are fairly entitled to demand a concession of this kind, to obtain corresponding advantages. By this plan I expect to gain £120,000.

The next change I am about to propose is one upon which it will be desirable that the Committee should give a vote to-night, in conformity with its ordinary practice. I propose to levy a duty of 6s. per cwt. upon chicory or any other vegetable production to be used with coffee, as a protection to the coffee revenue, which has not grown, and which cannot grow as long as an article that assumes the appearance of coffee is admitted free, while coffee itself pays a high duty. It will be requisite that the Customs shall be in a condition to give immediate effect to this Resolution, and I therefore at once hand the Resolution to you, Mr. Massey, as I proceed. I may mention that this enactment will entail the disadvantage of an Excise charge upon home-grown chicory, but that is not a serious matter, because the growth of chicory in this country has almost died out. Some years ago many thousand acres were employed in the growth of chicory, but at the present day the whole quantity under cultivation, so far as I can learn, is under 500 acres. The duty on chicory, together with the improvement of the revenue from coffee, may be expected to yield £90,000 per annum, a sum which will bring up these minor Customs, charges to £510,000.

I will now briefly run over the changes which, with a similar view, we would ask the Committee to adopt in the department of Inland Revenue. A stamp of 1d. on notes of sale of foreign and colonial produce, and on brokers' contract notes, will yield £100,000. A stamp of 3d. on dock warrants is computed to yield £100,000; a reduction of the agreement stamp from 2s. 6d. to 6d., with the repeal of the exemption, under £20, will yield £20,000. The next change which we propose is to give to eating-houses of all descriptions, whether under that name or under the name of pastry-cooks' shops, a licence, for which they will pay at a very low rate, together with the power of taking a licence at their option from the Excise, to be had simply on the payment of a certain sum of money, and subject to no other limitation or restriction except rules of police, for the purpose of authorizing them to sell wine or beer. We think it is essential, in giving effect to the changes in the wine duties, that this sort of facility should be provided in connection with the sale of catables, wherever the trade may be carried on; and we also look on it as a change favourable to sobriety; for the man who can get his glass of wine or beer at the same time with his necessary food in an easy manner is less likely to resort to places whither he would repair for drinking only, and where he would be tempted to indulge to excess. We also propose that by way of restraint, the duty should be doubled upon any such house that keeps open after 12 o'clock at night. Then there are a variety of very limited minor changes with which I am also ashamed to trouble the Committee. One change, however, I will mention. We propose to reduce the duty on game certificates, an alteration which I trust will be satisfactory. Only 34,000 game certificates are taken out every year. The price is very high, and no person can shoot for a day at any period of the season without paying the price of a certificate for the whole season. But the immediate and obvious ground for dealing with this licence, is the notorious fact that vast numbers of persons of almost all classes who do shoot at all, assume to themselves the liberty of shooting without a certificate. We are not able to detect more than some 400 or 500 of them in the course of the year; but I hope that so many will not escape, indeed, that so many will not offend, under the new system. We anticipate that while we shall give relief by this change to those who buy certificates to the amount of £50,000, we shall have no loss, but even a small gain of something like £10,000 a year. Instead of £4 for a certificate for the season, it will be had, if taken out in August, for £3; if taken out on or after the 1st of October, £2; and if taken out on or after the 1st of December, £1.

As respects the measure of the right hon. Gentleman opposite, which was adopted with regard to stamps on cheques, we have not yet had sufficient experience to test its full effects, either fiscally or otherwise; but I think it is quite clear that if it continues, as it is likely to do, at least till we see our way more clearly, there should be no exemption for cheques when the drawer is also the payee. It is not worth while keeping up the distinction, and a small sum will be gained by its abolition. We therefore propose to remove it. The stamp on leases will yield £7,000. All personal estate, passing by will, under general appointment, will become subject to probate duty, which will yield £30,000; and the repeal of the exemption of the conveyances of building societies will give £5,000. The Excise duty on chicory will yield £5,000, and a stamp on extracts from the registers of births, deaths, and marriages £3,000. Lastly, by bringing heritable bonds in Scotland under all the liabilities of personalty on a succession, we shall gain £10,000. I may now sum up. The new cheques under the Customs will give £510,000, which, added to £386,000, the produce of the items of Inland Revenue I have referred to, will give a total of £896,000. The next item on this side of the account will give pleasure to the Committee. It is not a tax, but a saving; and a saving which of all others will, I am sure, be most acceptable to Parliament and to the people. It is a saving for the year on the Customs' Establishment of £50,000, which will be the beginning of a greater saving in consequence of the measures we are going to adopt. There will also be a saving in the department of Inland Revenue, if the measures we propose should be agreed to, of £36,000. There will, therefore, be altogether £86,000 in saving, and £896,000 in taxes, making together £982,000, which will more than replace the revenue we propose to withdraw in the second part of our scheme of commercial amendment.

Let me now once more recall to the Committee the precise point at which we stand. We venture to urge that the country may fairly expect, under the circumstances of the present year, a reduction of the indirect taxes, chosen with the greatest care for the purpose, to an extent something like that which is represented by the amount of difference between the present war duties, so to call them, on tea and sugar, and likewise by the amount of annuities now falling in. The annuities on £2,146,000, and the difference on tea and sugar duties would be represented by nearly the same sum. I mean the country has a right to expect we should proceed to that extent in loss to the revenue, but to a much greater extent in relief to consumers. Of that £2,146,000 we have disposed of about £1,190,000 by the Treaty with France, so far as the plans of the Government are concerned; and by way of supplement to that treaty, we have also proposed a further measure involving the loss of £910,000, with compensation in the shape of new charges and savings to the extent of £982,000. Consequently, there is still about 1,000,000 of remission, which, in the view of the Government, is due to the trade and industry of the country on the principles I have stated. The question remains, where shall that reduction be made?

As we have frankly admitted, we do not think the greatest benefit would be conferred either on the nation at large, or on the labouring classes, by an immediate return to the minimum duty on sugar and tea; and though we might take either of the two, we could not, consistently with what I have thus far proposed, take both. As we do not think that is the direction in which relief may be best conferred, I think the Committee will readily guess what I am about to propose—the abolition of the Excise duty on paper. There is only one argument I know against its abolition, and that is, that the revenue derived from it is a growing revenue. The reason why it is so is, that we live in a country with a growing literature and a growing trade; and, as neither literature nor trade can be carried on without paper, it follows that as long as the country grows in literature and trade the paper duty must increase, however impolitic, however burdensome it may be in its operation. But let the Committee briefly consider with me some of the reasons for the repeal of the paper duty. First of all, I do not hesitate to say that one reason for this repeal, not, perhaps, conclusive in itself, but certainly far from immaterial in the view of any British Ministry, is that the duty has been condemned by the House of Parliament. And how has it been condemned? Not by any chance majority, not by an Opposition happening to overpower a resisting Government, but with the full concurrence of the responsible executive of the day. On the 21st of June, 1858, my right hon. Friend, now President of the Board of Trade, made this Motion:—

“That it is the opinion of this House that the maintenance of the Excise duty on paper, as a permanent source of revenue, will be impolitic.”

The Chancellor of the Exchequer objected to a second Resolution which was proposed by my hon. Friend for the purpose of driving the nail a little further home; and, on the second Resolution being withdrawn, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Disraeli), adopted the first Resolution, said that the duty required not immediate, but yet early consideration; and the Resolution was thereupon adopted unanimously by the House. It is a question whether it is altogether a wise practice to adopt Resolutions that condemn duties which cannot at the time be repealed, and I am afraid subsequent inconveniences are apt to grow out of such a practice; but the fact that the House of Commons has recorded that judgment is a material element in the case we are now considering.

That, however, is not all. The paper duty is in many respects a bad duty, and I will show presently that it is also becoming untenable in law. In the first place, as a uniform duty on a very variable article, how does it operate? It presses on the poorer sorts, and while we find that the duty on fine papers, owing to the growth of literature, is rapidly increasing, on the coarse sorts it does not advance. Look again at its operation on literature. On dear books, which are published for the wealthy, it is a very light duty; on books brought out in large quantities by enterprising publishers for the middle and lower classes it is a very heavy and a very oppressive duty. I think the Committee will admit that it is a most desirable and legitimate object to promote the extension of cheap literature. I do not speak of newspapers alone, but of newspapers and periodical publications in common with all other cheap literature which we have seen so greatly enlarged of late, and the character of which I am bound to say since the penny stamp on newspapers was removed has been so highly creditable to the conductors of what is called the cheap press. It is hardly possible to describe, except by details on which I shall not venture, the manner in which the paper duty obstructs general skill and enterprise. But the subject has this characteristic, which I beg to call to the special attention of the Committee. The material with which it

cals is a material of almost boundless scope, for nearly everything which is fibrous may in one manner or another be made to serve the purpose of paper. I spoke just now of the production of British and spurious wines. I am told that in an inland town there is a manufacture of British champagne. It is made from rhubarb, and the suggestion has been made that after all the champagne has been extracted from the rhubarb the fibre should be made into paper. That is a very good recommendation. I believe, really and seriously, that whatever is grown with fibre would, by skill and enterprise, probably be made available in one mode or another for the purposes of paper if it were not for the necessary obstructions offered by the regulations of the Excise Department. But again, what are the purposes of paper? Not only those narrow ones with which the ordinary experience of every man makes him familiar. I do not think the Committee is aware of the enormous variety of purposes to which the use of this material may, in one form or another, be applied. I have a list of sixty-nine trades, in not one of which an ordinary consumer would guess it to be used. For example, it is largely used by anatomical machinists to make artificial limbs, by telescope makers, by boot and shoemakers, by cap manufacturers for the foundations of caps and hats, forming all the peaks and many of the tops which look like leather, by china and porcelain manufacturers, by coachmakers, by comb makers, by doll makers (most dolls being made of a material into the composition of which paper enters), by shipbuilders, in making optical instruments, in pictures and looking-glasses, in portmanteaus, in Sheffield goods, and in teapots. One manufacturer writes that he has made panels for doors from paper, and he looks forward, above all, to making carriages of paper when the duty is taken off. Another manufacturer, who is asked into what combinations paper may be made to enter, says—and I think it is a very just and forcible observation:—"Who can fix the limit to ingenious combinations when we see india-rubber, for instance, being made into strong and durable combs and other articles of that sort? Only this morning," he proceeds, "he was informed that paper pipes are made, prepared with bitumen, and capable of standing a pressure of 300lb. of water to the inch." These are partial but not uninteresting details, and I think that to which they bear witness is the unbounded expansion of which this trade is capable, and the way in which we may confer benefit on the working-classes by means of abolishing this duty—not only because they will get cheaper paper, which must be of advantage to every man who furnishes a cottage and desires to give some of his rooms an appearance of comfort and neatness, and to every purchaser of tea and sugar, into the cost of which it enters when tea and sugar are wrapped in it; but by putting in motion an immense trade it will give a greater and wider stimulus to the demand for the labour of the country. Above all other benefits, let me say the great advantage of this change, in my opinion, and in the opinion of Her Majesty's Government, is, that we may promote a diffused demand and a demand for rural labour; that we shall not merely stimulate the process of massing people in great centres of industry, but the demand for labour all over the country. Where there are streams, where there are villages, where there is pure and good air and tolerable access, there are the places where the paper manufacture tends to establish itself. And there is a Gentleman, a member of this House, second to no man in England for enterprise, who did within the last few years illustrate the effect of the paper manufacture on the poor rate. The paper duty has indeed, I fear, materially helped to extinguish all the small paper manufacturers. It has concentrated the trade in a few great hands. Village mills are hardly to be found. I want to see, and I do not despair of seeing, these village mills spring up again and flourish. The case I quote, to show the effect of paper manufacture upon the poor rate, is that of a Member of this House, who a few years ago, with a view to the supply of paper for a well-known periodical, established a paper manufactory at Rickmansworth, and within three or four years the poor-rates of Rickmansworth were diminished by one-half. In this condition, I believe, they continued so long as that paper mill was at work. This is an argument of a nature to be readily appreciated and understood. And, Sir, before I conclude the subject, I must state yet one other point. I told the Committee that this duty was rapidly becoming untenable, and I am bound to warn them, as I have done with respect to the wine duties, that such is the state of things to which it tends. It is not only invasions to maintain it when every other duty of the same class has been abolished, but the law is rapidly becoming incapable of being administered without discredit. The heads of the Inland Revenue Department are completely agreed that there ought to be a repeal of the duty. I asked the gentlemen whom I may call the agitators against the duty to furnish their reasons in a series of short propositions, in order to see how far they could be admitted by the Inland Revenue. They sent me fifteen arguments, and I transmitted them to the Board of Inland Revenue. The heads of that department said, that two of the propositions were rather in the nature of general propositions of political economy upon which they would give no opinion, but that with regard to all the other thirteen they agreed with the agitators. You cannot reckon on being able to maintain the duty beyond a certain time, because such are the difficulties raised as to what is paper and what is not paper, as to what are sheets of fibrous substance and what are not, that not only is there the greatest soreness among the manufacturers, and the sense of injustice that attends capricious and unequal law, but the officers of revenue find it more and more difficult to perform their duty; and the maintainers of the law will soon be placed in the ridiculous position in which they were placed when they were some years ago unable to say what was a newspaper. In short, as the paper duty must sooner or later follow the newspaper stamp, we say let it be sooner and not later, and we propose that it should follow now. It is proposed that the paper duty shall be abolished after the 1st of July next, and that drawback shall be allowed on stocks in the hands of the dealers subject to the usual rules. There will be a loss by the repeal of the paper duty in 1860—1861 of £1,000,000. But the repeal of the paper duty will enable us to take some other measures which are very desirable; to clear the tariff of all the articles coming under the heads of furnishing paper, writing paper, books, prints, and engravings, and it will greatly simplify the laborious and difficult task which the Custom-house officers have to perform in searching the luggage of passengers for pirated books—an office by which they at present afford to possessors of a particular kind of property a protection which is afforded to no other kind of property, and which ought not to be afforded to them at the cost of the revenue. Of course, whenever the Custom-house officers observe an illegal commodity it will be their duty to stop it, but an officious and vexatious description of search will, as I am informed, no longer be necessary.

The abolition of the paper duty will moreover save £20,000 a year in the establishment of the Board of Inland Revenue; and it will likewise enable us to adopt another measure of some importance which I will in a very few words describe; I refer to the abolition of the impressed stamp on newspapers. The impressed stamp on newspapers is attended with difficulties which, if I were dealing with that subject alone, I might spend a long time in explaining. It recognizes the exceptional status of newspapers, and again raises the question, "What is a newspaper?" The Post Office authorities find it impossible to draw a distinction between publications entitled to the impressed stamp and other periodicals. It involves a great deal of unrequited service; and nothing is more absurd than that when the Post Office carries newspapers, or any other printed matter not exceeding four ounces in weight for a penny, they should be liable, after a stamp is impressed, to carry it half-a-dozen times over for the same money. Again, it requires a distinct code for itself. There are some fifteen or twenty special regulations which every one is bound to observe, but which nobody does observe, to secure the condition upon which the privilege is given; and this privilege, as to the mode of stamping newspapers, and as to postage, is a privilege most inconvenient to the parties and to the revenue. The State is obliged, on the one hand, to keep up various establishments for no other purpose than stamping the paper for newspapers, and newspaper proprietors are, on the other hand, with a few exceptions, obliged to cart all their paper to the establishments where this department of revenue is raised, in order to get it stamped. I cannot but think that that is a system fraught with great inconvenience and loss; it is inconvenient to the proprietors of newspapers, while it involves a loss of public money, and, therefore, it furnishes a strong argument for the abolition of the stamp. We propose, therefore, that the stamp should be abolished on the day on which the alteration in the stamp laws takes place.

But there are certain papers that take advantage of certain occasions, and among them that great paper The Times, of a three-halfpenny stamp. It would be a hardship to those papers if we called upon them to pay a two-penny postage, where they now pay only three halfpence, and this difficulty we propose to surmount by the simple method of introducing a three-halfpenny rate into the present scale of the book postage, which will accordingly stand as follows: up to four ounces, 1d.; six ounces, 1½d.; eight ounces, 2d.; and so on. This is a change which I think will at once recommend itself to the general favour of the Committee.

I have now stated all the remissions and changes of duty which the Government propose to recommend to the House; but with a view to the necessary balance of the revenue it is necessary that I should still refer to some articles which are connected with the departments of Excise and taxes. I have mentioned the article of hops; and I have now to state that we propose to alter the system of hop credits. That system is one that is indefensible in principle, and has nothing to recommend it in point of convenience. As things now are, the grower of hops who picks and gathers in his hops in August or September and sells them in October is not called on to pay the duty till the following May, when he pays one half, and the other half in November, when he has actually got in hand another crop. This is a system that is highly disadvantageous to the revenue while no good reason recommends it on the part of the producer: we, therefore, propose as a substitute that the hop-grower, who as a general rule has parted with his crop in October or November, shall, for the next and all coming crops, pay the duty on the following 1st of January. As, however, by taking away the hop credits we to some extent put a pressure on the grower, and as we are going to admit the foreign hop-grower to equal competition with him, we propose to give a partial remission of the duty, which will stand no longer at 19s. 7d., but at 14s. per cwt. or 1½d. per pound. I also have to mention a change in respect of malt. Malt is at present prohibited. We propose to remit the prohibition, and substitute a Customs' duty of 3s. per bushel, being 2s. 9d. and 5 per cent with a further allowance in consideration of the indirect burdens imposed by the Excise on the maltster over and above the duty in reference to the Excise. The subject of compensation reminds me that it is important to consider what will be the relation of the change in the wine duties to the duty on malt. I shall be prepared to show that when the change in the wine duties has taken effect, wine of the only description that can compete with malt will pay a tax a great deal heavier than malt, and malt, therefore, will not be subject to any undue pressure.

Let me now, Sir, bring into one view the alterations which I have stated in detail. In doing so I must endeavour to bring clearly before the mind of the Committee three separate sums—1st, the entire amount of the remission or relief to the consumers by the adoption of the plans we propose; 2nd, the amount of loss to the revenue which they will entail; 3rd, the amount of compensation which will be derived from the new charges upon operations of trade which we recommend for the adoption of the Committee. The Customs' duties altered under the treaty with France will give relief to the consumers of a sum of £1,737,000, and will cause a loss to the revenue of £1,190,000. By the supplemental Customs plan we will give relief to the consumers of £1,039,000, and there will be a loss to the revenue of £910,000; total relief to the consumers, £2,771,000; total loss to the revenue, £2,100,000. In the Inland Revenue Department there will be a relief on paper of £1,000,000; on hops, £105,000; and on game certificates, £50,000; making in all, £1,155,000; and a total loss to the revenue for the present year of £990,000. There will thus be a total relief to the consumers in the Customs and Inland Revenue Departments of £3,931,000, and a loss to the revenue of £3,090,000. The amount of compensation by means of increased consumption has here been estimated at £841,000, but there will be a further compensation by new charges and by savings on establishments of £982,000, being a total of £1,823,000. Taking this computation, and deducting £1,823,000 from £3,931,000, there will be a net loss to the revenue for 1860-61 of £2,108,000, a sum which, as the Committee will observe, very nearly indeed corresponds with the amount of relief which we are about to receive by the falling in of the Long Annuities.

There will, it is true, be a further loss, in consequence of the projected changes, of something more than £700,000. But I have no scruple in casting this burden on the year 1861-2, inasmuch as I feel that the effect of the changes we propose upon trade and consumption will be to enlarge its revenue in more than a corresponding degree.

I will now state in a few words the effect of these changes in bringing forward that most desired consummation of all Reformers—a simplification of the Customs tariff of the country. The number of articles subject to Customs' duties on the 1st of January, 1842, was 1052; in 1845 it amounted to 1163 articles; for I must remind the House that the first operation of the reform of the tariff was to multiply the number of articles, in consequence of the transition from duties ad valorem to rated or specific duties, which caused an increase of the headings under which they were described. In 1853 the number of articles was 466; lastly, on the 1st of January, 1859, 419. After the changes now proposed are adopted, without allowing for a few subdivisions, such as the specification of two or three classes of sugar, the whole number of articles remaining on the tariff will be forty-eight. We shall have three classes of articles, including in all fifteen, which are in reality the only articles that will be retained on the tariff for purposes of revenue. They are as follows: First, five articles yielding from one to six millions: spirits, sugar, tea, tobacco, and wine. Secondly, four articles yielding from £200,000 to £1,000,000: coffee, corn, currants, and timber. Thirdly, six articles yielding from £20,000 to £200,000: chicory, figs, and fig-cake, hops, pepper, raisins, and rice. Besides those fifteen articles there are twenty-nine which though yielding revenue, are only retained on special grounds. Thus, five articles are retained on account of countervailing duties of Excise on domestic articles, and twenty-four on account of their resemblance to one or other of the fifteen articles I have adverted to. We could not, for example, admit eau de Cologne free of duty while there is a duty on brandy. It thus follows that your Customs' revenue will be derived substantially from fifteen articles. That is a result which I hope Custom-house reformers will be of opinion justifies the changes we have made.

There will then be a relief from indirect taxation of about £4,000,000. Out of that £1,000,000 paper duty will go directly to stimulate the demand for diffused and rural labour, £1,800,000, or the greater part of £2,000,000, under the French treaty, and £400,000 more taken off the timber duties, will in every instance strike at differential duties, and will be the means of removing from the tariff its greatest, perhaps its only remaining deformities.

There will be on the British tariff, after the adoption of these changes, nothing whatever in the nature of protective or differential duties, unless we apply that name to the small charges which will be levied upon timber and corn, and which amount in general, perhaps, to about 3 per cent on the value. With that limited exception you will have a final disappearance of all protective and differential duties, so that the consumer will know that every shilling he pays will go to the revenue, and not to the domestic as against the foreign producer. You will have a great extension and increase of trade, you will have a remission of the principal restraints upon travellers, and a great reduction in the expenses of the Customs and Excise Departments. I mentioned that, as is indeed obvious, those reductions must be brought in by degrees and in detail. They will not appear upon the Estimates as they are presented for this year, because it is impossible to foresee, especially until we know what the decision of Parliament will be, the precise changes which will be made. The immediate reduction in the Customs Department will be £50,000, in the Excise £86,000; and the ultimate reduction upon the expenses of the Customs Department alone I expect will be somewhere about £150,000. That is the nature of the change we propose in the system of Customs and Excise.

It is now time that I should for the last time revert to the state of the general account. It would have been possible to come to it, perhaps, by a less circuitous route, and, as I stated before, a shilling income tax would have balanced the income and expenditure without any further trouble. But I come to consider what are the means by which we propose to bring about a balance. I do not indeed pretend to present to the House a Budget which grapples with all the difficulties of the case that is before us. I do not, let me again press on the notice of the Committee, propose to provide for the Exchequer bonds; a shilling income tax perhaps would have effected that purpose too. I have called the attention of the House to the fact that we are going to take away the six weeks' credit now allowed to maltsters, which will give us £1,100,000 within the financial year. The hop credit will give us £300,000 more. The two sums together amount to £1,400,000. They do not belong to the year, although on the other hand they are not borrowed money.

They actually belong to the public, and they may be said at present to be public capital lent out to the producer of certain commodities without interest, which we propose to call in and apply to the purposes of the year. But the deficit which I pointed out, and which it is incumbent on us to supply, amounted to £9,400,000. The aids which I have mentioned reduce it only to £8,000,000. After this statement, you will not, perhaps, consider that there remains to us much liberty of choice. I have pointed out that a one shilling income tax would completely fill the void, and would enable you to dispense with the remaining part of the war duties on tea and sugar. Without any remission of the duties on sugar or tea or paper, and without the slightest attempt to improve your fiscal laws and extend your trade, you cannot escape with an income tax less than the amount at which it now stands, 9d. in the pound. We have proposed to you a remission which goes to the extent of £4,000,000, and the additional taxation which we have so far presented, falls entirely upon trade; and now I will state in what manner we propose to supply the deficiency which remains. The charge for 1860-61, as I have stated, is £70,100,000; the income with the tea and sugar duties at their minimum would have been £60,700,000. Deducting from that income the loss by remissions, the amount would be £58,592,000; but by retaining the tea and sugar duties at their present rates we shall have an addition of £2,100,000 bringing up the income to nearly the point where it before stood, or £60,692,000. But when we compare £60,692,000 with £70,100,000, there is still a deficiency of nearly £9,500,000. Against that deficiency, besides taking up the malt and hop credits, which will give £1,400,000, we propose to renew the income tax at a rate only higher by one penny than that which it would be necessary under any circumstances to propose—namely, at 10d. in the pound. The assessment will be 10d. in the pound on incomes above £150, and 7d. in the pound below that amount. No new returns will be called for under any of the schedules, and the tax will be taken for one year only. Both with regard to that subject and the duties on tea and sugar we wish to reserve to Parliament the fullest and freest discretion. Instead of the old system, under which only half the year was collected within the year, though by law three quarters ought to be collected, we shall require three-quarters to be actually collected. The consequence of that will be, that the income tax at 10d., with three quarters collected within the year, will give £8,472,000. There will still remain due, after April, 1861, one quarter of the income tax, about £2,250,000, nearly the same sum as now remains due by law after April, 1860. There is but one slight change in it which we propose; it regards the mode of assessing railways. This proposal, which will be convenient both for the companies and for the Government, will be to assess them at their head offices instead of in the various districts through which they run. I think the House will now understand how the final balance for the year will be adjusted. But I may repeat the particulars. The revenue, after the deductions and remissions, and without allowing for what may be called the war duties on tea and sugar, stands at £58,592,000. I put the tea and sugar duties renewed at the present rates yield £2,100,000, the malt and hop credits taken up give £1,400,000, the income tax for three quarters of the year furnishes £8,472,000. That brings up the total income to £70,564,000. The total charge is £70,100,000, which leaves an apparent estimated surplus of £464,000.

As regards the method of proceeding to submit these measures, and in conformity with what I have already said, I will ask the House to pass the vote relating to chicory to-night, and the order in which we will take the other subjects will, without reference to any other matter which may intervene, be as follows. We shall proceed first with those portions of the Customs' duties which are involved in the treaty with France, and among them we shall begin with the duties on wines. I cannot overstate to the Committee the importance both to trade and to the revenue of proceeding to deal with these subjects at the earliest possible day. We should not like to make an unreasonable demand on the House or on individual Members, and, as I now speak on Friday, we could not ask the House to take an earlier day than Thursday next; but I trust that the Committee and its members individually will allow of our proceeding on that day in a matter where despatch is of so great importance. We should, after that, proceed with the supplementary resolutions, or the second part of our plan, relating to the Customs' duties; we should then take the Excise duties, and after that the duties on tea and sugar. Probably before we get so far we shall have made some progress in the Estimates, and it will be then convenient to take the income tax.

And now, Sir, without seeking to place on the propositions, I have made a colour more favourable than they may deserve, I have endeavoured to bring strongly and clearly into view the most prominent features of the plan of the Government. We propose an ample provision for the service of the year. Our plan gives a sanction to the employment of some subsidiary resources in aid of the ordinary revenue of the year, in consideration of the great demands made on the people; it involves a high rate of income tax, and it abandons all endeavour to make a financial settlement for a term of years, a method which we do not think suited to the existing state of affairs. Those Gentlemen who may entertain a hope of some material reduction in our expenditure at an early date will be disposed, I think, to agree in the wisdom and propriety of such a course. Our proposals involve a great reform in our tariff, they involve a large remission of taxation, and last of all, though not least, they include that Commercial Treaty with France which, though objections may be taken to it, we confidently recommend, not only on moral and social, and political, but also, and with equal confidence, on fiscal and economical grounds. In conclusion, I may presume to say that I feel a hope which amounts to a persuasion, that this House, whatever may happen, will not shrink from its duty. After all it has heretofore achieved by resolute and persevering commercial reforms on behalf of the masses of the people, and not on behalf of them alone, but on behalf of every class, on behalf of the Throne, and of the institutions of the country, I feel convinced that this House will not refuse to go boldly on in the direction in which Parliament has already reaped such honours and rewards. By pursuing such a course as this it will be in your power to scatter blessings among the people, and blessings which are among the soundest and most wholesome of all the blessings at your disposal, because in legislation of this kind you are not forging mechanical helps for men, nor endeavouring to do that for them which they ought to do for themselves; but you are enlarging their means without narrowing their freedom, you are giving value to their labour, you are appealing to their sense of responsibility, and you are not impairing their sense of honourable self-dependence. There were times, now long gone by, when Sovereigns made progress through the land, and when, at the proclamation of their heralds, they caused to be scattered heaps of coin among the people who thronged upon their steps. That may have been a goodly spectacle; but it is also a goodly spectacle, and one adapted to the altered spirit and circumstances of our times, when our Sovereign is enabled, through the wisdom of Her great Council assembled in Parliament around Her, again to scatter blessings among Her subjects by means of wise and prudent laws; of laws which do not sap in any respect the foundations of duty or of manhood, but which strike away the shackles from the arm of industry, which give new incentive and new reward to toil, and which win more and more for the Throne and for the institutions of the country the gratitude, the confidence, and the love of an united people. Let me say even to those who are anxious, and justly anxious, on the subject of our national defences, that that which stirs the flame of patriotism in men, that which binds them in one heart and soul, that which gives them increased confidence in their rulers, that which makes them feel and know that they are treated with justice, and that we who represent them are labouring incessantly and earnestly for their good—is in itself no small, no feeble, and no transitory part of national defence. We recommend these proposals to your impartial and searching inquiry; we do not presume indeed to make a claim on your acknowledgments, but neither do we desire to draw on your generous confidence, nor to lodge an appeal to your compassion. We ask for nothing more and nothing less than your dispassionate judgment; we know that our plan will receive that justice at your hands, and we confidently anticipate on its behalf the approval alike of the Parliament and the nation.

The right hon. Gentleman then moved to resolve—

“That the following Duty of Customs shall be charged on the article under mentioned, on importation into the United Kingdom, on and after the 11th day of February 1860—namely, Chicory, or any other vegetable matter applicable to the uses of Chicory or Coffee,—namely, Raw or kiln dried, 6s. the cwt.”

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, it is not my intention to offer any opposition to the Resolution which the right hon. Gentleman has proposed; indeed, I must take the liberty of congratulating himself and the House on the able manner in which he has addressed it under the painful circumstances with which I can assure him all present sympathize. But the right hon. Gentleman has placed before us a very large scheme, treating of subjects of the greatest importance, and descending even to the minutest details; and having, with proper confidence, invited, on the part of the House, an impartial and searching examination of these topics, I must venture to say that, as we do not all of us possess abilities equal to those with which he is gifted, it appears to me scarcely possible that an impartial and searching investigation can take place in the very limited time that the right hon. Gentleman has intimated. The claims of the trade of the country, no doubt, are great and urgent;—when any alterations of the tariff are contemplated, no man hesitates to acknowledge them; but these claims have a limit, both in their importance and urgency,—and the urgency and importance of commercial interests cannot justify this House in entering into rash and precipitate legislation. We are dealing with a very important subject; we are also dealing in the present financial statement with elements differing, in very essential particulars, from those by which even the most comprehensive financial schemes have of late years been characterized. We have to deal not only with financial and commercial considerations, but—as the right hon. Gentleman has fairly admitted, and as no Member of this House should for a moment forget—we have to deal likewise with political considerations. We are asked to enter into relations with a foreign Power, which, having once been adopted, are not susceptible of those changes which in thoroughly domestic engagements, however important, the omnipotence of Parliament would always be able to effect. And, therefore, I feel that I am but expressing the general sentiments of the House when I state that the proposition of the right hon. Gentleman that we should enter upon the consideration of this financial scheme next Thursday is one of an unreasonable nature. Acknowledging the claims to an early settlement of commercial questions, I at the same time believe that there are questions as important as even the interests of our commerce. I have no wish to interfere with the Government in the conduct of public business, or with the arrangements which have been made for bringing forward the Bill popularly called the Reform Bill; but I should suggest that this day fortnight would be the period at which, under the circumstances of the case, and according to usual custom, the discussion on this subject might conveniently be taken. In several similar cases in which the interests involved were more limited than under the present financial statement, the House, I remember, requested a fortnight's interval, and sometimes even pressed for three weeks, and no instance has occurred where interests of any importance were concerned in which a less period than a week has been granted. And now we are called on to consider at such brief notice questions of financial, of commercial, and of political interest, all of the highest and most comprehensive character; and not to consider them merely, but to come to a decision—because this scheme must be taken as a whole, and it is evident that the very first vote which is given upon any portion of it will really decide the fate of the entire proposal. And not merely is the convenience of this House to be consulted, but our constituents are deeply affected by this proposition. Many hon. Members will, doubtless, desire an opportunity of mastering the financial scheme in all its bearings; and many others will desire to consult their constituencies on various points involved in the proposed changes. These have a right to consider its details and to communicate with their representatives, and many of them are at such a distance as to render it scarcely possible that a communication could be returned in time. On all these grounds I would suggest to the Government that the postponement of the further consideration of this question to this day fortnight is a step that would be most convenient to the House, and most conducive to public interests.

MR. ELLICE (Coventry) expressed a hope that whatever course might be adopted by the House, they would not follow that recommended by the right hon. Gentleman who had just sat down. Interests of various descriptions were concerned in the decision of the House, and on behalf of one which would be most prejudicially affected by the proposed changes, he was very anxious that the scheme should be subjected to a speedy decision. He did not intend to go into the details of the measure. The right hon. Gentleman had stated it to the House with great ability, and it was founded on a principle which recommended itself very much to their serious attention. Although the right hon. Gentleman had pointed him out as one of those who were most likely to object to the measure, he wished to express his acquiescence in its general principle, though he objected very strongly to its proposed application to the constituency which he represented; and in their name he took that opportunity of protesting against the harsh, peremptory, and inconsiderate manner in which it was proposed to deal with their interests. The silk trade was that which was most especially affected by this scheme, and of the £300,000 at present levied on silk manufactures, at least one half was paid by the particular species of silk manufactured by his constituency. A petition had undoubtedly been presented from the silk manufacturers of Manchester, in which they advocated the removal of the restrictions as calculated to benefit the general silk trade; but they were very little affected by the contemplated repeal of the duties. The branch of manufacture which would be principally affected by the alteration was that of ribands, which was principally and almost-entirely carried on in the city of Coventry. In 1846, when the first general scheme of commercial reform was introduced, a certain consideration was paid to this particular trade, and a certain amount of protection was retained in their favour. That protection amounted to about 16 or 17 per cent. The trade, which was in a state of progressive improvement, was now likely to be injured by the proposed unrestricted competition. He did not say that the general interests of the country ought to be postponed for their advantage; but he thought time ought to be allowed them to prepare for the change. He was innocent enough, in the first instance, to tell his constituents that he did not believe a commercial treaty would be negotiated by the Government. In this time of day he had thought it little likely that the principle of a commercial treaty would have been resorted to; but still less had he expected that such terms would have been agreed to as were now proposed. He asked where the equivalent was to be found in the treaty for the free admission of ribands into this country? If an equivalent had been granted, if the market of France had been opened to English ribands at the same time that the English market was opened to French ribands, he should have thought the manufacturers and artisans in this country would have been able to compete with those of France on terms of equality, and that they would have consented to this measure; but when he found that the duty on French ribands of from 15 to 16 per cent was to be taken off, and that they were to be admitted freely into this country, while our ribands were to be excluded from France for a twelvemonth, and then practically excluded from the French market by a duty of 30 per cent, it would require greater ingenuity than even that of his right hon. Friend, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, to persuade the English workman that the price of his labour was not diminished, and his condition deteriorated, or that he had been treated on principles of fair play and justice. The consequence of this treaty had been that the trade of Coventry was now nearly in a state of panic; and that being so, he should be sorry to see the discussion on the measure delayed longer than was absolutely necessary to enable the House to master its details; because, while the suspense lasted, the condition of the poor people there would be truly unenviable. He trusted, therefore, that the Chancellor of the Exchequer would adhere to his determination to proceed with the discussion on Thursday.

Mr. NEWDEGATE wished the Committee to consider for one moment what was done in former years when a commercial treaty with France was proposed. It was proposed by that eminent statesman, Mr. Pitt, in 1787, in the same friendly spirit towards France which pervaded that now proposed by Her Majesty's Government. But what was the precedent which the House of Commons set on that occasion with respect to the time allowed for deliberation? It was stated in Tomlin's Life of Pitt that the substance of that treaty was before the public for five months before the Minister proposed that it should be adopted by the representatives of the people. And was it hurried on, as the right hon. Gentleman proposed to hurry his measure, after it was once communicated to the House? On the contrary, the treaty was proposed almost immediately after Parliament met on the 23rd of January, 1787, and it was not sanctioned by Parliament till the middle of March. But the right hon. Gentleman expected the House to master the details of a measure which, he (Mr. Newdegate) admitted, had been brought forward with consummate ability, but which involved more complicated and intricate calculation than he ever before remembered to have been laid before the House, in the course of the next five days. What was the key to the whole measure? The key to the whole measure was the treaty with France. The right hon. Gentleman said that no foreign compulsion would be brought upon us by the adoption of that treaty. But what was the fact? If the House once sanctioned this treaty, they could not for many years again deal with articles affected by the treaty without the concurrence of France, or without incurring her hostility. He therefore entreated the Committee not to commit themselves to engagements of such vast consequence without a fortnight or three weeks' deliberation; for if these steps were once taken the House could not retrace them without endangering the good understanding that now existed between two great nations whose amity they were bound by every means to endeavour to promote. He did not concur with the right hon. Member for Coventry, although of the interests and trade of that city they were the joint representatives. Such had been the secrecy with which this treaty was kept from the trade—a trade which had been greatly enlarged of late, and was now in a state of great prosperity, and upon which 150,000 of the population of the country at least were depending—for that was the number returned at the last census—that up to this moment they were in total ignorance of the measures that were proposed for adoption in conformity with the Government of France. When, therefore, it was proposed to sanction a measure of this kind, he thought the House would only manifest a due regard to its own character if it followed the example of the House of Commons in 1787—a House that was led by Mr. Pitt, while the Opposition was led by Mr. Fox, who was so far from being disposed to hasten the deliberations on such an important measure that he took it up in detail, and divided the House on several clauses of that treaty, and did not suffer it to pass till six weeks or two months were given to the people of this kingdom to inform their representatives whether the engagements into which the Minister had entered should be ratified by the Parliament or not. He would not detain the House longer, except to say that he cordially concurred in the considerations which had been so ably urged by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire, and that he hoped the House would adopt them, and not commit itself to these important considerations with France

Mr. BENTINCK need not say that he heartily joined in the pleasure which every one had expressed in seeing the right hon. Gentleman again among them, and he need hardly add that, in common with the rest of the Committee, he had listened with the deepest attention to the speech with which he had introduced the subject. He would go farther, and say that till that night he could not have believed it was in the art of man to clothe so much tinsel in such brilliant colours. The right hon. Gentleman exceeded all he had ever before heard in the power of giving to what was worthless, or, he might say, destructive, so rich and new a gloss. He would not, however, now go farther into the question than to advert to one subject. The right hon. Gentleman, with considerable emphasis, was pleased to say—triumphing, no doubt, in his free-trade aspirations—that he understood Protection for some time past had been lurking in holes and corners. Now, he (Mr. Bentinck) had never deviated from the opinions, whether right or wrong, which he had first held on the subject of protection; and he would tell the right hon. Gentleman that the course of the Protectionists had been throughout straightforward, honourable, and consistent; and when they saw those who had acted in a manner the reverse of honourable and the reverse of consistent rampant in high places, it might be well for Protectionists to betake themselves to those holes and corners where they found at least honesty of purpose. He had listened with great pleasure to the speech of the right hon. Member for Coventry, and was glad to find that, to a considerable extent, the right hon. Gentleman coincided in the views he held; but he could not agree with him in hastening on the discussion. The right hon. Gentleman forgot that while his constituents were near enough to London to learn all the details of this measure tomorrow, there were others so far distant that it would be two or three days before the news reached them. Even with regard to the Members of this House, he believed it was not in the power of any Member here to master for some considerable time all the complicated details of this measure, much less to form a sound opinion as to the probable effect of so comprehensive a scheme within the limited time which was to be allowed to elapse before its discussion by the House. So far from thinking that the right hon. Member for Bucks had asked for too long a delay, it appeared to him that the time he suggested was rather inadequate for a full deliberation. He only hoped that the right hon. Gentleman would adhere strictly to the proposal which he had made, and he was sure he would receive the support of every man who wished to consider this question with a view to the best interests of the country, and not to make it a party measure with a view to obtaining a party triumph.

MR. BAXTER hoped the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer would not adopt the suggestion offered on the other side of the House. These questions must be considered as a whole, and ought to be considered at the earliest possible moment. No doubt the hon. Member for Norfolk (Mr. Bentinck) had already made up his mind, for he had characterized the statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer as "tinsel." He (Mr. Baxter) would advise the right hon. Gentleman on no account to fix the discussion of his scheme for a distant date, and certainly not to allow it to interfere with the discussion on the Reform Bill. No doubt hon. Gentlemen opposite were anxious to have the Reform Bill interposed between tonight and the further discussion of the financial statement.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, he merely wished to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer what the Government intended to do in the case of drawbacks on wine in bond?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he was extremely obliged to his hon. Friend for having put the question—the subject had entirely escaped his memory. He would state the intention of the Government at length on a future occasion; but that intention was quite distinct and founded on a clear principle. They intend strictly to adhere to the terms of what had been construed into a compact, and to give a drawback wherever the parties had complied with the terms of the Treasury Minute of 1843, which allowed it, and with the regulations of the Revenue Department issued under it.

MR. HORSFALL said, he would not then venture to express any opinion upon the important proposals which had been brought under the notice of the House by the Chancellor of the Exchequer; but he felt it his duty to urge upon the right hon. Gentleman the propriety of allowing a fortnight for the consideration of the scheme before they were to proceed to its discussion.

MR. PALK said, the only fear he had was that the right hon. Gentleman had pursued his principle of free trade a little too far. At all events he now dealt with such a variety of subjects—and affected such a great variety of interests—that it would be only fair that those who were entrusted with the interests of the electors of England should have full time for considering them, and not consider them in the narrow-minded way mentioned by the hon. Gentlemen on the other side of the House. At the same time he trusted that the Government would not be induced by any delay in discussing the financial scheme to postpone the introduction of the Reform Bill, as it had been suggested they should do.

MR. ALCOCK wished to offer his tribute of admiration to the right hon. Gentleman for the admirable manner in which he had made his financial statement, and he rejoiced to hear that part which related to the commercial intercourse of this country with France. It was a stigma on both countries that so little trade was done between them, but now there was a fair prospect that it would be increased. But he regretted that no promise of reduction in the malt duties had been made; and as regarded the tea and sugar duties, he must state openly that the right hon. Gentleman had not done justice to them. The working classes of London spent one-eighth of their earnings in the consumption of those articles, and they would have to pay the same duties as at present for some time longer. He was glad that the right hon. Gentleman had determined to keep on the income tax, but he wished it had been fixed at 1s. in the £1 instead of 7d. and 10d.

MR. GLYN said, that as a commercial man, he felt it his duty to represent to the House and to the Government the very great inconvenience which must result from any postponement of the consideration of the financial plan. With the rapidity of communication which we at present enjoyed in this country he did not see why they should not be prepared to consider the scheme of the Chancellor of the Exchequer towards the close of next week; and he would suggest to his right hon. Friend the propriety of continuing the discussion de die in diem from the moment of its commencement.

LORD CLAUD HAMILTON said, that between that evening and Thursday next

he certainly should not have sufficient time to communicate with his constituents, many of whom were engaged in the linen trade, and naturally felt a great interest in one portion of the commercial treaty with France. He trusted, therefore, that the Chancellor of the Exchequer would not force on the discussion upon that day; and he expressed that hope from no desire to thwart the course of the right hon. Gentleman, because he was disposed to look with much gratification at the scheme, as far as he could at present form any judgment upon the subject.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: It is quite impossible for the Government to concede to the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman to postpone the discussion for a fortnight, because, for the reasons which have been clearly stated, it would be exceedingly inconvenient and injurious to various trades; but if Thursday be too early, we have no objection to fix the discussion for Friday. There will be then an entire week for consideration. But upon the question of any further postponement we must take the sense of the House. I hope if we take it on Friday that the House, feeling that these are matters of most pressing interest, will consent to continue the discussion from day to day.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, the hon. Member for Kendal (Mr. Glyn) had truly stated that it was important to trade interests not to have unnecessary delay; but, on the other hand, it must be remembered when the House of Commons was called upon to decide upon proposals of such magnitude in such a startling manner, that there were other and very large interests throughout the country involved, and it was important that sufficient time should be given for the consideration of details so complicated. He could not suppose that the right hon. Gentleman after proposing so vast a scheme would be so unfair as to press it with undue haste. The delay arising from the right hon. Gentleman's illness was unfortunate, but could not be avoided; but there was a delay which the Government could have avoided, namely, in the production of the treaty until that very night. It had been suggested that when once commenced the discussion should continue de die in diem. That was a matter for the consideration of the Government; but they could not expect that the first discussion would pass off without an adjournment, and he would suggest whether it was desirable to begin a debate on a Friday, that could not be continued until the following week. With respect to the Reform Bill, of course, the Government could please themselves.

MR. SLANEY was opposed to a lengthened postponement of the debate. With regard to the income tax proposed by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, he thought if 1s. instead of 10d. in the pound were to be the amount of the tax, and the duties on tea and sugar were remitted, the rich would willingly bear that increase to contribute to the comfort and necessities of their poorer fellow-subjects.

MR. BALL thought the right hon. Gentleman was consistent in not showing any particular favour to the agricultural interests. In his first Budget he had made an increase in the malt duties, and he (Mr. Ball) had failed by a small minority to procure a reversal of that policy. The right hon. Gentleman, he was sorry to say, although he had dealt in a cosmopolitan spirit with other interests, and had looked about on all sides to see to what classes he might extend relief, yet had added to the burden of the maltster by shortening the period which had been so long allowed him for the payment of his duty. That, he thought, was hardly a fair course to pursue. He should not, however, enter further into the question upon that occasion, but should beg the right hon. Gentleman and the Government to put off for a more lengthened period than they proposed the further consideration of a statement so important as that which he had just made and embracing subjects so complex in their nature.

MR. HORSMAN said, hon. Gentlemen on both sides of the House had a common interest in having the most convenient day fixed for the discussion of the proposals of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and he did not think the question of time, therefore, was one on which it would be creditable to the Committee to come to a division. He would, under those circumstances, suggest that the further consideration of the statement of the right hon. Gentleman should be postponed until Monday next, before which day hon. Gentlemen opposite might come to some agreement with the Government as to the course which it was advisable to take. He had, however, risen principally with the object of asking the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether, it being his intention to extend to other countries the similar changes to those which had been made in the case of France, it was intended to make those changes the subjects of a treaty? [The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER was understood to intimate that it was not.] That being so, he should also wish to know whether the right hon. Gentleman had made allowance in his statement for the loss to the revenue which the change in the tariff in the case of those other countries would occasion.

MR. FRANK CROSSLEY objected to any further postponement than was absolutely necessary, on the ground that it would delay the Reform Bill. He gave credit to the Chancellor of the Exchequer for the able manner in which he had explained what he considered to be the best Budget since 1853, and which he believed would give general satisfaction.

MR. KENDALL was in favour of the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire, for he thought that time should be given for ascertaining the sentiments of the distant constituencies.

MR. RIDLEY joined in bearing testimony to the ability which had been displayed in the framing of the financial scheme which had that evening been submitted to the notice of the Committee, and dwelt upon the advantages which were likely to result from the increased commercial intercourse which was about to take place between this country and France. In its leading features he believed the Budget would receive a very cordial reception in the country, and he believed the important interests affected would be much indebted to the House of Commons if they suffered no unnecessary delay to intervene before pronouncing their decision on the great scheme which had been laid before them.

MR. R. CRAWFORD said, he had taken the means of ascertaining what was the state of feeling in the City, and he found that trade was in a state of paralysis, everybody waiting to know what would be the decision of Parliament on the Budget. Take the silk trade, for instance; there was no period in the whole year when changes of the character proposed were so likely to affect that trade as the month of February, during the first and second week of which the great transactions in the silk trade were carried on. From the communications which had been made to him, he could state that the indecision affecting all transactions in the silk trade placed all parties engaged in it in circumstances of great disadvantage. The same might be said of the wine, and indeed of every other trade. He therefore hoped that no unreasonable delay would be allowed to take place.

MR. E. C. EGERTON said, he could confirm the statement made by the hon. Member for the City of London. He deprecated any delay in the settlement of the questions involved in the statement of the right hon. Gentleman. His constituents, the silk merchants of Macclesfield, were anxious to know at once what was awaiting them. They were alive to the benefits of free trade and not afraid of the result. They only wished to start on the same footing with their foreign competitors. The great operations in the silk trade, as the hon. Member for the City of London had stated, were carried on in February; and it was most important that there should be as little delay as possible in coming to a final decision in regard to the propositions which had been submitted to the House.

MR. J. EWART entirely agreed in the views of the hon. Member for the City of London. It was most important to the commercial interest that this question should be settled as soon as possible. It certainly should not be delayed for a fortnight; a week, as proposed by the noble Lord at the head of the Government, was quite sufficient. So far as he knew the feeling of his constituents, he was quite sure that the great and comprehensive measure of the right hon. the Chancellor of the Exchequer—one of the greatest ever introduced into that House—would meet with the most cordial approval.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he could not agree in what had been said as to the favourable feeling with which the Budget would be viewed by those engaged in the silk trade. It was proposed to admit silk free immediately, while whatever was given in compensation by France was to be delayed for a long period, and then the terms of reciprocity were to be 30 per cent in France as against no duty here. On the part of the labour employed in the silk trade he did claim that the House should deliberate before adopting what he believed to be the commands of France. The House would excuse his plainness of speech: he must say the manner in which they were proceeding would not favourably impress the minds of the labouring population, but would root in them the disparaging description of the House widely circulated in his neighbourhood by the hon. Member for Birmingham. Nothing could be more unfortunate for the position of the House than to beget a belief that they were disregarding the interests of the labouring classes by unduly pressing on a measure confessedly suggested by the French Government.

LORD JOHN MANNERS never remembered since he had had a seat in that House, an instance in which so many matters of such vast magnitude and compass were brought within the scope of a Budget, and involving so deeply the great questions of European politics. He, therefore, hoped due time would be given for deliberation and discussion. It would be impossible otherwise to put an end to those suspicions which were already widely circulated, that this was not a mere question of fiscal alterations, beneficial or the reverse, but involved higher, deeper, and wider relations; and under these circumstances, if they were precipitate in the course of policy they adopted, it could never be retraced, however deeply it might be objected to. With proper deliberation, they were much more likely to come to a satisfactory conclusion. In the long run, time would not be saved by compelling a reluctant House, or one great section of it, to come to a hasty decision before they were in a proper position to discuss this vast, varied, and all important subject.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY put it to the Government whether they would not adopt the suggestion of the right hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Horsman) and take Monday week for the discussion of this subject. There was very little difference between that and the noble Lord at the head of the Government who proposed Friday next. It was desirable that hon. Members should have time to communicate with their constituents.

MR. BENTINCK thought it would be to the credit of the House and the Government if a distinct answer were at once given to one question. The noble Lord at the head of the Government had told them that the terms of this treaty had been agreed upon by the French Government, subject to the approbation of Parliament. Subsequent to that announcement it had been rumoured that if they did not consent to adopt the terms of the treaty, they would be endangering our amicable relations with France. It had been asserted by an hon. Member in the course of this debate, and without contradiction, that this treaty had been forced on this country by France. He was only repeating an assertion that others had made. If the House was to be placed under the necessity of either ratifying that treaty or of endangering by its rejection the amicable relations between this country and France, he must say the proposal was one of the most degrading that had ever been submitted to any nation. He wished, therefore, to know from Her Majesty's Government whether, in the event of Parliament not thinking it right to confirm this treaty, the friendly relations between the two Governments would be in any way interfered with.

MR. HORSMAN explained that he had suggested the Committee nominally for Monday, that an understanding might then be come to as to when the discussion should be taken. His object was to avoid a narrow division one way or the other.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: I cannot think the arrangement suggested by the right hon. Member (Mr. Horsman) would be convenient. It would be much more advantageous that the country should know at once when the discussion will really take place. Sir, the hon. Member for West Norfolk (Mr. Bentinck) is quite mistaken in supposing that the treaty is imposed on this country by France. Indeed, it has been long a matter of discussion whether any ruler of France would be bold enough to propose to diminish the protection which so many interests in that country are combined and organized to uphold. However, the present Emperor, seeing the great advantage of free trade, or at all events, of a change in the French prohibitive and protective system, authorized his Ministers to negotiate a treaty on the subject. The fact is that some months ago, when Mr. Cobden was going to Paris, he had a conversation with me, in which he informed me that he had several friends in France—one of them a person well known throughout Europe, M. Michel Chevalier; that he was anxious to converse with them in order to see whether there was any chance of a commercial treaty being entered into by France. I told him, on the part of the Government, that if he found there was such a disposition I was sure Her Majesty's Government would be quite ready to empower their representatives to negotiate such a treaty. The treaty itself my right hon. Friend has explained in a manner which must have made its object clear to every one who heard him. But when the hon. Gentleman asks whether the rejection of this treaty is to be followed by—I forget exactly what—

MR. BENTINCK: By any probable disturbance of the amicable relations between this country and France.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: By any possible disturbance of the friendly relations between this country and France, I must tell him our argument is that the tendency of the treaty is to promote friendly relations between the two Governments. We believe that although there may be a time during which some of these relaxations may cause dissatisfaction in this country, and in France, it will work gradually, but surely, in improving those relations, and that the benefits both countries would derive from an exchange of each other's productions and manufactures would form such bonds of amity that it would be found more difficult to create ill-feeling between them than has been the case in past times. But, as to whether the rejection of the treaty would produce any disturbance of our friendly relations, why, the hon. Gentleman and every other Member of this House are quite as capable of forming an opinion as we are. That any threat or intimation of that kind has been made is utterly untrue. But, as to what effect any angry speeches in this House against France, followed by the rejection of the treaty, might have, the hon. Member must judge for himself. The right hon. Member for Buckinghamshire said it would be highly convenient if we postponed this discussion for a fortnight, and if I, in the meantime, would introduce the Reform Bill. Well, that is not the course I am going to pursue. However anxious I may be to bring in that Bill, it will be my duty not to submit it to the consideration of the House until we have gone through at least all the principal measures indicated by the Budget. The only point at issue now is the difference between the Friday and the Monday following. The subjects of the Budget have so many branches, so many Members are interested in the various articles affected by the proposal, that it is quite impossible we can get through the discussion in one or even two nights. I think, therefore, the Government could not properly delay the matter later than Friday next.

MR. T. BARING: It is very unfortunate that the Government should appear to press their proposal forward with unnecessary haste. Such a course must be unfavourable to its success. It will not facilitate its adoption, but must in reality retard its progress, because a feeling will be excited in the House, and perhaps in the country, that Ministers are anxious to force their measures upon Parliament. I do not believe there has been a case in which proposals of such importance as those made by the Chancellor of the Exchequer have been submitted for our approval within a week after their first explanation. Recollect that the secret of the right hon. Gentleman's Budget—and I praise him for it—has been very well kept. Recollect, also, that the secret of this treaty—and I cannot equally praise him for that—has been kept till this very day, and yet it is only next week that its provisions can be canvassed by the country. The Budget is very large, and affects a great variety of interests. I should be ashamed to hazard any opinion either in favour of or against it without giving it the consideration which its importance demands. Comprehensive as it no doubt is, I must be allowed also to say that a more complicated proposal was hardly ever made in this House. It has been introduced with that rare ability of which the right hon. Gentleman has given so many proofs. We all admire the talent which he has displayed; we all congratulate ourselves on his reappearance among us; and we must all have wished, while listening to him, that he may long remain an ornament to this assembly. Permit me to say it is not just to this House to force this measure upon our immediate consideration. It may be politically—it may be commercially right—it may be financially expedient. On the other hand, while, perhaps, financially inexpedient and commercially dangerous, it may yet be politically right. We have to view it in various aspects. Do not compel us to pronounce a hasty decision. If it be what we hope, what the Government say it is, and just what the country wants, it will lose none of its recommendations by the delay of a week. From what the noble Lord the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs has told us, it appears there is evidently no hurry in bringing in the Reform Bill. Why not give us sufficient time to consider the Budget—to say whether we can or cannot give it a conscientious support? The Government, commanding a majority, may say they will give the House and the country no opportunity of examining their proposals, but in pursuing such a course, I am convinced they will gain neither in time nor in credit.

MR. BASS was surprised to hear so eminent an authority in commercial matters urging the necessity for delay. Many branches of trade had been suspended for weeks, owing to the uncertainty that had prevailed as to the intentions of the Government. He thought the commercial world would have no difficulty in making up their minds by Friday.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON : Since we understand from the noble Lord (Lord John Russell) that the discussion of the financial scheme is under any circumstances to precede the introduction of the Reform Bill, we are relieved from any practical difficulty as to Monday week ; and, as it is very unpleasant to commence a discussion of this sort with a dispute as to the time at which it should commence, I would suggest to the noble Lord at the head of the Government, as an arrangement likely to be acceded to by all parties, that he should name that day for the consideration of the Budget.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, he was very unwilling to make any change in the day which had been stated, but there was some advantage in appointing a day that was unanimously agreed upon, and therefore, although he thought it was a pity not to take the discussion on Friday, the Government would agree to take it on Monday week, with an understanding on both sides that the business should afterwards go on regularly day by day.

Motion agreed to.

House resumed.

Resolution to be reported on Monday next.

SUPPLY.—ARMY ESTIMATES. COMMITTEE.

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT moved a Resolution granting the sum of £407,649, to cover the excess of expenditure over the Army Estimates of 1859, explaining that this apparent difference arose partly from the payment of certain sums due from the Indian Government for the supply of stores not having fallen within the year, and partly also from the extra expenditure upon the manufacturing establishments which supplied various sorts of warlike material. There was a large item for excess of forage supplied to the regiments of cavalry which were intended to have been sent abroad, but countermanded.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, that this was another example of the inaccurate mode of framing Estimates, which rendered it impossible for any Minister to guarantee that the sums named by him to the House would not be exceeded. He had not the slightest faith in the statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer that not more than a revenue of £70,000,000 would be required. The estimate for the levying and embodying militia in this very Vote now moved was put down at £150,000 ; but what was the fact ? No less a sum than £821,000 had been expended on the embodied militia. The truth was, he believed, that the excess of particular Votes was, with the consent of certain members of the Government, who possessed the power to give it, handed over to purposes entirely different from those for which it was voted by the House of Commons. He earnestly protested against a system so unconstitutional. If such a system were to be acted upon, the functions of that House would be superseded. The naval expenditure was always brought before the House in a clear and explicit manner, and he could not understand why information equally decisive should not be afforded by the military Departments. Either the whole responsibility of the public expenditure should be thrown on the Government or the law ought to be altered.

GENERAL PEELE did not wish to shirk any responsibility which properly attached to him, but he begged to remind the House that the Army Estimates for 1858-9, which were now under discussion, though passed under the Government of Lord Derby, were prepared by their predecessors. An excess occurred upon only one Vote. There were at that time 30,000 militia embodied, but the entire sum taken for their pay and allowances was no more than £150,000. The first thing he did was to disembodied 10,000, and by retaining the remaining 20,000 he was enabled to send to India 10,000 additional troops, whose arrival there was one of the principal means of putting an end to the mutiny. 130,000 men were voted as the British establishment for the year. That force would have required at least a sum of £4,321,000, but the House voted only £3,681,027.

The fact was that the Army Estimates could never be depended upon so long as the liabilities of one year were carried over to the expenditure of the next, and the deficit in 1858-9 was caused mainly by the non-payment of a debt of £400,000 due by the East India Company. He trusted the House would agree to the Vote now proposed.

COLONEL DUNNE wished to know what had become of the stores supplied to the Indian Government at the close of the mutiny and not used? He did not think it possible to conceive waste like that which had taken place in disposing of the surplus stores after the Crimean war.

COLONEL DICKSON said, that he thought the money which had been spent on the militia had been literally thrown into the dirt. When he saw these monstrous sums voted for the military expenditure of the country, he thought that at least some return should be found for it. He hoped the militia about to be disembodied would be allowed to receive fourteen days' pay, as was done on a late occasion. He hoped the Secretary of War would at least treat the militia with common justice, and not deprive the militia officers of the only advantage they were likely to reap from having joined that corps.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY could not make out why, when £821,000 were spent on the embodied militia, though £150,000 only were voted, a Supplemental Estimate was not brought before the House.

LORD BURGHLEY observed, that a large number of men belonging to the militia, who had served on permanent duty abroad and at home for two years, and were perfectly acquainted with their duty, would leave early in March. Unless some inducement were offered, these men would leave the service altogether, and he trusted that the Government would not, merely to save a small bounty, let these men leave the militia when their time of service was up.

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT confessed that there was great difficulty in distinguishing between the Votes for the Militia and the Line. He thought it would be much better to do away with the separate head for the embodied Militia and place it along with that relating to the troops of the Line whose number was annually voted by Parliament; but it would be impossible to form an exact estimate in these two Votes, or adhere exactly to the proportion fixed in the first instance as between the regular forces and the embodied Militia. With regard to the circular issued by the War Office, it mentioned specifically that the men upon disembodiment were to receive fourteen days' pay, and the subaltern officers six months' pay. At a time of great exigency, commissions were granted to Militia officers who brought a certain number of volunteers into the Line; but it was impossible to continue that privilege now, except by adopting one of three courses—first, by stinting the grant commissions without purchase to old and dis-serving non-commissioned officers; secondly, by diminishing the number of commissions without purchase given as prizes at Sandhurst; or thirdly, by moving in this House for a Vote enabling the War Office to buy commissions and present them to these Militia officers.

LORD BURGHLEY thought it was unjust to depart from the promises which had been originally held out by refusing to give commissions to young officers, who, after a service of some years in the Militia, were now totally unfitted for any other employment.

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT believed that these young men were all the better for having enjoyed the advantages of military discipline, and that they would never regret the years they had spent in the Militia.

PUBLIC BILLS.—2nd Indictable Offences (Metropolitan District).

INDICTABLE OFFENCES (METROPOLITAN DISTRICT) BILL.

LORD CHELMSFORD, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said the principle of the measure had been sanctioned on three different occasions by the other

House of Parliament. There had never been a hostile vote against it, and though it had not passed into a law, that was in consequence of circumstances wholly unconnected with the merits of the measure. One of the Bills introduced into the other House had been sent before a Select Committee, where competent witnesses, including such men as Mr. Humphreys, the eminent solicitor, a man of great ability and experience in criminal cases, and Mr. Alderman Wire, the late Lord Mayor, were examined. The effect of their evidence was, that at least in the metropolitan districts grand juries were not only unnecessary, but in many cases positively mischievous; and they expressed cordial approval of the Bill. The present Bill was the same in principle. It would be recollected that in the course of last year a Bill was introduced to remedy a very serious evil, arising from parties going secretly before grand juries and preferring Bills of indictment in particular cases against individuals, in order to serve purposes of extortion [Vexatious Indictments Bill]. That Bill was now the law of the land, and, following in its footsteps, he now proposed that within the limits of the metropolitan police district no person should be allowed to prefer such Bills before a secret tribunal. He proposed that within the metropolitan police district no criminal charge should be tried before the Central Criminal Court, or any other Court, unless there had been a previous investigation before a magistrate. Their Lordships were aware that in the metropolitan districts there were police courts, presided over by a body of stipendiary magistrates, gentlemen selected from the legal profession, and that in their courts everything that was done took place in public. The witnesses were examined openly, and all the proceedings preliminary to the trial of persons in a higher court were known to the public. All those proceedings were open and public. They were not only known to the parties in attendance, but were made the subjects of reports in the public journals and circulated throughout the country. The parties charged were thus enabled to become cognizant of and to sift the evidence of their accusers; and the magistrate took all care that there was a sufficient prima facie case to send the accused for trial. The depositions taken at those preliminary inquiries were sent to the court at which the trial was to take place, to enable the proper officer to prepare the indictment, to assist the Judge in the course of the trial, and to be at the service of the prisoner, who by their means was able to check or contradict the witnesses if they varied from the evidence they had given before the magistrate. One would think that this was enough of preliminary inquiry before the trial took place. But no—before the trial could take place, or the prisoner be discharged, another process intervened. Twenty-three gentlemen, collected indiscriminately from the district, were assembled in a private chamber, an oath of secrecy was administered to them, and there they received from time to time the different indictments which had been prepared. They were generally persons unversed in legal proceedings; they had nothing to direct their investigation except the feeble light afforded by the indictment; they had no notion how they were to conduct the investigation, and they had therefore to grope their way almost in darkness; sometimes through a labyrinth of complicated facts which would perplex the judgment of much more experienced persons. If they found a true Bill, they merely repeated the decision of the magistrates who sent the prisoner for trial; and if they threw out the Bill, the great probability was, that they committed a grave error and hindered the course of public justice. That was the view which the late Lord Denman took, and on which he contended that the institution was superfluous. It was not to be wondered at that it frequently happened that Bills sent before grand juries at the Central Criminal Court were ignored, to the surprise of the Judges who had the depositions before them, of the magistrates who committed the prisoners for trial, of the prosecutors who knew the facts, and even the prisoners themselves. The grand jury, in fact, had been called the hope of the London thief. He (Lord Chelmsford) could not help giving two illustrations of the working of this system—one of which had come within his own experience when he was a law officer of the Crown, and the other was communicated to him by the late Mr. Pashley. The first case was one of very considerable interest. A medical officer who was attending the paupers in a lunatic asylum was struck by one of them. He immediately ordered the pauper to be taken to a shower-bath, and kept under that treatment for half-an-hour. The shower-bath was a mode of medical treatment which, properly administered, had often very beneficial effect; but half-an-hour seemed to be an extraordinary time to subject a person to one. The poor man, after being there for twenty-eight minutes, was taken out. The medical man, after giving the directions, left the asylum. When the man was taken from the bath he was in a dreadful state, and he died in half-an-hour afterwards. An inquest was held on the body; but the jury appeared not to have gone much into the case, for they returned a verdict of accidental death. When he (Lord Chelmsford) heard of the matter, he directed further inquiry to be made, and the case was eventually sent for trial. He thought that even for the interest of the medical man himself, it was a case which ought to be brought before a jury, and that it would be better for him that a full and public investigation should be made, where he might have an opportunity of defending himself, than that the matter should be stifled. He (Lord Chelmsford) was prepared to appear as counsel for the prosecution, all the preliminary preparations had been made for proceeding with the trial on the following morning, but the grand jury—whether the case was not presented before them in the same light, or that the witnesses omitted material facts—but the jury ignored the Bill, and the matter fell to the ground. Now, he submitted to their Lordships that that was a case which in every view of it demanded the solemnity of a trial. Sometimes witnesses might honestly forget important facts, but sometimes, also, witnesses might be tampered with and induced to withhold or vary their evidence before the grand jury. The other case was one which had been communicated to him by the late Mr. Pashley. Two men were charged with stealing bottles of ale from their masters, and a third person was charged with receiving the same. To the surprise of the prosecutor the grand jury ignored the Bill; and it was afterwards stated that the counsel of two of the prisoners had recommended their clients to plead "Guilty." The prosecutor was not satisfied, and preferred another indictment. This time the grand jury returned true Bills, and bench warrants were issued. One man absconded, another was convicted, and the receiver was acquitted. It was not only a few persons who desired a change of system, but for some time past it had been the custom for grand juries themselves to make presentations, setting forth their inutility under present circumstances. He would also remind their Lordships of the inconvenience, delay, and expense at present caused by the necessity of taking all witnesses before the grand jury, keeping large numbers of persons hanging about the Old Bailey for perhaps two or three days before their case came under the notice of the grand jury, and then, if bills were found, having to wait two or three days longer to give evidence at the final trial. The expense of this was considerable; for though the allowance to a witness was only 3s. 6d. a day, yet when that came to be multiplied by hundreds for several days at a time, and that there were twelve sessions in the year, the House would see that this would accumulate into a large sum. In fact, they were so great that persons often did not appear, to the great prejudice of justice. Having thus stated what he believed to be the inconvenience of the present system, he hoped their Lordships would be of opinion that the measure he proposed was a remedial one to which they could give their sanction. He did not wish to conceal from their Lordships that various objections would be urged against the Bill. He should, no doubt, be told that his measure would be a deathblow to one of our most venerable institutions and one of the greatest safe-guards of the liberty of the subject. No one had a greater veneration than himself for our ancient institutions, but his respect would not prevent him from applying a reforming hand in cases where time had impaired or destroyed the usefulness of the institution. He admitted that there had been circumstances in which the grand jury had been and might be again, a bulwark of the liberty of the subject; but this referred to political trials, and was certainly quite unnecessary in ordinary trials. It was never intended that the measure should be applied to the former class of cases, and in order to avoid all complaints upon that head he had, by the 8th section of the Bill, excluded all kinds of political offences from its operation. Other persons might object that the Bill, if passed, would be but a prelude to the abolition of grand juries throughout the country; but that certainly was not any desire of his, nor did he believe it would be a consequence of the passing of his Bill. He thought that it was very advantageous to have the country gentlemen interposing in the administration of public justice, and that providing for the exceptional case of the metropolis would not affect the existence of grand juries in other parts of the country. His object was to deal with cases where there had been a preliminary investigation before professional and experienced magistrates. Then again it was said that the metropolitan police district was not co-extensive with the Central Criminal Court, and that though the stipendiary magistrates in the metropolis might be trusted with the preparation of cases for trial, yet the same argument did not apply to the City, where the Aldermen of the City were magistrates, or the outlying districts of Kent, Surrey, and Essex, where country gentlemen acted as magistrates. His noble and learned Friend on the woolsack, he believed, entertained some doubt as to the prudence of intrusting the Aldermen of the City of London with preliminary investigations without the subsequent interposition of a grand jury. Certainly, if that doubt were to prevail, it would be fatal to the Bill, as it would be absurd to attempt to pass it as a metropolitan measure, from which the metropolitan city was excepted. He must, however, say that the conduct of the Aldermen in the investigation of crime would bear comparison with that of the police magistrates; and the late Lord Mayor had stated, that an inspection of the returns would show that the results of convictions as compared with acquittals by the City magistrates were about the same as those of the stipendiary magistrates. Considering that the City magistrates acted as openly and publicly as the police magistrates, that reports of the proceedings were circulated as widely, and that the cases brought before them did not involve any nice points of law, but were merely a preliminary adjudication on the facts brought forward in support of the charges, he thought no harm would result if they were intrusted with the same powers of final commitment as were given by the Bill to other magistrates. With regard to the outlying districts included in the operation of the Bill, the cases arising there were few in number, there being only fifty-eight in 1857, while the total number of commitments was 1,372. He admitted, however, that an objection might be urged against his measure with respect to them, inasmuch as those cases were heard in comparative privacy. But it would be excessively inconvenient that a grand jury should be summoned for those cases alone; and, therefore, adopting a suggestion made to him on a former occasion, he had endeavoured, not to obviate the objection, but, in some degree, to meet it by providing that in those cases commitments of two magistrates sitting publicly in the court or room where special sessions were generally heard, should have the like effect in those outlying districts as the commitments of the police magistrates. He thought, then, that if this did not entirely get rid of the objection, it so far diminished its cogency that it ought not to be held fatal to a measure the main principle of which had met on former occasions with the sanction of both Houses of Parliament. He trusted therefore that their Lordships would now accede to the second reading. In Committee he hoped for the assistance of his noble and learned Friends to make the measure as perfect as possible, his only wish being to remedy the acknowledged evils of the grand jury system within the limits of the metropolis.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he by no means intended to oppose the second reading of the Bill. The question, however, was attended with considerable difficulty, and required that they should proceed with caution. He entirely approved the provision that there should be no indictment in the Central Criminal Court until after an investigation before a magistrate. It was the boast of this country that its criminal law was not vested in the Government, but that any individual might put it in motion. There was, however, a great hardship that any person should be able to put it in motion without the intervention of a magistrate or any public officer; and none whatever in defining how he should be permitted to do it, and in enacting that no indictment should be preferred before a grand jury until after a preliminary investigation. At present any person, acting behind the back of the person whom he wished to oppress, could prefer an indictment for perjury, conspiracy, or obtaining money under false pretences, to the grand jury, and, if a true Bill were returned upon his ex parte statement, he might imprison the defendant upon a warrant. A remedy had already been applied in regard to a class of cases chiefly liable to this abuse, and he (the Lord Chancellor) would be glad now to see such a remedy extended. But the proposal to abolish grand juries altogether within the metropolitan limits was a very serious one. He had no objection to dispense with them where, before the prisoner's committal, there had been an examination by a trained lawyer. Such a measure, he believed, would be safe and practicable. In Scotland, for example, there was no grand jury; the public prosecutor, through his deputies, examining each case, and determining whether a person should or should not be brought to trial; and on a comparison between the English and Scotch systems he believed that the advantage was on the side of the latter. But the Scotch system was founded on a preliminary investigation by a trained magistrate, who was a perfect master of his work. What alarmed him was that his noble and learned Friend was unable to confine his measure to commitments by trained police magistrates. The Lord Mayor and Aldermen, or any one of them, and any two justices of the peace within a considerable area around the metropolis, might under the Bill commit a person for trial without the intervention of a jury. Now, he did not assert that this was a fatal objection to the Bill, for he hoped his noble and learned Friend would endeavour to overcome it. He (the Lord Chancellor) had a sincere respect for the City magistrates, believing them to be very effective and very earnest in their attempt to do what was right; but it was rather bold to declare that the judgment of an Alderman, however respectable, or of two magistrates appointed by the Lord Lieutenant of a county should be held to be equivalent to the judgment of twelve grand jurymen. His noble and learned Friend said that difficult questions did not arise in cases which came before the City magistrates; but that was a mistake, because not merely questions of fact, but nice points of law might present themselves, to the proper consideration of which a single Alderman, however respectable, would not be equal. Again, the Lord Lieutenant of Middlesex must occasionally put incompetent men into the commission of the peace, and according to the Bill any two of them might send a person to trial for a disgraceful offence without investigation by a grand jury. Their Lordships would remember that Lord Shaftesbury was saved from a scaffold by the intervention of such a tribunal; for if a true Bill had been returned by the grand jury, he would have been brought before the High Steward and a packed jury of this House, and his fate, no doubt, would have been sealed. He did not think that in these times there was much apprehension of the recurrence of such a state of things; but he wished to draw the attention of the noble and learned Lord to this point; because, in making the exception with regard to political offences, he had used phraseology "offences against the Queen," which legally applied to all public offences, all these being offences against the Queen. In conclusion, he would express his concurrence in the second reading of the Bill, and his desire to do all in his power to assist in removing objections to some of its clauses in Committee.

LORD BROUGHAM said, he entirely agreed that the Bill ought to be read a second time, and the difficulties which had been adverted to, got over, if possible, in Committee. When, about twenty-six or twenty-seven years ago, he had the good fortune to obtain the sanction of Parliament to the Act establishing the Central Criminal Court, it was then certainly in his contemplation to make very considerable changes with respect to the grand jury system. One part of the plan was that there should be a public prosecutor for the Central Criminal Court—and, indeed, he considered that the appointment of officers of that kind should be general throughout the country. The evidence taken in the Committee, on which his learned and able Friend (Mr. Phillimore) presided, had thrown great light upon this subject, and greatly strengthened the reasons which induced him in 1834 to form this resolution. His intention certainly was not to encroach so entirely as the present Bill did on the functions of the grand jury; but, nevertheless, he conceived that the peculiarity of the London police district in having magistrates, professional men, appointed by a responsible Government, made a very great difference between that district and other districts of the country where it might still be fitting and proper that grand juries should be continued. He thought that if the present measure were carried, after due regard had been paid in Committee to the objections and difficulties pointed out, it would accomplish the great objects in view at the time of the establishment of the Central Criminal Court, the only defect of the measure being the want of a public prosecutor. He had himself known a Member of their Lordships' House to be dragged before a grand jury and a bill to be found against him, when there was not the shadow of a pretence for it. The bill was preferred by a person to whom the noble Lord had advanced large sums of money; and, because he refused to advance more, advantage was taken of the constitution of the City grand jury, and their disposition to signalize themselves by finding a bill against the first merchant perhaps in the world, and a time was chosen when one grand jury, it was supposed, would find a bill more easily than another. The bill was found, and the demand for money was repeated. The noble Lord preferred undergoing a trial at Guildhall to yielding to the demand, and he was honourably and triumphantly acquitted, and the object of the person prosecuting him was frustrated. The grand jury was often a cloak and cover for the exercise of malignant passions where there was no officer individually responsible as in Scotland, and he therefore fully approved of the clause by which it was proposed to enact that no bill should be preferred without a preliminary examination before a magistrate. He regarded this as an imperfect substitute for the responsible officer. But he would repeat, that the appointment of a public prosecutor who could prevent all improper proceedings, was the true remedy for all the inconveniences that had been referred to.

LORD WENSLEYDALE said, his principal objection to the Bill was that it might be used as a ground for abolishing the grand jury, which he regarded as a valuable institution, altogether. It was a great protection against improper prosecutions that a man could not be tried without the agreement of twelve men that a trial ought to take place. He might, indeed, be acquitted on his trial, but if the bill were thrown out by the grand jury he would stand much clearer in public opinion. Nevertheless, as he had urged his objections to such a measure as the present ineffectually last Session, he should not now oppose the second reading, but would give his best assistance in Committee to remove what might be deemed objectionable.

LORD CRANWORTH said, he would make one suggestion to the noble and learned Lord who had introduced this Bill. As he proposed to retain grand juries at the sessions to be held four times a year, for which the most important cases were reserved, it might be well that the prisoners committed by justices in the outlying parts of the metropolitan district should also be tried on those occasions, with the aid of the grand jury. They would not be detained longer than the prisoners in the rural counties of England usually were, waiting their trial at the quarter sessions or assizes.

LORD CHELMSFORD said, he would endeavour to obviate the various objection in Committee.

Bill read 2^o; and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

THE RED RIVER SETTLEMENT.

QUESTION.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON rose, to inquire what is the Intention of Her Majesty's Government with regard to the Administration of the Red River Settlement, and those parts of the Saskatchewan Districts recommended by the Committee of the House of Commons in 1857, to be withdrawn from the Jurisdiction of the Hudson's Bay Company? In referring to this question the noble Earl said, he would not enter on the larger topic connected with the validity of the charter of the Hudson's Bay Company and the other questions which arise out of it. He had then called the attention of their Lordships to this subject last Session, to the recent expiry of the exclusive licence to trade of the Hudson's Bay Company, and had drawn attention to the influence which the expiry of that licence might indirectly produce upon those territories lying between the United States on the south, and the Indian territories on the north, which, though claimed under the charter, were affected for good or evil by the particular form and system of government adopted in the other parts of the continent. He then suggested that if an early decision were not come to, difficulties and embarrassments likely to grow out of it must be enhanced—difficulties that might arise with regard to the maintenance of law and territory, the introduction of spirits and articles of trade, and the probability of feuds springing up between the Indian tribes and the white men, and between the white men among themselves. On the 31st of May the exclusive licence expired, as the Hudson's Bay Company accepted the serious responsibility of declining to renew it on the terms proposed by his right hon. Friend Sir E. Lytton. The Government then at the close of last Session, took, and wisely so, powers under an Act for the appointment of magistrates in the Red River Settlements and parts of the Saskatchewan districts, and for securing a more effectual system of criminal administration. He wished to know whether any steps had been taken, and if any what, with reference to that Act, whether any advantage had been taken of it—

whether any form of Government had practically replaced that which was swept away when the licensing trade was revoked, and if not, what was the cause of the delay? Communications that had come to him from various quarters left little room to doubt that the present state of affairs in that part of the British North American continent was one calculated to cause some anxiety. There were certain difficulties that pressed at present with reference to the Red River Settlement. In the first place, there was a feeling of very strong dissatisfaction on the part of the colonists themselves, and while at the Colonial Office he received two petitions praying for an extensive alteration in the form of government and general system of administration. In the next place, he understood that a large number of persons who had come to the settlement from Canada refused to pay the duties on the ground that they were not levyable from them, and were raising questions of great legal nicety connected with adjoining territories which, though it was important that they should be determined, ought not to be settled in a hasty or irregular manner. Moreover, since the expiry of the licence last year American citizens had crossed the border and had established an unlicensed and irregular trade, had introduced spirits among the Indian tribes, contributing thereby to the further demoralization of that unhappy people, and were practically under no sort of control or authority whatever. He was not, speaking generally, afraid of American colonization in that part of the world, for he believed that the vast districts south of the 49th degree of latitude offered for many years and generations an ample field for their energy and industry. He had no wish or belief that the stream of colonization could be permanently diverted from its natural course, or be forced into channels which were unnatural and repugnant to it; but he looked at the Red River Settlement as an exceptional case, and he considered it would be an oversight which could never be sufficiently deplored or atoned for on the part of the Government, or of the local authorities, if the sympathies of the Settlement were alienated from the Crown, or that, cut off as they were from the other settled parts of British North America, those sympathies should be drawn to the United States rather than to Canada. There were three roads that connected the Red River Settlement with our other possessions in North America. One connected it on the north with the shores of Hudson's Bay; but owing to the severity of the climate it was only open for two months in the year; a second, that connected it with the westernmost part of Canada, passable at some periods, but at others impracticable, and requiring a certain outlay; and a third leading southwards by the Red River, and in direct communication with the United States. The last route following the course of stream led to St. Paul, in Minnesota, which now was in possession, as he believed, of railway communication, and it was by this route that the greatest amount of the traffic and the chief supply of the necessaries of life for the settlement now passed. Last summer, trade to the value of not less than 1,500,000 dollars passed over this route, into the Red River Settlement from the United States. It was a significant fact that last summer, for the first time, a small steamer made her way up the river into the settlement, and he had read a communication from one of the leading residents of the colony stating that this circumstance had done more to Americanize them than anything else, and that if ever any improvement takes place, it must be from a connection with the United States route. The only alternative or remedy to meet this was to open up communication between Lake Superior and the Red River, and thus to bring the settlement into relation with the other parts of British North America. Again, it was not less worthy of attention that in the Chamber of Commerce at St. Paul, and by a public subscription, an expedition was organized by the Americans to explore, or "prospect," as they termed it, all that part of British North America that was the scene of Captain Palliser's labour last year. These were important questions, and the time in the history of the settlement was critical. Much of the ultimate destiny of the colony, and not only of the colony, but of the British possessions in North America, would depend on the conduct of the Colonial Minister on this question, and on the course taken by the Government within the next few years. Steps ought to be taken for bringing the scattered portions of that great continent into closer connection, all legitimate facilities and encouragement should be given to open up some communication between the Red River Settlement and Canada, and in that settlement at the earliest possible day the administration of the Hudson's Bay should be exchanged for the more satisfactory agency of the Crown. It was more a question of policy than expenditure, as far as this Government was concerned, and he thought there was no necessity for the outlay of any sum of money from the Imperial exchequer for the purpose, although the recent Report of Mr. Dawson showed that it was a colony possessed of great capabilities. The noble Earl concluded by putting his Question.

THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE said, his noble Friend inquired first, what had been done in consequence of an Act passed last Session in reference to the government of what had hitherto been called the licensed territory of the Hudson's Bay Company? Their Lordships would recollect that on the second reading of the Bill he (the Duke of Newcastle) said that it was not his intention to avail himself of its powers unless he found it necessary to do so. He was anxious to disturb as little as possible what existed in the territory, and not to appoint magistrates under the Act unless there was some necessity for them. The noble Earl spoke as if the power of the Hudson's Bay Company was entirely swept away when their licence expired in May last; but though legally swept away, it practically remained in force. The posts of the Company continued in existence, and as the jurisdiction of the Company was primitive and patriarchal, rather than established in exact legal form, it had survived the expiry of the licence, and was sufficient to preserve peace and order among the natives of the district. That power, such as it was, still existed, and until there was a greater population in British Columbia and the colony was more settled, he thought it would be better to postpone bringing the Act into operation. He admitted at once that if, in consequence of the expiration of the licence of the Hudson's Bay Company, traders had introduced spirits among the natives, and thus led to a state of things which ought to be repressed, Her Majesty's Government would deem it incumbent upon them to interfere. Many gentlemen had offered him their services to act as magistrates in that district; but he had not yet exercised the power of appointment which was conferred upon him by the Act of last Session; nor should he do so, unless the introduction of spirits among the Indians or other irregularities and disorders should render it necessary. The noble Earl next asked what steps had been taken with regard to the administration of the Red River Settlement and the Saskatchewan Districts. The noble Earl must be mistaken as to the present state of things there, as the Colonial Office was not in possession of any information of such serious events as he had described. That Canadians and citizens of the United States had wandered across the boundaries of their country and entered those territories there could be no doubt; but he had no knowledge of any proceedings on the part of those persons tending to create an apprehension of evil consequences. As regards practical measures nothing definite had yet been done, but no time had been lost. Until within a very recent period he possessed really little information as to the land available for colonization. It was only three or four weeks ago that he received the concluding portion of Captain Palliser's Report, which bore very importantly upon the subject; but they had now also the valuable document prepared by Mr. Dawson, of Toronto, a native of Canada and a Member of its Legislature, who had devoted much attention to it. At present the Red River Settlement was exceedingly small, being confined to a radius of about 50 miles from Fort Garry, and he apprehended that whenever the Crown took upon itself the responsibility of governing it, it would be desirable to extend the existing boundaries to a considerable degree. An important reason why there should be no hurry in dealing with this question was to be found in the fact that plans for opening up communications between the different settlements had to be considered. There were only three modes of access—one from the north; one from the south, through the territory of the United States; and one from the East, through Canada. It was of great importance that these territories should be colonized by British subjects, and that every facility should be given for the fullest access to them. The scheme advocated by Mr. Dawson in his Report was, he thought, the most likely to tend to the colonization and settlement of these districts that had hitherto been devised, and he entertained sanguine hopes that it might be carried out. It had already met with great encouragement in Canada, and he believed it would be worthy the approval of the Imperial Government. With respect to what was to be done for the future settlement of those districts, his noble Friend must be aware that the first step must be an arrangement with the Hudson's Bay Company, which under its charter exercised a power and jurisdiction over them. He could assure the House it was his earnest desire to arrive at that settlement with the Hudson's Bay Company by amicable means; and he had every hope that such means would prove successful. In the course of the last Session papers were laid on the table in which were certain communications which had taken place between the Governor of the district and the Colonial Secretary, and among them was a letter either to Mr. Labouchere or to Sir Edward Bulwer Lytton—but he thought the latter—in which the Company professed their willingness to give up their jurisdiction over the country with a view of promoting the settlement of the Red River and the Saskatchewan district under Imperial auspices on equitable terms. It would be necessary, in the first place, to ascertain what these equitable terms would be. Having now before them as much information upon the subject as they were likely to obtain, he hoped the result of the amicable arrangement which he was desirous of concluding with the Hudson's Bay Company would accomplish this very desirable object without litigation. If so, the next step would be to devise some simple and inexpensive form of government, and should legislation be necessary for this purpose, it was of course most desirable that it should take place this Session.

ST. GEORGE'S-IN-THE-EAST.

PETITION.

LORD EBURY rose, in pursuance of a notice which he had given last week, for the purpose of laying before their Lordships a Petition emanating from the Vestry of St. George's-in-the-East, complaining of certain ecclesiastical grievances, and of asking their Lordships' attention to it. The noble Lord said, that this petition differed but little from another petition, signed by between 4,000 and 5,000 of the inhabitants of the parish, to which he should have occasion to refer. Substantially they were one and the same petition. The petitioners stated that in the year 1843 Mr. Bryan King was appointed rector of the parish, which contained 48,000 souls. Fortunately, since that time, two districts had been separated from the parish; but still the parish contained a population of 30,000 persons. The petitioners said, that at the time of Mr. King's appointment, their spacious and magnificent church was filled and duly attended by the great body of the parishioners; and the parish was remarkable, to use Mr. King's own words, for its dutiful attachment to the Church of England and its loyalty to the Throne; but that shortly after his appointment the rector began to make use of uncouth practices in the performance of his ministrations. The parishioners remonstrated with Mr. King, but without effect; although the late Bishop of London told the reverend gentleman that he left the matter entirely to his own good sense and discretion. Notwithstanding Mr. King's obstinacy in carrying on the service in a manner offensive to the parishioners, they alleged their conduct had been continuously characterized by courtesy and kindness; that from Mr. King's perseverance in these objectionable practices, they were alienated now for seventeen years from their parish church, during which time the public charities were not duly advocated in the church, greatly to the detriment of the poor. About the year 1855 the Rev. Mr. King introduced a set of strange clergymen into the parish, under the name of "The St. George's Mission," and from that period a marked development had taken place in the practices of which they complained. Dresses were worn such as were only seen in Roman Catholic churches; unusual appliances were resorted to; and doctrines were taught which, in their opinion, were not the doctrines of the Reformed Church of England. They went on to state, that by the 2nd of George II., chapter 3, they were empowered to nominate and elect a lecturer to their church. That in March last year they exercised their right, although the rector endeavoured to prevent their doing so, and compelled them to appeal to the Court of Chancery, which decided in their favour. But from that moment the Rev. Mr. King, by a course of petty annoyances, disturbed the lecturer in the performance of his duties. On application to their diocesan, they found, though he was quite willing, he had no power to grant them any relief; and they, therefore, prayed their Lordships and the Legislature to enact such measures as in their wisdom they should think fit, whereby a cheap and summary remedy might be afforded for the grievances of which they complained. The noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Derby) had last week described with so much truth and precision the feeling that existed all over the country against these attempt to tamper with the simplicity of our services, that he (Lord Ebury) was quite sure it was unnecessary for him to dwell upon that subject. The parishioners complained, and with great truth, that their silence, under the circumstances he had described, had been misconstrued into acquiescence; while the expression of their present disapproval had been characterised as violence and outrage. He now came to the question what was to be done. To that question he did not think an answer was difficult. Their Lordships were aware that everything relating to public worship was regulated by law, by the directions of the Rubrics of the Prayer Book attached to the Act of Uniformity, and of the canons of the Church. If those directions were obsolete, incongruous, contradictory, and impossible to understand, every sensible man would say that the proper thing to do would be to alter the law. He knew the Rev. Mr. King, and he was bound to say that he was a mild and gentlemanly person, very unlikely to act such a part as he had done. The truth was, he was convinced he was acting legally. He (Lord Ebury) should now wish to ask their Lordships whether they had ever read the canons of the Church. If they had not, he would recommend them to do so, assuring them they were literary curiosities well worthy of perusal. But most of them were wholly inapplicable to the present day. With the permission of the House, he would read to them the 74th canon, which would give them some idea of the authority which regulated ecclesiastical questions of this nature. It deserves a little notice:—

“It treats of the dress of the clergy, not during service, but at other times. Clergy are to walk abroad in their gowns and college caps. In their journeys they are to wear cloaks and sleeves without guards, welts, long buttons, or cuts. Further, they must wear no wrought nightcaps, but only plain nightcaps, of black silk, satin, or velvet. In their houses they must wear no dress, that is ‘cut or pinckt.’ Especially they are directed to wear no light-coloured stockings. The canons altogether number 141, not 10 are observed by the clergy as a body, the rest are obsolete, impracticable, obscure. What reasonable objection can there be to the appointment of a Commission to correct and revise them? If a Commission composed of eminent divines and ecclesiastical lawyers were appointed by the Crown to draw up a few plain short rules or canons, regulating the furniture of our churches, the dress of our ministers, and other matters which must be regulated and settled, many of the dissensions which now agitate our Church would cease.”

concurred. But were their Lordships entirely free from blame in this matter? He feared he must say not altogether. Two years ago he proposed to their Lordships to address the Crown, to appoint a Commission with the object of revising the Rubrics and Canons, and he believed that if it had then been granted, many of these complaints, now heard, would have been prevented. It was his intention to renew that Motion in the course of the present Session; but, as he had ascertained it would be inconvenient for the right rev. Prelates to attend before Easter, he should postpone his Motion until after the Easter recess. St. George's-in-the-East was unfortunately by no means the only church where these difficulties prevailed, and therefore it was highly necessary that some such step should be taken. He had intended in the meantime to bring in a short Bill to give a summary remedy, by leaving the matter in the hands of the Ordinary, but as he understood a Member of the other House was about to bring forward a measure, he should allow him to deal with it; but he did hope that some effectual remedy would be devised in the course of the present Session for putting a stop to the painful circumstances to which he had referred.

THE BISHOP OF EXETER said, that if any complaint had been made to their Lordships that the ordinary expedients of justice had been resorted to in this case and had failed, then there might be some reason why some special remedy should be devised to meet the evil:—but he did not understand that to be the case here. The noble Lord had adverted to some things which he deemed objectionable in the services of St. George's-in-the-East; but it was very doubtful whether they were really offences against the law. On the contrary, he believed that the clergyman had distinctly acted according to the law. He had, no doubt, pursued a course that was contrary to the wishes of the parishioners, but it did not follow that he had offended in any point against the law. He had no acquaintance with Mr. King, having only met him on business before the Committee on Spiritual Destitution, where he showed great zeal in reference to the spiritual wants of the people; but he had been assured that in all he had done to provoke the vestry and the people he was only obeying the directions given in his charge of 1842 by the late Bishop. The noble Lord had talked about vestments; but as far as he (the Bishop of Exeter) could learn, the vestments which had been referred to were distinctly according to law. They were vestments which he should be sorry to see generally adopted, but they were, nevertheless, strictly according to law. A clergyman was not bound to use such vestments till they were put before him by the officers of the parish; but when that was done he was only acting within the strict line of his duty when he did use them. It appeared that the rector of St. George's-in-the-East left off the vestments at the request of the parishioners. They had not been given to him by the officers of the parish, but by private individuals, and therefore he was not bound to use them. Had they been given to him by the officers of the vestry, he would have been bound to use them. As to the turnings round and genuflections resorted to at certain portions of the prayers, he must say he did not like these things; but it was to be observed that, at the suggestion of the diocesan, he had given up these things. He repeated, that it was a mistake to suppose that these things were not within reach of the existing law. If a clergyman chose to persist in anything that was improper he might be admonished by the Bishop, and if after such admonition he still persisted, he might be proceeded against under the Church Discipline Act. But had the Parliament shown any disposition to confer further powers on the Bishop? No such thing. What was asked for in the petition presented by the noble Lord was what had been asked for by the bench of Bishops for the last ten years—namely, a cheaper, more ready, and effectual mode of correcting irregularities of any kind in clergymen, whether relating to matters of doctrine or of manners. That had been asked for again and again, and the Bishops were still willing to receive the boon at the hands of Parliament. The noble Lord naturally laid great stress on the petition which had been entrusted to him to present; but he (the Bishop of Exeter) had seen another petition, which was carried about the parish for signature, addressed not to their Lordships, nor to the other House of Parliament, but directly to Her Gracious Majesty; and it prayed Her Majesty of her own Royal authority to issue a Commission, which should have power to inquire into the conduct of clergymen, and if need were to displace them from their benefices. He was almost ashamed to waste the time of their Lordships with any allusion to such trumpery; but he would remind them that, trumpery as these things were in themselves, they contained within them the seeds of great danger. Had they no experience on that point? Had the history told them nothing? Had the history of their own country no instruction for them in these matters? He would remind their Lordships of what occurred eighty years ago, in the commotion that was raised in this country by the cry of "No Popery"—on even less apparent grounds than the commotion that was raised now. That commotion went on, just as now commotion went on in St. George's-in-the-East. Nothing was done, just as now nothing was done. The police did not interfere, the Secretaries of State of that day did not see need for interfering, and they all knew what was the consequence. And who were the persons who led those riots? We may fancy that all is safe, because they were mere boys, who are chiefly engaged in the present disorders. It was only the other day he was reading a book which all their Lordships had probably read with delight,—the last "Memoirs of Horace Walpole;" and he stated that of twenty-seven persons who were executed for fire raising and the other capital offences which grew out of that riot, seventeen were under eighteen years of age, three were under fifteen, and two were women. They could not, therefore, treat these events with scorn and contempt, for their Lordships might depend upon it that these matters had a tendency to extend; and if they were not put down at once they might prepare for a repetition of those incidents which took place in 1780. He understood that on a former occasion the noble and learned Lord (Lord Brougham) had half recommended that the church should be shut up. Why, he understood it had been shut up already, and they had seen with what effect. He understood, indeed, that the noble and learned Lord was in the first place for trying all that the law could do; and he (the Bishop of Exeter) said the same thing. Let them try anything rather than abandon the law. He ventured to say that the power to shut up a church did not reside in any authority known to the law of England. It was, in fact, to put the parish under an interdict; and though he believed even that strong step might be taken under certain circumstances, yet those circumstances were not likely to occur, and certainly nothing like them had yet occurred. He hoped Her Majesty's Government would be able to lay before the House the petition to Her Majesty to which he had referred, and he intended to move for its production.

LORD BROUGHAM said, what he meant to have stated was, that at all events the law must be put in force, and that, at all hazards, this great scandal was to be put down; and he added that if there were no other way he would even shut up the church; but in saying so he clearly meant that it should be done by legal authority. There was great excitement on this subject both in the eastern and western parts of the metropolis, and if these proceedings were not put a stop to it would spread. There was nothing more to be deprecated than the introduction into this country of that which in the United States had not yet lasted long enough to have received the name of a domestic institution—he meant Lynch-law. He had the greatest horror of it, whether as applied to churchmen or laymen. There were instances of this excitement extending to the west-end of the town. He had received letters from Kensington and parts of Marylebone on the subject—some of them anonymous, but others bearing the signatures of respectable persons. One of these had been so led away by the heat of this lamentable controversy as to have charged him (Lord Brougham) with being a Romanist, and another with being no longer a friend of liberty, because he had happened to state that the genuflexions and turning about of the clergy at St. George's-in-the-East might be right or they might be wrong, but that he could not presume to blame any clergyman who conscientiously believed it to be his duty to perform those evolutions. He did not say those practices were right or they were wrong; it was no business of his to do so; he had no right to censure any person for having recourse to them: all he said was, that, whether the rector of St. George's-in-the-East was right or wrong was altogether immaterial; that a mob had no right to interfere, or to resort to physical force to settle the question.

THE BISHOP OF LONDON said, it would be satisfactory to their Lordships to know that the service at this unhappy church of St. George's-in-the-East yesterday evening passed off quietly. He was bound, however, to say that that result, at least partly, arose from sixty policemen having been stationed inside the church. It was certainly a sad state of things that the authorities should be driven to have recourse to such a step. He said on a former occasion that he was unwilling to express an opinion as to who was to blame in this unfortunate matter, and he was not going now to discuss that question; but, if he might do so from his place in that House, he would most earnestly put it to all clergymen who had any tendency to the use of those vestments to which reference had been made, as a matter of conscience, not to irritate the feelings of the Protestant congregations who were placed under their charge. It did seem strange that any person who was intrusted with the care of souls in a parish should, for the sake of gratifying his own peculiar tastes, or the tastes of any section of his congregation, have recourse to practices in conducting Divine service calculated to offend or alienate the great body of the parishioners. He believed his revered predecessor did express to the Rev. Bryan King that there was no obligation on him to persist in the practices in question, in consequence of what was stated in 1842 in the charge of the right rev. Prelate. He wished to add a few words upon the subject of vestments, and the state of the law as laid down by his right rev. Brother (the Bishop of Exeter), to whose experience he would willingly bow, but that he feared young clergymen might be misled by his statements, to take it for granted that those vestments, which he (the Bishop of London) could not help calling foolish vestments, were even within the letter of the law. His belief was that it was exceedingly doubtful whether those vestments as used at St. George's-in-the-East could be identified with the vestments named in the old law; and however that fact might be, those vestments had been set aside by one of the canons—those canons which the noble Lord (Lord Ebury) was so anxious to abolish—which prescribe those plain vestments which were now universally used by all the clergy of the Church of England, except an infinitesimal fraction. It was not necessary to issue any Commission to alter the canons. It was not the canons themselves, but the canons interpreted by the Courts, together with a number of precedents, that constituted the law of the Church of England; and with respect to the dress of the clergy in their own homes, the canon respecting which had been cited by his noble friend (Lord Ebury), the interpretation of the Courts had long ago set that aside. If his noble Friend succeeded in procuring the abrogation of the canons, did he propose to ask Her Majesty to give authority to Convocation to make new canons, as the old ones had been passed by that body? It would be well to consider the point before proceeding in so delicate a matter. He was anxious that the occurrences at St. George's-in-the-East should not be mixed up with other matters, and that an appeal should be made to the common sense of all parties concerned in those unhappy occurrences. He repeated that if the clergy would place in his hands the management of the affair, he felt confident that he could bring the church into the state which all must desire to see it in. He was bound to add that the clergy of that parish had made some changes in consequence of his remonstrances, and he was sure, if they would only act upon his advice, the unfortunate scandals now complained of would soon cease.

EARL GRANVILLE regretted to say that the evening service at St. George's last night was not quite so satisfactory as the right rev. Prelate had been informed. Although the presence of the police prevented violent disorders, yet there was hissing, simulated coughing, and other scandalous conduct. He sincerely hoped that all offenders would be brought to justice, and that those whose indiscreet zeal had given rise to those scenes would listen to the advice of the right rev. Prelate.

THE BISHOP OF EXETER said, he could not understand why the statutes quoted by his right rev. Brother on a former evening had not been put in force. One of those statutes prescribed a certain course to be taken by magistrates before whom persons offending were taken. Now, hissing in a church was an "outrage," notwithstanding the dictum of a high authority to the contrary, and if there were sixty policemen present while a number of persons were hissing and making noises he could only say that those policemen neglected their duty if they did not arrest the offenders.

EARL GRANVILLE observed, that there were hundreds of persons making peculiar noises, but under such circumstances, that it was perfectly impossible for the police to fix upon any one offender.

ALTERATIONS IN THE PRAYER BOOK.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

LORD EBURY moved an Address for a Statement of all Alterations made in the Book of Common Prayer by the Queen's Printer since Easter, 1859, in consequence of the passing of the 22nd of Victoria, cap. 2; by whose Orders they were made; and whether such Changes extended to any Part of that Portion of the Prayer-Book which was attached to the 13th and 14th of Charles II., cap. 2, or of those Copies of the Prayer-Book commonly called the Sealed Books, the authority by which the 20th of June was inserted in the Table of Solemn Days appended to the Table of Fasts at the Beginning of the Book of Common Prayer. Also, that there be laid before this House Copy of a Memorial presented to The Archbishop of Canterbury in the Year 1851 from certain Clergymen of the English Church, praying for Alterations in the Burial Service as by Law established, together with the Names of those who signed it; and his Grace's reply thereto.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR reminded the noble Lord that the memorial of which he desired a copy had been presented, not to the Crown, but to the Archbishop of Canterbury. How was the House to require the most rev. Prelate to furnish it with a copy?

LORD EBURY said, he would not press that portion of his Motion, especially as he was informed by the most rev. Prelate that he could not find the memorial in question.

THE EARL OF DERBY was glad the noble and learned Lord on the woolsack had urged this objection. He was at a loss to understand by what process the noble Lord expected to obtain these returns. He surely could not mean either that the House should address the Queen to order the Archbishop to give the papers, or that this House should itself lay its commands on the Archbishop.

Motion for Statement agreed to.

Motion for Copy of Memorial (by Leave of the House) withdrawn.

House adjourned at Eight o'clock, till To-morrow, half-past Ten o'clock.

MINUTES.] NEW WRITS ISSUED.—For Ennis, The Right hon. John David FitzGerald, one of the Judges of the Court of Queen's Bench in Ireland; for Cork County, Rickard Deasy, esquire, Attorney General for Ireland.

PUBLIC BILLS.—1^o Conveyance of Voters, &c.

RETIREMENT OF MR. JUSTICE PERRIN.

QUESTION.

MR. LONG said, he wished to ask the reason of the retirement of Mr. Justice Perrin?

MR. CARDWELL said, he was sure the hon. Gentleman would be extremely sorry to know that the cause was ill-health. The learned Judge, being prevented by the state of his health from discharging the duties which he had so honorably discharged for twenty-five years, and being unable to go the approaching circuit, had thought proper to resign.

LIEUTENANTS OF THE ROYAL NAVY.

QUESTION.

LORD JOHN BROWNE said, he rose to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether any reply has been given to the Memorial of the Lieutenants of the Royal Navy, presented in December last; whether it is the intention of the Board of Admiralty to increase the pay and half-pay of those Officers, so as to place them more nearly on a position of equality with the Masters and the non-executive Officers of the Royal Navy of the same rank; and whether it is intended to allow their service in the Coast-guard to count as sea time?

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, the Memorial was received and taken into consideration by the Admiralty, although no official acknowledgment was sent. It was not intended to increase the full pay of those Officers, but when the Vote for half-pay was before the House in Committee of Supply he would explain the intentions of the Government with regard to the half-pay of Lieutenants.

THE NEWFOUNDLAND FISHERIES.

QUESTION.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the English and French Commissioners sent to Newfoundland last year to investigate the questions so long at issue between the two Governments with respect to the Fisheries, have made recommendations which are likely to be accepted by both Governments, and to lead to a final and satisfactory arrangement?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, that the French and English Commissioners made separate Reports to their respective Governments. He approved generally of the recommendations of the English Commissioners; but he was not in a situation to know whether the French Government would agree to a measure founded upon those recommendations. The Commissioners generally had agreed upon all the points except some of no great importance; but it was proposed to send Captain Dunlop to Paris to have some personal communication with the French Government on the subject.

FRENCH CUSTOMS TARIFF.

QUESTION.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, he understood it would be inconvenient to give a Return of the French Tariff of Customs Duties now in force; but he should be glad to know whether the Government could not supply the information in some other shape?

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, that by the 3rd Article of the Treaty of Commerce certain differential duties in favour of French shipping were recognized; he wished to ask the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade whether he proposes to make any statement as to what these differential duties are?

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he wished to remind the right hon. Gentleman that the other evening he (Mr. Newdegate) had asked when the changes in the tariffs of foreign countries, which are in preparation in his office, will be laid upon the table; also when the changes in the colonial tariffs will be before them?

MR. MILNER GIBSON, in reply, said that he had already stated that the changes in the rate of duty on foreign tariffs were in preparation, and he could give no further information at present. He understood that the colonial tariffs were under preparation also. The reason why the delay had taken place in the production of the papers relating to the change in the duties of foreign tariffs was, because they were made up to the close of last year instead of to August: with regard to the question of the hon. Baronet (Sir S. Northcote), the whole French tariff would be so voluminous that it would not be desirable to lay it on the Table of the House, but the Government had in preparation a paper containing the rates of duty on all articles of British produce and manufacture, which would shortly be laid on the Table, specifying also what would be the maximum duties, supposing the Treaty to be adopted by Parliament. With regard to the question of the noble Lord (Lord J. Manners) as to the differential duties mentioned in the third article of the Treaty, his answer was that the differential duties might be considered part of the French navigation laws. So far as the direct trade between England and France was concerned, which would grow up under the Treaty, there were no differential duties, and English ships going to France and carrying British manufactures, or from any British possession in Europe, were placed precisely in the same position as a French vessel. The Treaty, however, was merely a treaty of commerce, and not of navigation and commerce. He should be happy to lay on the Table any paper wished for; but should be glad to know the precise point any hon. Gentleman might have in view, in order to give him exact information upon it.

NATIONAL DEFENCES.

QUESTION.

MR. HORSMAN said, he would beg to inquire, Whether the Government intend to take any steps in order to carry out the recommendations of the Committee on National Defences appointed last year.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, that the Report of the Committee was not in such a state of maturity as to enable the Ministry to communicate their intentions with respect to its details to Parliament. There was no item in the Estimates now presented which applied to that Report.

On Motion that the House do go into Committee of Supply.

RELATIONS WITH CHINA.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE rose to call the attention of the House to our relations with China. It appeared to him that at the commencement of another contest with that country it was most desirable that the House should express its opinion as to the instructions to be given to the Ministers and officers out there, and also as to the authority under which those instructions were to be carried out. He should not think it necessary to refer to the former lorchá war, though he had no doubt he should only be expressing the opinion of the majority of Members, in saying that that war was the cause of the present; nor would he refer to the opinion expressed by the noble Lord, the Foreign Secretary, and other Members of the present Government in 1857, when they were opposed to the noble Viscount now at the head of the Government, nor to the blue-book, except so far as it might be necessary to enable him to explain the present position of affairs. He would regard the question as subsequent to the Treaty of Tien-tsin. Early in 1857 Lord Elgin was appointed special envoy to China; but, owing to the disturbances in India, he did not place himself in communication with the Chinese officials until the close of that year. The original demands made by Lord Elgin in December 1857 were two, one the complete execution of treaty engagements, the other, compensation to British subjects for losses incurred in 1857. But, most unfortunately, on the 11th of February, 1858, the noble Lord took a step further, and reserved to himself the power of demanding other conditions from the Chinese Government, and, more unfortunately still, the first of those demands was that the Chinese Government should concede the right of having a British Minister resident at Peking. This demand was in fact the cause of all our present difficulties. Every hon. Member who had read the blue-book would do full justice to the ability, energy, and frankness of Lord Elgin. His energy he had displayed with an extremity of vigour against the Chinese Government, at one moment demanding from them all the observances of a high civilization, and at another treating them as most ignorant barbarians. His frankness he had displayed in the unfavourable opinion which he invariably expressed with regard to this demand for a resident envoy at Peking. On the 12th of July, 1858, he wrote to Lord Malmesbury:—

"The concessions obtained in it from the Chinese Government are not in themselves extravagant; nor, with the exception of the important principle of extraterritoriality, in excess of those which commercial nations are wont freely to grant to each other; but in the eyes of the Chinese Government they amount to a revolution, and involve the surrender of some of the most cherished principles of the traditional policy of the Empire. They have been extorted, therefore, from its fears."—P. 345.

And on November 5, 1858, he wrote thus:—

"In order that your Lordship may correctly apprehend the drift of this correspondence, it is necessary," that I should state at the outset that the Chinese authorities contemplate the permanent residence of foreign Ministers at the capital with more aversion and apprehension than any of the other innovations introduced by the treaty of Tien-tsin. 'If we were quite sure,' say they, that you would always send to us men thoroughly wise, discreet, and considerate, it might be different; but if, for instance, so-and-so were appointed to represent a foreign Government at Pekin (and the right, if exercised by you, would, of course, be claimed by all other Governments), a month would not elapse before something would occur which would place our highest officers in the dilemma of having either to risk a quarrel or submit to some indignity which would lower the Chinese Government in the eyes of its own subjects.' No doubt such apprehensions are to some extent chimerical; but I am bound to admit that I do not consider them to be altogether so. The doctrine that every Chinaman is a knave and manageable only by bullying and bravado, like the kindred doctrine that every trading junk carries guns and is piratical, is, I venture with all deference to think, sometimes pushed a little too far in our dealings with this people. Be this, however, as it may, I advert to the point now only because I wish your Lordship to understand that I believe that the objections to the permanent residence of foreign Ministers at Pekin, which the Chinese authorities urge on this head, are sincerely entertained by them, and not entirely groundless."—P. 406.

As to the feeling of the Chinese on the point, there was no manner of doubt. Here was an extract from a most touching despatch from the Chinese Commissioners in reference to it:—

"The established reputation of your Excellency for justice and straightforwardness, for kind intentions and friendly feeling, make us place the fullest confidence in your assurance that when you exacted the condition referred to you were actuated by no desire whatever to do injury to China. The permanent residence of Foreign Ministers at the capital would, notwithstanding, be an injury to China in many more ways than we can find words to express. In sum, in the present critical and troublous state of our country, this incident would generate, we fear, a loss of respect for their Government in the eyes of her people, and that this would indeed be no slight evil it will not be necessary, we assume, to explain to your Excellency with greater detail. It is for this reason that we specially address you a second letter on this subject, and we trust that your Excellency will represent for us to Her Majesty your Sovereign the great inconvenience you feel (the exercise of the right would be) to our country, and beseech her not to decide in favour of the permanent residence at Pekin. When we bethink us of the lustre shed by the well-doing and justice of Her Majesty, we feel assured that she would not wish, by being peremptory in a matter so hurtful to our country, to involve it in embarrassment: and our country will not fail to be impressed with gratitude."—P. 411.

In spite of this the demand was insisted on. What happened? The treaty was signed on the 26th June, 1858. After the treaty was signed Lord Elgin went to Japan. He returned to Shanghai at the end of January, 1859, and at the commencement of February he sent a letter to the Commissioners, requesting them most strongly not to leave Shanghai until he returned from Canton, whither he intended going, to suppress some disturbances. Unfortunately, Lord Elgin did not return to Shanghai, but came home to England, and was replaced by Mr. Bruce, in May, 1858. Lord Malmesbury's instructions to Mr. Bruce were that on his arrival in China he should repair without the loss of one moment's time to Shanghai, on his way to the mouth of the Peiho, to complete the ratification of the treaty signed in the previous year. Lord Malmesbury then went on to say, and he begged the particular attention of the House to this,—

"You will probably find it advisable, before your departure from Shanghai, to send an intimation to Pekin of your approach, and to request that suitable arrangements may be made for your honourable reception at the mouth of the Peiho and at Tien-tsin, and for your journey from that place to Pekin. The Admiral in command of Her Majesty's Naval Forces in China has been directed to send up with you to the mouth of the Peiho a sufficient Naval Force, and unless any unforeseen circumstances should appear to make another arrangement more advisable, it would seem desirable that you should reach Tien-tsin in a British ship-of-war."

The object, no doubt, was that the vessel of war should serve as an escort, and as a matter of dignity to the mission. There was not a single word in this despatch, or any other written by Lord Malmesbury, which in any way could be twisted into a justification of Mr. Bruce's proceeding up the Peiho with a fleet. From the first moment he got out, Mr. Bruce appeared to have been panic-struck. He saw danger everywhere, he saw Russians everywhere, and he was ready to receive information from any one about the supposed evil intentions of the Chinese Government. One authority quoted by him in his despatches was a Cantonese money-lender, who told him that the Russians had offered to send 10,000 muskets to the Chinese, which the Emperor of China judiciously declined, lest, as he said, they should be carried by 10,000 Russians. In his first despatch he complained that the Chinese Commissioners were waiting at Shanghai—the very place where Lord Elgin desired them to wait; and he went on thus.—

"In my previous despatches I have informed your Lordship that we can ascertain nothing as to the intentions of this Government, with respect to the visit of Foreign Envoys to Peking; but the Imperial Commissioners, on hearing of my arrival in China, have proceeded from Soo-chow to Shanghai—a fact of some significance, and which gives colour to the opinion that they hope to raise questions or begin negotiations at that point; otherwise they would have returned ere this to Peking, for the purpose of making preparations for our reception."

The House would bear in mind that this was a mission of peace, sent to ratify a treaty which was known to be most unpalatable to the Chinese nation. Mr. Bruce went on to say:—

"I hope in this way to compel the Chinese Government to declare itself upon those points which we know are the most unpalatable to it; and if there exists on its part a disposition to evade its obligations, to thrust us back, as before, on the seaboard, and refuse the reception which I cannot waive without lowering our national dignity, I trust we shall be in possession of their views when we arrive at the mouth of the Peiho, and not be left to discover them gradually at Peking. If, as is most probable, the Court of Peking is wavering, anxious to evade, but unwilling to risk a rupture, I trust that identity of views among the Foreign representatives, firm language, and an imposing demonstration of force, will secure the observance by it of the recent treaties, and incline it to listen to moderate and pacific advisers."

Then followed three despatches from the Chinese Commissioners to Mr. Bruce, in which they said:—

"The Commissioners, having the fullest confidence in his predecessor (Lord Elgin) when he engaged them to remain at Shanghai to consider all matters not disposed of, were unable to return to Peking; and if Mr. Bruce now proceed direct to Tien-tsin, the Commissioners having to travel by land, cannot reckon upon arriving there so soon. Indeed, taking into consideration the hindrance to be expected from the weather on their land journey, this will certainly occupy two months and more, as Mr. Bruce, they imagine, must be well aware."

Mr. Bruce again wrote to the Commissioners, proposing to place steamers at their disposal for the purpose of reaching the mouth of the Peiho; but they replied that they had no authority to go by sea, and again urged Mr. Bruce as strongly as possible to grant an extension of the time. Mr. Bruce, however, would not listen to any delay; and, though he himself had remained for an entire month at Hong Kong, in order to meet the French Minister, M. de Bourboulon, notwithstanding the directions of Lord Elgin to lose no time in proceeding to Shanghai, he refused to extend any leniency to the Commissioners who had remained at Shanghai, in consequence of instructions from their own

Government, confirmed by the authority of Lord Elgin. And now came the most interesting feature of what he might call this extraordinary narrative. On the 16th of June, Admiral Hope arrived at the mouth of the Peiho, which was reached on the 20th by Mr. Bruce and the other Commissioners. In the interval Admiral Hope had discovered that the forts were fortified, that barriers had been placed across the river, and that, in fact, it was not intended to allow the mission to proceed by the Peiho to Tien-tsin. And these preparations were not made without justice, because Lord Elgin in a despatch said:—"We have no right to navigate the Peiho until after the ratification of the treaty." But Mr. Bruce, on arriving and discovering the state of affairs, took what appeared to him to have been the most unwarrantable step of ordering Admiral Hope to clear the passage. That order was given on the 21st of June. But Admiral Hope judiciously delayed his proceedings; and he firmly believed that had it not been for the attacks which had been made on another gallant Admiral—a high-minded and gallant officer, now a Member of the House (Sir Michael Seymour)—on the ground of over-caution in a former engagement at the Peiho, Admiral Hope would have had the good sense not to obey those instructions. He now came to a point which he could not touch on without bitter regret—a regret that was mingled with astonishment, in which he thought the House must sympathize. The attack was to have been made on the 21st; but would it be believed that at nine o'clock on the morning of the 25th, the 26th being the day on which the treaty was to have been ratified, Mr. Bruce received a despatch from one of the highest officers of the Crown in China, stating that he had arrived at Peh-tang-ho, another mouth of the Peiho, ten miles to the northward, to see Mr. Bruce and to conduct him with all possible dignity to the Court of Peking? The statement was so important and almost incredible that he would suffer Mr. Bruce to tell the story in his own words:—

"About nine a.m. on the 26th a junk came alongside Her Majesty's ship Magicienne, anchored about nine miles from the forts, and a petty mandarin came on board with a letter addressed to me by the Governor General of Pechilee, a translation of which I herewith inclose. It announced that the Governor General had been ordered to proceed to Peh-tang-ho, an inlet or small mouth of the river, about ten miles to the northward of this anchorage, and thence to offer his services to

Her Majesty's Minister; that Kweiliang and Hwashana had been summoned back to Peking, as the persons authorized to exchange ratifications and to convey the Minister to the capital. I was requested, therefore, to await their arrival, and to allow time for the withdrawal of the troops quartered at Peh-tang-ho, after which the Governor General would come in a vessel to convey me to the landing place, whence I should proceed to Peking by land. This letter was dated the 23rd, and only reached me on the 25th—a delay which is inexplicable if it had been intended to reach me in time. As, in the body of the letter, the name of Her Majesty was not put on the same level with that of the Emperor of China, thereby violating the principle of equality established by the treaty, it was returned by Mr. Wade for correction, with an intimation that I was about to proceed to Tien-tsin. As the attempt to pass up the river was to be made at ten a.m., it would have been difficult for me, at that late hour, to have communicated with the Admiral, who was at a distance of nine miles, and already engaged in his operations."

Could it be believed that Mr. Bruce, being in receipt of a communication at nine o'clock in the morning, stating that it was intended to receive him properly, and when a misunderstanding might possibly exist as to the place at which he was to land, gave as an excuse for not sending nine miles to stay the effusion of blood that "Admiral Hope had already commenced operations"? And what would be thought by the House when he added that operations did not actually commence till two o'clock, and that Mr. Bruce, in the meantime, although he knew that the Chinese Government was then in the right, having done all that was expected at its hands, made no effort whatever to prevent the slaughter of our troops? A force of 1,100 went into action, of whom 434 were killed and wounded, and the sorrow for their loss could scarcely be alleviated by the gallantry displayed by both officers and men when the signal to "engage the enemy" was hung out by Admiral Hope, and below it that noble command, "as closely as possible." The very first night of the Session they had heard how the gallant Admiral, struck down and shattered, had shifted his flag from ship to ship, and, although himself desperately wounded, had yet been able to observe and sympathize with the gallantry of the officers under his command. They had heard of Vansittart and Shadwell, of Lemon, of Commerell, of Heath, Fisher, and Parke, rivals in glory and companions in fight. All this strife went on from two o'clock till night fell like a curtain on the scene; and Mr. Bruce, at nine miles' distance, and knowing that the Chinese Government had fulfilled its obligations, made no effort whatever to stop the carnage. He sympathized deeply with any Minister at such a distance from home, whose position of necessity entailed great responsibility; but he could not help expressing his painful conviction that Mr. Bruce had made an undue use of the authority with which he was intrusted. What was the excuse afterwards made by Mr. Bruce? He said there was treachery on the part of the Chinese, that the batteries were masked, and that the gunboats were lured into the river, and were then fired upon without due notice. But what was the fact? Why, Lord Elgin himself, in one of his despatches written before he left the country, stated distinctly that the Chinese were fortifying the Peiho, and that they were justified in doing so. There had been a very remarkable letter written by an "Eye-Witness," and what did the author, Captain Longley, state? He very frankly remarked that it was on our part that the declaration of war was made; and he added, "I need not tell you that there was no treachery in the case at all. We saw the masks on the embasures, and we knew by these that there were guns there. The Chinese fired one shot to warn us off, and waited to see if we would draw away our forces. Had they opened all their fire upon us at that time, I do not think a single gunboat would have escaped. So I hope we shall hear no more about treachery." The writer went on to tell a story about a crusty old gentleman who liked to follow his own crotchets and live within his own house, and expressed himself unable to see why the Chinese should not act on that principle if they thought proper. "I don't say," he added, "that we are to give up our trade if we can help it, but I don't think we are right in forcing our civilization upon China." Nothing could be stronger than the expressions of Lord Elgin:—

"We know from the Pekin Gazette that the Emperor has issued orders for the reconstruction of the forts which we knocked down at the mouth of the Peiho, and for the erection of other works to protect Peking. It would hardly, I think, be reasonable on our part to require that the Emperor of China should leave his capital undefended for the express purpose of enabling us, whenever we see fit so to do, to attack him there."

Another mode in which Mr. Bruce had been defended was by stating that Mr. Ward, the American Minister, who very wisely did not co-operate at all in these proceedings, was received with insult and contumely when he subsequently went up the river. He had seen this stated even in The Times, and he was greatly surprised that a journal of such high character and ability should have published a statement altogether incorrect; but that surprise was removed when he subsequently found that the journal had been misled by Mr. Bruce's own despatch. Would it be believed that all this was totally imaginary? The fact was, Mr. Ward was received with great consideration. In the American account of the mission it was stated that,—

"The despatch of Hanguh, the Governor General, was couched in the most courteous terms, expressing his great desire to carry His Majesty's orders into effect, and to facilitate the journey of the American Envoy and his suite to Peking. . . . The distance to Pehtang is about twelve miles, but it could not be seen from the ship. They were met by three junks, handsomely fitted up, in one of which they proceeded two miles to the landing-place, which was ornamented with coloured silk festoons. A guard of honour lined the streets up to the House, and the foreigners rode to it in carriages; and though the equipage of these vehicles and the discipline and uniform of the soldiers were not what they would have been in Paris or Vienna, they exhibited as much courtesy as could be desired."

In addition to this description he found that President Buchanan said, in his last Message, "It is but justice to the Chinese authorities to observe that throughout these transactions they have acted with good faith, and in a friendly spirit to the United States." The reception "was after their own peculiar fashion; but they ought to regard with a lenient eye the ancient customs of the empire." Mr. Buchanan added, "The conduct of our Minister on this occasion has my entire approval." Thus the opinion expressed by Mr. Bruce, that Mr. Ward's mission was received with indignity, entirely fell to the ground. And taking the whole case into consideration, even with every indulgence, he thought Mr. Bruce had acted precipitately, and not in the spirit of a Minister charged with the ratification of a treaty of peace. He declared war on his own authority, and did not bear in mind the advice of the Duke of Wellington on a somewhat similar occasion. In 1835 the Duke of Wellington in a despatch to Lord Napier, said, "It is not by force and violence His Majesty intends to establish a commercial intercourse with China, but by the other conciliatory measures so strongly inculcated in all the instructions you have received." It was in this spirit Mr. Bruce should have acted. It might be interesting to the House to know what was the opinion on this subject of men perfectly competent to give one, of many official gentlemen in China, and even of Lord Elgin himself. Mr. Consul Alcock and Mr. Consul Robertson had both stated that the Chinese officials had shown every disposition to act in a friendly spirit. In his despatch of April 9, 1858, Lord Elgin said:—

"I must, however, begin by observing that the evils which I am about to signalize do not arise from any indisposition on the part of the natives to live peaceably with foreigners. On the contrary, they have their origin rather in the exaggeration of this desire than in its defect. The state of Ningpo in this respect furnishes their favourite and, perhaps, most plausible argument to that class of persons who advocate what is styled a vigorous policy in China; in other words, a policy which consists in resorting to the most violent measures of coercion and repression on the slenderest provocations."

He believed his first despatch, of September 20, expressed only a very qualified approval of Mr. Bruce's proceedings; and in his last despatch the noble Lord distinctly stated how he thought the necessity for taking these violent measures might have been prevented. The noble Lord said, that although the denial of the passage to the capital for our ambassador might be considered evidence of an unfriendly disposition on the part of the Chinese, yet it was a matter in which Mr. Bruce might have remonstrated without having recourse to force to clear the passage. In the noble Lord's despatch of October, which did him the highest honour, he expressed a strong hope that peaceful relations might be restored to China without the effusion of more blood. That was in accordance with the passage relating to China in Her Majesty's most gracious Speech from the Throne. He hoped when the noble Lord expressed himself so admirably he really meant what he said, and that he did not mean it in the spirit of the old Inquisitors, who, when they ordered a criminal for execution, directed that he should be treated tenderly. But, somehow or other, all this cordiality of feeling did not express itself in action. Mr. Oliphant, in his new work, stated his belief that the Chinese perfectly understood the position of the English Home Government. The Chinese did not blame the Home Government, but the officials carrying out its instructions in China. In a conversation with the Emperor, recorded in the blue-book, the Minister is represented as saying—

"Bonham has been directed by the Sovereign of the State to trade with China in a friendly spirit, and not to be troublesome. Bonham has been presented by the Sovereign of the State with the O-ta-pa (the Order of the Bath), a thing somewhat of the same sort as the ancient red-gold-fish purse. Bonham is very pleased with this. He parades it with pride. It will prevent him making any difficulties."

Mr. Bruce insisted much on Russian guns and upon Russian influence employed against England in China. If they would take the trouble to read the despatches of Count Poutiatine, they would find they were written with the best possible feeling. The Russian Minister gave Lord Elgin very good advice, and offered to lend "his moral support to all demands of common interest which may be made by the Plenipotentiaries of other Powers to the Court of Peking." But he stated that what China wanted in her present position was repose, and that harsh measures would only lead to increased difficulties and to bloodshed. He (Mr. Cochrane) thought that was statesmanlike advice; and he believed that a palace had been prepared for the reception of our Ambassador at Peking. It was absurd to raise the bugbear of Russian influence; and if the Russians had such influence, they must have gained it by conducting their diplomacy in China in a very different manner from that of England. He would now make a few remarks upon the despatches of the noble Lord the present Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. The earlier despatches of the noble Lord were written in a spirit of conciliation; he hoped they were not written in the spirit of the Inquisition, that gave up prisoners to execution, recommending them to be used as tenderly as possible. The noble Lord, in a speech made in 1857, said:—

"In dealing with nations less civilized than ourselves, it is by lofty thought and forbearing humanity that the genius of commerce contrasts with the ambition of conquerors. You may indeed, force a road for your merchants over the ruin of cities and the corpses of your customers, but I warn you that your trade will flee. The place for commerce recoils from bloodshed."

Those were noble sentiments, but not more noble or truer than those to which the noble Lord had given expression when he said—

"We have heard much of late—a great deal too much, I think—of the prestige of England. We used to hear of the character, of the reputation, of the honour of England. I trust, Sir, that the character, the reputation, and the honour of this country are dear to us all; but if the prestige of England is to be separate from these qualities—if it is to be separate from the character, from the reputation, and from the honour of this country—then I, for one, have no wish to maintain it. To those who argue, as I have heard some argue, 'It is true we have a bad case—it is true we were in the wrong—it is true we have committed injustice, but we must persevere in that wrong, we must continue to act unjustly, or the Chinese will think that we are afraid'—I say, as has been said before, 'Be just and fear not.' Whatever we lose in prestige, of which I do not presume to be a judge, I am convinced that the honour and character of this country will be raised higher by such a policy. Never will England stand higher in the world's estimation than when it can be said that, though troublesome and meddlesome officials prostitute her arms and induce a brave Admiral to commence hostilities which ought never to have been begun, yet the House of Commons, representing her people, have indignantly declared that they will be no party to such injustice, and that neither for commercial advantages nor for political advantages, nor for any other immediate advantages to their country, will they consent to stain that honour which, after all, has been, and must be, the sure foundation of her greatness."—[3 Hansard, cxliv., 1474].

These were sentiments in which he felt assured every hon. Member in that House must concur; and he should appeal to the noble Lord, now that he was in power, to carry out the views to which, when in Opposition, he had given expression. But while he made that appeal to the noble Lord, he was fully prepared to admit that, after the reverse which we had recently experienced in China, it was necessary that some great demonstration should be made with the view of retrieving our position in that country. He should, however, like to see that demonstration great, not only in point of magnitude, but by force of its moderation. We boasted ourselves at public meetings to be the pioneers of civilization, as the Spaniards of former days were wont to boast that they had spread Christianity throughout the West, and we were called upon to justify by our acts the professions which we made. It was, then, not with the view of tying up the hands of the Executive by pledging it to any specific Resolution, but in the hope that the expression of opinion on the part of the House of Commons might tend to the prosecution of our claims against China with justice and moderation, that he had ventured that evening to trespass upon their attention. The Government might do all that they deemed expedient to retrieve our position in that country; but he should ask the noble Lord not to insist upon a demand—that of having a resident representative of England at Peking—which was opposed to all the feelings and habits of the Chinese people. He should also ask the noble Lord to inform the House fully and clearly what were the limits which he had prescribed to the action of the authorities who were in command of the expedition against China, and by whom those instructions were to be carried into effect.

SIR MICHAEL SEYMOUR said, that as his name had been mentioned in connection with the subject under discussion, he hoped to obtain the permission of the House to make some observations with respect to it; although he regretted to say that in doing so he had not the advantage which he should have possessed had certain documents been laid on the table of the House which would have enabled him to render his statement more complete. The question which had been raised by the hon. Gentleman who had just spoken was a very large one; its details were spread over a very considerable portion of time, and were marked by the occurrence of many extraordinary events. When, in 1857, the subject first came under the notice of the House, he was not unmindful that many hon. Members had been kind enough to take a favourable view of the course with respect to it which he had deemed it to be his duty to adopt; and he now begged to assure those hon. Gentlemen that he had derived no ordinary encouragement in the performance of that duty from the support which they had been so good as to accord; while to those who had taken a different course, and who had used hard words in speaking of his conduct, he could only say that he forgave them, and that he was willing to believe they had done no more than that which they deemed to be right. But to proceed to the discussion of the subject immediately at issue. He might state that soon after he took the command in China he went to the north, and having ascertained that the Russian war was at end, had assisted in facilitating the return to their own country of about 100 Russian prisoners. He returned to Hong Kong at the end of the year. On his coming back he found that the dispute about the lorcha Arrow had arisen, and, being then a stranger to China, he referred to the merchants, and other persons of experience resident there, for information upon the point. Acting upon that information, after a delay of ten or eleven days, he ordered his second in command, with two or three vessels, to make such a demonstration, and to demand from the Chinese authorities an explanation with regard to their conduct; but without any favourable result. Having, however, ascertained that Canton was by treaty stipulations placed in a similar position with two or three other mercantile cities in China, and that we possessed a right of entry there, and of communicating with the Government officials, he sought to secure that object, in the hope that one half-hour or ten minutes' conversation would put an end to all further proceedings. The entry to the city was, however, denied, and there were consequently no possible means of personal communication with the Chinese officials. But to revert for a moment to the proceedings which had taken place in that House in reference to the subject, he must say he had been rather surprised to read that some hon. Members had disputed the right of the lorcha to carry the British flag, seeing that the ordinance under which the right was claimed had been sent to this country and had received the Royal assent, and had, when it had gone out to Hong Kong, met with the concurrence of all the parties interested in these transactions. It was not intended to meet the requirements of the Chinese alone, but of others. The lorcha was one of a vast number of other British vessels, carrying an immense amount of British property. It was also said that the vessel had no protection—that her papers had expired. But that was not the fact. She had the right to carry the British flag, and the ordinance gave the power to the British consul to overhaul her papers and to renew the protection from year to year. If she had protection she was regular, and if she was not regular she became forfeited to the British Crown. As it happened, however, her papers were examined and found to be correct. That being so, and the lorcha being entitled to protection, he had deemed it his duty to take some steps for the purpose of exacting from the Chinese officials some acknowledgment of the error they had committed in the case of the vessel in question, and thence had followed the further operations to which he had been obliged to resort. He could say with the most perfect truth, however, that the duty which had thus been cast upon him was one which was of a most distasteful character to his feelings, knowing as he did that he was commencing warlike proceedings against an unwarlike people. But he proceeded up the river to Canton, and as he neared the city and was surrounded by hundreds of thousands of the population, the first question which presented itself to his mind was, how he could best deal with such a population according to the dictates of humanity, and with as little as possible of slaughter. He directed the attack in such a manner as he thought best calculated to attain these purposes. He told the Commissioners of Canton that he had power to breach the wall, and with 300 men he did so and passed into the city. It had been said in the discussion in that House that the city of Canton was then in his power, as, indeed, it frequently was; and if he had thought fit he might, as there were not wanting some who said he should, have gone the length of firing the city and burning it down; but he said it was no part of the duty of a Christian officer to take that course, and he would not do it. He continued, however, to hold the Canton river, which was a matter of some difficulty. Owing to the number of war-junks, and the extreme ingenuity of the Chinese with their fire bombs, the position could not be maintained without considerable risk to the ships. He did not regret the course he had pursued, his desire being to make it as little oppressive as possible to the inhabitants on the banks of the river, who, with the small officials, became friends, and in many instances supplied the force with refreshments, and gave them notice of firerafts. Operations had gone on satisfactorily for the objects in the view, but unfortunately, owing to the smallness of his force, he was obliged to restrain for many weary weeks and months the ardour of his gallant officers and men, who were eager for action. He did restrain their ardour, however, and waiting until the proper hour for action should arrive. When the noble Earl, the British Ambassador to China, arrived, the question came to be whether they should continue where they were at Canton or despatch the force to the north. The unfortunate mutiny in India then broke out, and it became his duty to do all he could to despatch reinforcements to support and sustain Her Majesty's authority in that country. The Shannon, the Pearl, the Sanspareil, were detached to Calcutta, and the Fury to Sir Henry Ward, the able and energetic Governor of Ceylon, who rendered every assistance in his power by despatching all the troops he could possibly spare. During the absence of Her Majesty's Ambassador in India the operations in China were suspended. During that absence, however, he had found it his duty to establish a blockade of Canton for this reason—he found that the Chinese High Commissioner and the other authorities had collected Chinese produce, and that they were endeavouring to open the trade with other foreign nations to the exclusion of the British. It was impossible to allow that; and the holding of the river was also considered essential to the arrangements which were to be made for the future; for in the report he had sent home he stated that he should hold the Canton river until Government had decided what steps should be taken. He had already referred to the absence of certain papers, which would prevent him from speaking on one point on which it was most desirable that he should have had the opportunity of addressing the House; and he would proceed to state that in the early part of 1858 he was called on to accompany the noble Lord (the Earl of Elgin), the British Ambassador, in conjunction with His Excellency the Ambassador, the Admiral, and forces of France, to the north of China, after the final capture of Canton. The blockade was raised on the 10th of February, and arrangements were made for proceeding to the north. He confessed he had always hoped that when this period arrived no hostilities would really be necessary in the north. It was supposed that what had occurred at Canton would induce the Emperor of China to see the advisability of yielding. Moreover, happily for our prospects, the representatives of Russia, America, and France had united with us on the common ground of a revision of treaties, and he hoped that nothing hostile would ensue. With these views he had even asked from the authorities at home a discretionary power to reduce the naval forces in China. Well, it was thought necessary to make a demonstration in the north of China and to proceed to the entrance of the Peiho. The arrangement was, that all should rendezvous at Shanghai. They arrived off the Peiho on the 24th of April; on the 25th the French arrived. On the 26th they proceeded to reconnoitre the entrance of the Peiho river; on the 27th they moved over the bar two of the despatch-boats; on the 30th he was informed by Her Majesty's Ambassador that a letter had been received rendering it advisable to postpone hostile action, and that he should be informed when a different state of affairs presented itself. A conference was held without result on the 1st of May. On the 12th his Excellency the Russian Ambassador was good enough to allow him to question one of the Russian gentlemen who had come from Peking as to what was going on there and the nature of the road thither.

Advantage was also taken of delivering a letter from Her Majesty's Ambassador to the officials in the port to reconnoitre and find out the nature of the landing, the states of the tide, and the consistency of the ground over which their force might have to travel. The final decision was taken on the 19th. On the 20th of May they proceeded to the entrance of the Peiho, when the operations against the forts were attended with the most successful result. The loss in killed and wounded was 103 men, more than half of it being unhappily occasioned by the explosion of a Chinese magazine. After the capture of the forts not the slightest molestation of any kind was offered by the Chinese until Tien-tsin was reached on the 30th. Here he would gladly sit down; but the House would not, he hoped, think him out of order if he made some reference to the manner in which he had performed his duties in reference to the noble Earl, Her Majesty's Ambassador to China. He hoped he might be allowed to say, in regard to his own part in these transactions, that from the moment the noble Earl entered upon his duties, he had never deviated from an anxious desire to forward his Excellency's wishes, or to uphold the interests of this country and obey the orders of the Queen and Her Majesty's Government. He would not have made this reference, and hoped the House would not say he was out of order (for he had refrained from noticing, on various occasions, remarks in certain public journals), if his conduct as a naval officer had not been in some measure assailed. He believed he took the right course as a naval officer and commander in chief in a distant part of the world—that course being strictly to adhere to his duty—strictly to adhere to the instructions of the Admiralty, which he served. If he had exercised forbearance in not asking for official documents relating to certain operations in which he took part, it was only because he did not think an officer should be too sensitive, even if the public thought fit to deal with his character. Were he to justify himself, his course, as it seemed to him, was this—to ask the Admiralty whether, in consequence of his character having been assailed, they would permit him to use certain documents in order to make his conduct plain before the world. If they objected to that course, he must bow to their decision. In his case he had received the fullest approbation of the Government and the Admiralty, and therefore had not thought it necessary.

Sir Michael Seymour

But when he told the House that an hon. Gentleman—an able and very agreeable writer, who held a position of confidence, who held an official position by the side of the noble Lord, the Ambassador in China—when he gave to the world his work, which bore the impress of something like authority, in which he reflected upon his character—when that writer said that he (Sir M. Seymour) was slow, and wanting in energy, and of having thwarted the policy of the noble Lord, he thought he might fairly ask why did not this gentleman give the whole story to the world? He could have done it, but he did not; but he wished to poison the public mind in regard to the conduct of one who had endeavoured to do his duty. The House must understand that the instructions were very clear. The House would see by the blue-book that the negotiations were entrusted entirely to the Ambassador. He was told that it would be for him to determine, and for him alone, how long the negotiations should be continued, when, if unsuccessful, to be broken off; and when he judged that further negotiations were useless, and the employment of force necessary to compel the Chinese to comply with his demands, his duty then would be to announce that fact to the Admiral, with whom it would then rest to decide how he would employ the force at his disposal. He begged to tell the House that he never was called upon to act until the time he was called upon to attack the forts. Had he been called upon to act he would have respectfully told Her Majesty's Ambassador that he thought it would be better to delay, as in his opinion it was important—in acting against the Chinese it was always important—to act with effect. He had experienced the advantageous moral effect of such a course in dealing with this people. He knew the difficulty of getting the Chinese to show a front of resistance. After the successful capture of the Peiho forts the Chinese never troubled them again. In the case of affairs in the north he had given notice for the production of papers, and he believed the Government had no objection to their production. The author of the work to which he had referred seemed to forget that he (Sir M. Seymour) had not acted alone—he acted with Admiral de Genouilly, a man of honour, open, candid, and of the highest professional attainments, so much so that it was impossible for him to express the satisfaction he always felt in carrying out joint operations with that gallant Officer. Therefore, when they singled him out he did not understand it. Those gentlemen were very fast men for fighting. Fight whom? Blame him for not fighting? Whom? Chinamen? He did not mean to say that Chinamen could not be got to resist. They did so get together at the Peiho forts, and became almost impudent, and the result was therefore useful, as they were prepared to meet them. If they had gone in a hurry up the river, no doubt the forts would have been taken; but what then? they should have commenced fighting at the opening of the river, and been slaughtering Chinamen all the way to Tien-tsin. Allusion had been made in the work in question to the enemy having retired unscathed. Why, they fled like sheep. His own vessel, a steamer, could not make the turning, and he was compelled to put her stem on to the opposite mud, to back her short, and then go on. All hands on board were not sufficient to turn her round, and who came to help them? Why, hundreds of the Chinese came down to lend a hand in getting her off, and to assist her down the river. They also came swimming off on both sides of his vessel, with fruits, vegetables, flowers, birds, and all sorts of things for the English. Yet some of those bellicose gentlemen, for the sake of a flourish of their pen and a little fine writing, did not scruple to talk the nonsense he had referred to. He regretted very much having to enter upon these subjects. He wished to act with the greatest forbearance in regard to anything that was written about him; but there were occasions when an officer was bound to answer imputations upon his conduct, and he hoped the House would grant him their indulgence. As to the commercial aspect of the question, he held that our interest in China must be purely commercial; and if we attempted to gain any other end, we should be acting unjustly and unfairly towards China. This country was very powerful for war—China was very weak. It was impossible that we could carry our arms into China without very serious consequences to that Empire. He believed that China had never recovered from the effects of the first war; and he further believed that if we carried the hostilities now impending beyond what the necessities of the case required, there would be great reason to deplore it. He had no hesitation in expressing his opinion as to the future. If it proved necessary to adopt hostile measures, with the large allied forces now going out to China, success there would be inevitable. It could not be supposed that any Chinese or Tartar force could resist the arms of two such powerful nations as the Allies, when mustered so strongly as in the expedition now on its way out. It was much to be desired that the Emperor of China would listen to the advice which was offered him, and avert hostilities while it was yet in his power. He feared, however, that such would not be the case, and he had read with regret the news of the gathering of large Tartar forces in the vicinity of Peking. The Chinese people did not like taking advice, and the persuasion even of their best friends was of no avail. In the event of their not yielding to our demands, we must of necessity proceed to retake the forts before which our gallant forces had been defeated, and then advance upon Tien-tsin. He felt satisfied that, once in force at Tien-tsin, the Court of Peking would open their eyes to the propriety and necessity of yielding; but in any case he should deprecate the consequences of success, if not exercised with justice and moderation towards the Chinese. As he said before, China was really not a country to go to war with. They had nothing to oppose to our strength, and we could not carry war into China with any real satisfaction to ourselves, although we might bring ruin and desolation upon the empire. If they pushed on to Peking, they would run the risk of making it like what Canton was at this moment; and very possibly the Court would leave the city, and then they would find themselves in Peking without the means of getting any officials to negotiate with. There was a probability, too, that a defeat might induce the Chinese not only to lay down their arms, but to remain in what he might call a condition of passive resistance, and what could be done then? What could our forces do before an enemy that offered no opposition? He supposed they would just have to come away. After having endeavoured in vain by peaceful means to procure the ratification of the treaty, which he had no hesitation in saying he thought ought to be carried, he did not see how we could avoid proceeding to hostilities; but, having attained the success which must accompany the allied forces, the utmost forbearance and consideration should be extended to a nation so utterly indefensible as China. The fabric of Chinese power was of so flimsy a character, so merely ornamental, and so unstable, that he had no doubt the consequence of any rude shock from the Allies would be to break up the empire. The risk we ran of bringing about such a result ought, he thought, to make us cautious how far we carried our operations.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: I suppose there is no one in this House who can question the professional opinion of the gallant Admiral who has just sat down, or who will be disposed to doubt his zeal and devotion in the service of the Crown and the country. The gallant Admiral has received the approbation of the Board of Admiralty, his immediate superiors, and therefore I think it is quite unnecessary—indeed impossible—for me to go into the questions he has adverted to with regard to his conduct and the differences with the noble Lord who was Her Majesty's Ambassador in China. I doubt whether this is an occasion when we can conveniently and usefully discuss the whole question with regard to China; but at the same time, the hon. Gentleman (Mr. B. Cochrane) who brought forward this subject made so many charges against Mr. Bruce, and went so much into detail that I cannot altogether avoid questioning some parts of the narrative in which he introduced them. The House will recollect that Mr. Bruce was sent to China entirely for the purpose of obtaining the ratifications of the treaty of Tien-tsin, and of acting at Peking as Her Majesty's Envoy Extraordinary. Before he went he laid a paper before the Earl of Malmesbury, asking for instructions, and pointing out that, as there were parts of the treaty which he had reason to fear were very unpalatable to the Chinese, some difficulties might arise, not then perceived, in carrying the treaty into effect. I must say that Mr. Bruce did not suggest that the entrance to the Peiho would be resisted; but he asked the question whether he should insist on going up to Peking. The Earl of Malmesbury then directed him to go to Peking, and gave him the following instructions as to the mode of proceeding there:—

"You will probably find it advisable, before your departure from Shanghai, to send an intimation to Peking of your approach, and to request that suitable arrangements may be made for your honourable reception at the mouth of the Peiho, and at Tien-tsin, and for your journey from that place to Peking. The admiral in command of Her Majesty's naval forces in China has been directed to send up with you to the mouth of the Peiho a sufficient naval force, and unless any unforeseen circumstances should appear to make another arrangement more advisable, it would seem desirable that you reach Tien-tsin in a British ship of war."

The case which actually occurred was not foreseen. Mr. Bruce was directed to proceed to the mouth of the Peiho with a suitable naval force. Admiral Hope says, Mr. Bruce said with an "imposing" naval force. But I take it for granted that such a naval force was intended as would inspire so much respect or awe to the Chinese that there would then be no difficulty in proceeding up the Peiho and arriving at Peking. Many petitions have been addressed to me on the assumption that Mr. Bruce, immediately on his arrival, attempted to reach Peking by force; that he intended to force his way. Mr. Bruce, I submit, acted exactly according to his instructions. He wrote immediately on his arrival at Shanghai, on the 10th of May, to ask that suitable preparations should be made for his reception. He said he should proceed to Tien-tsin, and when he arrived there he hoped suitable preparations would be made according to his character as Plenipotentiary for his conveyance to Peking. He states it in these words:—

"The undersigned takes this opportunity of informing his Excellency Kweiliang that, in compliance with the above instructions of his sovereign, he is about to proceed without delay, by ship, to Tien-tsin. He trusts that the necessary orders will be given for the conveyance of himself and his suite from thence to Peking, and for the provision of suitable accommodation for him during his residence in the capital itself, in a manner befitting the dignity of the nation he represents."

It is obvious that there is no contemplation of the use of force in that request, but that it is a simple request that the Ministers of the Emperor of China will make due preparation for his journey and reception. The hon. Gentleman says that there were persons waiting at Shanghai to negotiate with him, and that they were told by Lord Elgin to stay there for that purpose. But it is rather remarkable that the hon. Gentleman, who professes a wish to show every indulgence to Mr. Bruce, did not, in this respect, do him bare justice, because the fact is that in the beginning of March Lord Elgin wrote to the Ministers of the Emperor of China that he should not return to Shanghai, that he was about to proceed to England, and that another person would go from England with the view of exchanging ratifications at Peking, and residing there as Her Majesty's representative. These Chinese Ministers, after the receipt of that letter, remained from the 30th of March until the middle of June, but no one can say that they were justified in expecting either Lord Elgin or Mr. Bruce to negotiate at Shanghai, when they had received an intimation that another and more natural course had been decided upon. Mr. Bruce accordingly, in further compliance with his instructions, called on Admiral Hope to furnish him with an adequate force. According to directions received from Lord Elgin, that force was furnished, and he proceeded to the mouth of the Peiho. Up to this time he had had no intimation whatever from the Chinese Ministers that his entrance to the Peiho and proceeding to Tien-tsin would be opposed, or even objected to. These Chinese Ministers proposed to re-negotiate, or, in fact, re-open certain points, and to alter some parts of the treaty. Mr. Bruce very properly declared that that was no part of his duty; that it was his duty to exchange ratifications, and not re-open questions already settled by the treaty, and that he intended to proceed to the Peiho. If any one will look at the correspondence with these Ministers, he will find that, although they attempted to re-open questions, yet after a time they apparently coincided with Mr. Bruce. At all events, they declared themselves ready to do what he desired. They made some objections to the length of the journey and the time it would take, but they never, nor do I believe it was in their minds or knowledge to do so—they never suggested to Mr. Bruce that the Emperor of China objected to that mode, or that any resistance would be made to his proceeding to Peking. Indeed, I cannot conceive what objections there could be, supposing the Emperor of China intended to admit him to Peking and ratify the treaty. If that were the Emperor's intention, there could be no objection to Mr. Bruce proceeding by the usual and shortest route, nor to giving him those advantages in his short journey of forty miles from Tien-tsin to the capital which would enable him to reach it in a manner he had been led to expect, as becoming the representative of a friendly Power. But another party seems to have had a predominant influence with the Emperor of China. They do not manage matters in that country as they do here. In England when one party is in power the other is out. The one pursues a policy, the other criticizes it. But in China there are two parties in power at the same time, one being for peace, and the other for war, and therefore the treatment shown to the mission was of a character totally different from that which was expected. Mr. Bruce desired that the Admiral should proceed to the mouth of the Peiho, and when there endeavour to ascertain what arrangements had been made for his reception. He always proposed that he should be allowed to go up with one or perhaps two ships, just sufficient for himself and retinue. It was not proposed to take up the whole squadron. The Admiral could not find out what orders had been given to the forts. It did not appear whether there was to be resistance or not. A number of country people appeared, whom Mr. Bruce calls a rabble, and they said there was no person of authority among them, that they were mere country people, that they had put stakes in the river to defend themselves against pirates (which is not a very unlikely event), and that they knew nothing of what the Government would do. So matters remained until the last moment. It was not that Mr. Bruce insisted on refusing the proposition of the Emperor of China that he should go some other route, but up to nine o'clock on the day the attack was made he was induced to think that the Government of China was not disposed to resist his proceeding up the Peiho. And let me say that my belief is, that if Admiral Hope had been as successful as the gallant Admiral (Admiral Seymour) was the year before in passing the forts and destroying them, we should have heard that Mr. Bruce had arrived at Peking; and as the gallant Admiral has said, if his boat had got into the mud, there would have been hundreds of Chinese to assist him; and that the Emperor of China would have said the resistance was made against his orders, and that he was quite ready to disavow any such resistance, and to receive Mr. Bruce as became the representative of a friendly Power. But events, I must own, turned out otherwise. I do not attempt to say precisely what course was that which might have saved Mr. Bruce from difficulty. It appears to me that the evils which he had to consider were very great on every side. He was placed without instructions in a position he did not expect. He had with him a large force. He had with him, mind you, a large force—a large British force, with a British Admiral in command. He desired the Admiral to clear the river. When the morning came on which that was to be done, he received intimation that if he would go to another place, ten miles off, he would be received by a high officer, and means provided by which he might reach Peking. Let any one who really feels that indulgence which the hon. Gentleman professed consider the difficult position to which Mr. Bruce was placed. He was ordered by the Government of his country to go to Peking to obtain the ratification of the treaty, and not to ratify the treaty anywhere else. He was told at the mouth of the river that militia and rabble had put stakes, in order to defend themselves against pirates. There were some persons at Shanghai who told him that the Emperor of China meant to resist the advance of the British Minister. Other persons told him that preparations were made for his reception, and everything would pass in tranquillity. He had to decide this difficult question, whether he should attempt to pass by force, or without orders desire the British Admiral to retire from forts which were taken with ease by a British force the year before, and thus give the appearance to the whole of China—I may say to the whole of England and the whole of Europe—of shrinking before forts which were easily overcome a short time before. Let us suppose he had taken the latter course. Let us consider what opinion would then have been passed upon him in this country. Let us suppose that at nine o'clock in the morning he had said, "I will not attempt to pass these forts, but submit to any proposal which the Chinese Government may make." For my own part, I am inclined to think that after the successful resistance made to the British and French advance the Chinese were more disposed to be civil and apparently conciliatory to the Americans than they would have been under other circumstances. It was their obvious policy. Let us suppose that Mr. Bruce had met with the same treatment as the American Minister, and that he had been conveyed to the capital in what is said to be not the most honourable mode of conveyance. I will suppose him to have arrived at the capital, and to have been told, as Mr. Ward was, that if he expected an audience he must perform the kotoo—strike his head to the ground and offer himself as the representative of a tributary nation. I will suppose him to have displayed the same spirit as Mr. Ward—and I am sure he would have displayed it—that he had replied that he would perform

no ceremony which was not performed at the Courts of the Western Powers, or which would be considered as degrading, or as placing his Sovereign in an inferior position to the Emperor of China. The Chinese would have said to him, as they said to Mr. Ward, "What was the use of your coming here, then? You can't ratify your treaty here; we will conduct you to the coast, and there it will be ratified." Suppose Mr. Bruce had done all this, what would have been said of his conduct here? Would not people have said to him, "You had instructions to go to Peking to get your treaty ratified; you have not obeyed them; you have suffered humiliation, and you have not carried out your object, your only excuse being that you had reason to apprehend some resistance, though you were aware, and, indeed, had seen it with your own eyes, that a similar resistance had been previously overcome with the greatest ease? Don't you know the character always given of the Chinese, that they are an unwarlike nation? Don't you know that the resistance from which you ran away might have been overcome in half an hour, if you had gone boldly forward?" Can anybody doubt that this would have been the judgment passed on Mr. Bruce here? On the other hand, there was the danger that, the Chinese having got ready their forts, blocked up the river, and altogether made more extensive preparations than Mr. Bruce was aware of, Her Majesty's troops might suffer a reverse in spite of their gallantry and bravery. These were the alternatives presented to Mr. Bruce, and never was a civil officer placed in a situation of more difficulty. Without attempting to decide—and I will not attempt to decide myself whether his course was the best—I say there were infinite difficulties on both sides, and the Government were justified—and not only justified, but they would have been neglecting their duty in doing otherwise—in telling Mr. Bruce that their confidence in him was not diminished by the course he had taken. I have said thus much because it was necessary, after the numerous complaints which have been made against Mr. Bruce, and after what has been said to-night by the hon. Member, to place before the House the difficulties in which he was placed. When this news reached Her Majesty's Government, we came to the immediate and unanimous conclusion that, whatever might be the terms proposed to the Chinese Government, or the course hereafter pursued towards them, it was necessary to support them by such a force in the Chinese waters as should make it manifest that our moderation was the result of willingness, not of weakness. With regard to the particular terms we have offered, the gallant Admiral said, most truly, that we could not have asked for less than the treaty of Tien-tsin, which had been signed and had received the special approval of the Emperor of China. Nothing but the ratification remained to be given, and it would have been impossible for us, because Her Majesty's forces had suffered a loss, because 400 or 500 men had been killed or wounded, to give up a treaty solemnly agreed to, or to retreat from conditions to which the Emperor of China had given his consent. It was also necessary to ask for an apology for what has occurred, to which I think we are entitled; for, whatever may be the case of the Emperor of China with regard to his right of forbidding a passage up his rivers, or defending their entrance, he was clearly not justified in barring the passage without giving notice, or in entrapping the British Minister into an ambuscade. For such a proceeding the dignity of the Crown and the nation requires an ample satisfaction and apology. With regard to the general question I quite agree with the gallant Admiral and the sentiments that have been expressed by the hon. Gentleman that we should treat the Chinese with every justice. It is not because England and France are far stronger in war than China that therefore we ought to give them an inch less than the justice to which they are entitled. I agree with the gallant Admiral, too, in those motives of policy to which he referred. I know very well that in pressing too severely upon the Emperor of China we may entirely dislocate the whole fabric of the Empire and the state of society already too much weakened and impaired, and that that which is our only business there, commerce, might be seriously injured by standing out for complete, instead of resting satisfied with insufficient, terms of peace. But, at the same time, everybody I have seen possessing any acquaintance with China is of opinion that unless we place ourselves in a position to show that we are able to enforce all our demands, the lives not only of British subjects, but of all Europeans in China, would be endangered. We must be strong enough to vindicate our honour and treat with them on equal terms. At first it was necessary to make preparations by which to show our strength, and this we did in communication with the Emperor of the French. There was a chance that the Emperor of China might offer terms himself; that Mr. Bruce's readiness to receive those terms might be known, and that the whole matter might have been settled in a way to satisfy our honour, and at the same time obtain for us the terms of the treaty. That hope has to some extent been disappointed. It may be that it would be wiser to send out a person of more authority than Mr. Bruce, who has not been engaged in this conflict, who might obtain from the Emperor the concession of terms of peace which he would not otherwise assent to. That is a matter to which the attention of the Government has been seriously directed, and I shall take an early opportunity, as soon as the next mail comes in—and we expect it very soon—to state to the House the course which the Government intend to pursue. In the mean time, not fearing the decision of this House, not unwilling to give it every information, I venture to say that I do not think that they are in a position at this moment, without all the circumstances of the case before them, to come to a decision. I think it would be well for the House to wait before it pronounces any absolutely decisive opinion either on the conduct of Mr. Bruce or the course which the Government propose to pursue. I agree with the gallant Admiral that our business in China is commerce. A Minister residing there would not have the same duties to perform as a Minister residing at any European Court. His chief business would be to treat of matters of commerce, to protect his own countrymen residing in the country, and to obtain reparation for them if any of them chanced to sustain injury; and it is a serious question to consider whether this could best be done by a Minister residing at Peking, or at one of the outports, and going to Peking occasionally. These are matters which require grave consideration. I am not saying now that we ought to ask for more than we have already obtained, the option which is given by the Treaty of Tien-tsin. Every honour has been rendered, and justly rendered, to the brave men who fought so gallantly yet unsuccessfully. But the character of the naval service has not suffered by that misfortune. I need only add that I shall feel happy indeed if the measures which have been adopted should lead by successful negotiation to the establishment

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: I very much agree with what fell from the noble Lord at the commencement of his speech, that for several reasons the present is not a desirable moment for entering into a general discussion of the question of our relations with China. That opinion acquires even greater force from what was stated at the conclusion of the noble Lord's speech, and by the arrangements which the Government have made for bringing the Naval Estimates forward to-night. The questions arising out of the late unfortunate collision with China, involving not only transactions which have occurred, but matter affecting our future relations with that great Empire, must necessarily be of importance, and in many respects also of extreme difficulty. The hon. Member for Honiton (Mr. B. Cochrane) availing himself of the right which he undoubtedly possessed, has placed before the House the opinions which he entertains on some parts of the subject. He has stated them with great clearness and ability; and I am bound to say, as far as we are now in possession of information, that there were many parts of his observations in which I am much disposed to concur. The noble Lord, in answering my hon. Friend, passed in review several of the transactions which have taken place, but he has not gone into the whole of them; and if I now abstain from entering more fully into the subject, I wish it to be understood that I am not assenting to all that fell from the noble Lord. The conduct of Mr. Bruce in particular is a point on which I should be sorry to express any premature opinion. I am simply anxious not to appear as altogether concurring in the intimation that has fallen from the noble Lord. My belief is, that the conduct of Mr. Bruce must be divided into two periods—namely, that which elapsed prior to his leaving Shanghai, and the subsequent period after his arrival at the mouth of the Peiho. And I would remind the noble Lord that in his observations he has altogether omitted, or, at least, he has touched very lightly on the despatch which bears more than any read by him upon the question at issue—I mean that sent by Mr. Bruce to Shanghai on the 12th or 13th of November. On this matter I wish to be understood as altogether reserving my opinion. But I have felt a very great desire to hear what are the intentions of the Government on so important and delicate a matter. I hope I may infer from the little the noble Lord has said to-day, that the course which they will pursue will be one of moderation. Further than that I will not inquire, especially after the declaration, which I heard with great satisfaction, and as to which I hope no misunderstanding exists—that as soon as the next despatch is received, which the Government expect will be on a very early day, we may anticipate a full explanation from the noble Lord of the policy which they are prepared to adopt with regard to China. [Lord J. Russell signified his assent.] With that understanding, I think the offer made by the noble Lord affords an additional reason for abstaining at this moment from any further discussion; particularly as we are all anxious to hear the statement of my noble Friend opposite (Lord C. Paget). But although I thus wish to exercise some reserve in entering into the general question of our policy in China, there is one part of the subject on which I wish to maintain no reserve at all, and that is as to the appeal which I understood was in some sense made to me by the hon. and gallant Admiral the Member for Devonport (Admiral Seymour) with regard to the opinion expressed by the late Board of Admiralty regarding his conduct while in command on the Chinese station. I confess I entertain some regret that the hon. and gallant officer felt obliged—as I presume he did in justice to himself—to allude to the unfortunate difference which occurred between him and the noble Lord our Ambassador in China. I am inclined to believe that the fact of that difference was very little known in this country, and I am still more strongly disposed to believe that no one was inclined to attach blame to the gallant Admiral. I am sorry that the matter has been brought before the House of Commons, but as he has felt it due to himself to advert to the subject, I think I am bound in justice to confirm what has fallen from him, and to say that the Board of Admiralty unanimously approved of his conduct. After the case was brought under their notice, they sent out to the gallant Admiral for an explanation of the facts, and a full and clear explanation was returned by the gallant officer. After it had been carefully considered it was my pleasing duty to assure him, on the part of the Board of Admiralty, that we approved of the course which he had adopted; and I think I am bound further to express the opinion of the Board that there had been nothing in the conduct of the gallant Admiral which was not perfectly consistent with the high and honourable character which he has at all times borne.

SIR DE LACY EVANS said, as he had placed a notice of Motion on this subject upon the Paper, he might be permitted to say a few words, which the hon. Member who had introduced the discussion had spared him the necessity of prolonging to any great extent. The policy to be pursued towards China by Her Majesty's Government he hoped would be maturely considered; but with regard to this question the noble Lord the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs appeared in a new character. The House would remember the eloquence and grace with which he had delivered his opinions on the same subject on a former occasion; but he could not as truthfully congratulate the noble Lord on the extenuatory speech of that evening, and he did not think he had satisfactorily replied to the arguments of the hon. Member for Honiton. The noble Lord had stated that every indulgence was to be extended to Mr. Bruce; but the important question still remained, whether in making war on another country, he was justified by his instructions, or whether his acts had been subsequently approved of by the Government. In a speech made by the Earl of Derby on the 24th of January, he said—

MR. SPEAKER: The gallant General must not read a speech which was made in the House of Lords.

SIR DE LACY EVANS said, he would simply refer to the speech as being made in "another place." The noble Earl was reported to have said,—

MR. SPEAKER: The gallant General is equally out of order in repeating what took place during the present Session of Parliament in the House of Lords.

SIR DE LACY EVANS said, he would not allude to the House of Lords. He would merely state that a noble Lord who had been Prime Minister at no very distant period, had declared that Mr. Bruce was not sanctioned by any instructions from his Government in the course which he had pursued. There were some other passages of importance in the speech of the noble Earl, but, under penalty of the displeasure of the Speaker, he would not refer to them; the despatch of the noble Lord the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, however, might be legitimately remarked on. That noble Lord who now extended an absolute approbation to the conduct of Mr. Bruce, stated in the last document which he had submitted to the House,

"Now, although the denial of a passage to the capital by the usual and most convenient route would have been evidence of an unfriendly disposition, yet it was a matter upon which you might have remonstrated and negotiated without having recourse to force to clear the passage."

Now, they were told by the noble Lord, that it would have been unbecoming to the English character and reputation if he had remonstrated or proceeded according to any other course than that which he had adopted. [Lord J. RUSSELL:—No.] Surely, there was some inconsistency in such a declaration. He understood the noble Lord to deny that such was his meaning. If, however, the effect of the discussion which had taken place were to induce Her Majesty's Government to nominate some high personage to conduct the negotiations in China, who did not labour under the disadvantage of having been mixed up in the previous controversy, he believed that a beneficial result would have been attained. The noble Lord had also stated that when the next despatches had arrived they (the Government) would be prepared to come to a decision and to state their policy. Under these circumstances it would ill become him to press the Motion of which he had given notice. But the noble Lord, in alluding to this matter, had not attached sufficient importance to the war they were then engaged in. It was a war which would employ an army of 30,000 men. The noble Lord had stated satisfactorily, as far as it went, but rather vaguely, that the demands Her Majesty's Government would make on China were very moderate. The demands might be of that character, but if they were to be backed by 30,000 men, the results of such demands might be by no means moderate. It was a subject for the most serious consideration by the House. He would postpone his Motion till the period alluded to by the noble Lord, but there ought to be no delay on the part of the Government in making their intentions known.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: I think, Sir, it seems to be the general opinion of the House that it will be more expedient and desirable to postpone the discussion of this question till my noble Friend shall be enabled by the arrival of further accounts from China to explain to the House fully what course Her Majesty's Government intend to pursue. We have another important subject immediately coming on, and I should hope the House will forbear the discussion of this question at present, in order to go at once into the Navy Estimates. I will only observe that the hon. and gallant General appears to have misunderstood something that fell from my noble Friend, and consequently sees some inconsistency between it and what he has written on a former occasion. But there really is none; the gallant General supposes my noble Friend to have told Mr. Bruce, in the despatch referred to, that if he had been informed beforehand that he could not be allowed to go up the Peiho, he might have remonstrated, and some arrangement might have been made as to the manner in which he should have proceeded to Pekin. Now what my noble Friend said was, that no such intimation having been given by the Chinese authorities, and the expedition having been already detained for some time at the mouth of the Peiho without receiving any intelligence as to its route, it was not advisable, under such circumstances, to retire without attempting to ascend the river. It must also be recollected that Mr. Bruce's decision was probably influenced by his instructions from the Earl of Malmesbury, who told him he was to be accompanied by a sufficient force. Mr. Bruce might, not very unnaturally, think that this force was to be "sufficient" for some purpose or other. As the immediate purpose was to go up in a ship of war to ratify the treaty of Tien-tsin, he might also be allowed to consider that the sufficiency of the accompanying force was to be measured by its power of overcoming any obstacle in the way. But I will not set the example of continuing the discussion I am asking the House to postpone. I wish now to state that the hon. and learned Member for Bridgwater (Mr. Kinglake) has a Motion standing on the notice paper for to-morrow evening. In the present state of things it will be very inconvenient to press on a discussion upon that Motion; and I would ask the hon. and learned Member to have the kindness to postpone it till a time when the House will be better able to consider it.

SIR CHARLES NAPIER said, he thought a great deal had been said in justification of Mr. Bruce, but very little of Admiral Hope. He was sure the House would like to hear more of the courage he had shown in the action in the Peiho than they would see in the despatches. He wished then, before the conversation on the

China question closed, to read a letter from an officer who was near the Admiral during the action, who bore witness to the extraordinary courage his commanding officer displayed. It said:—

"I am going to try and give you an account of our most disastrous affair, as my time will allow, and I know you will make allowances for me. I suppose the Admiral's despatch will be published, but I doubt if you will get all there; at any rate, you cannot hear from that source how nobly he behaved. We went into action at 2-30, the Admiral standing on the top of the cook-house, myself and the French captain on the harness casks in front of him. By three o'clock he was badly wounded by a round shot taking away the fleshy part of the thigh, the lieutenant commanding and eight men killed, and twenty-two badly wounded. The Plover then dropped down for more men, and the Admiral left her to hoist his flag in the Opossum: all this time his wound had been unattended to, except what my little surgical knowledge pointed out. When we left the Plover there were only nine of us with a whole skin left out of her crew; she was literally like a butcher's slaughter-house. We had not been long in the Opossum before the Admiral was again wounded. We had managed to get him on the top of the cook-house again, and, being weak from his wound, he was supporting himself by the mainstay, when a round shot took that away and threw him down on the deck, injuring him on the head and fracturing his ribs,—still he would not give in, and was placed on the gunwale, till, at last, being quite done up, he fainted. I then got him into a boat (French), and was taking him away, but he came to, and asked me which was the ship furthest in. I said, 'Cormorant.' 'Then take me there.' So we went to the Cormorant, where, finding him perfectly unable to stand, I had the signal made for Captain Shadwell, the senior captain, who came on board and took charge."

In all the records of our naval history there was no instance of an officer showing greater pluck and gallantry, particularly as every one who had been wounded must know the depressing effects such severe wounds had on the system. He would not go into the question whether Admiral Hope was right or wrong in the attack he made; but he thought Her Majesty's Government would only show a good feeling if it sent him out the Victoria Cross. It was not a decoration intended only for successful actions; it was the reward of great valour, and no officer had ever displayed more than Admiral Hope. He trusted the Government would see the necessity and propriety of giving him the Cross.

SAVOY AND NICE.—POSTPONEMENT OF MOTION.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, he wished to appeal to his hon. Friend behind him (Mr. Kinglake) who had a Motion on the Paper for to-morrow on a question of great interest, and as it would be most inconvenient in the present state of things to discuss the subject in Parliament, to ask him if he would be kind enough to postpone his Motion to some future period.

MR. A. W. KINGLAKE said, with respect to the appeal of the noble Viscount (Viscount Palmerston), he had, on the previous day, received a note from the noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs, containing an intimation similar to that just expressed. The application was based on the fact that bringing on the Motion the next day would be injurious to the public service and affect the negotiations still going on on the subject. On receiving the note, he felt it his duty to ask the noble Lord to make the application publicly in the House; and he had also communicated the facts and the course he intended to take to the right hon. Member for Buckinghamshire (Mr. Disraeli). He could not but express his regret for the decision the Government had arrived at in determining to intercept the voice of the House of Commons on this question. He believed that a calm and temperate expression of the opinion of the House of Commons would not have weakened the efforts of Her Majesty's Government, but materially have strengthened their hands. He might also be permitted, in an humble way, to express his own opinion that Her Majesty's Ministers, in the course of that discussion, would possibly have obtained a knowledge of matters of dry fact, which, as far as he could judge, they did not then possess. He ventured to say this because, if he rightly understood some of the statements made by Earl Granville in "another place," Her Majesty's Government appeared to have acted under a singular mistake, a mistake for the existence of which he could easily account, but still a mistake which might be fraught with the most momentous consequences. Since this appeal, however, had been made to him by the noble Secretary for Foreign Affairs, as a loyal subject of the Queen, it was needless to say that he must assent to the delay. On the other hand, he should have the right to expect that his Motion should be allowed to come on at such a time that it would not come on in vain. According to information which reached him not many days ago, the 20th of this month was the day fixed for the—, he wished to avoid the use of any intemperate expression, but he would say, that, according to information which he had received, the 20th of this month was the day fixed for the completion of the Act in question. The day on which the noble Lord proposed he should bring on his Motion was the 28th. This was naturally unsatisfactory to him, as it was just eight days after the date when it was reported the Act was to be complete. He should, however, be prepared to accept the assurance of the noble Lord at the head of the Government that the 28th instant would not be too late a day to secure the object which he had in view in entering upon the discussion of an important question. He need hardly add that he should expect, should any circumstances in the meantime occur rendering it desirable, that a day earlier than the 28th would be selected for that discussion—for he had no doubt the House were of opinion it ought to take place before the event against which it was meant to provide had come to pass—the noble Lord would feel it to be his duty to make such communication either to him or the House as would lead to the result which both had in view.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE said, it would be very satisfactory if the Government would name a day for renewing the discussion on China. February was wearing away fast; a large expedition had to be got together; and it ought to be in motion in April or May. He trusted the Government would consider well before attempting to take possession of Peking, and would also bear in mind the dangers which would beset the expedition if it were detained in the waters of Peking so late as November, when the monsoon changed from the north, and rendered the winter almost Siberian in its character. The Gulf of Pecheli was so acted upon by the winds that in winter it was impossible for vessels to approach the land within eight or nine miles. The expedition, under these circumstances, would be liable to have its supplies cut off, and, having to deal with a hostile and ingenious enemy, a second Cabul disaster might be the result.

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, that reverting to the subject of the cession of Savoy to France, he wished to state that his hon. Friend (Mr. Kinglake) was of course bound to yield, as he had done, to the wish of the noble Lord at the head of the Government with respect to the postponement of his Motion. It was, however, of the utmost importance that the question to which that Motion related should be discussed without delay. It was one with respect to which he, as well as his hon. Friend, had received private information of the utmost importance; and he could not help thinking, with all due deference to his noble Friend (Viscount Palmerston) that it would be for the public advantage that the House of Commons should be afforded an opportunity of giving expression to their opinions upon the subject. He must add that the noble Lord the Minister for Foreign Affairs (Lord John Russell) seemed to him to be very shy and coy in furnishing the House with information on matters connected with Foreign Affairs, and not to be disposed to act with that liberality on the point which was desirable. The Government, of course, he was aware, occupied a position as well in the case of foreign as of domestic policy which required that no ordinary amount of consideration should be extended to them; but it must, nevertheless, be borne in mind that discussions in that House, and the calm determination at which it might arrive on any particular question, were calculated to produce an effect abroad, and that being so, he should appeal to his noble Friend at the head of the Government to fix a day when the Motion of the hon. Member for Bridgewater might be proceeded with. The question of the cession of Savoy to France was one, he might add, which affected very much the future of Switzerland, and he held in his possession letters assuring him that the treaty by which that cession was accomplished had already been signed. He had, moreover, been asked to plead the cause of Switzerland in that House, and to state on her behalf that if Savoy were made over to France the neutrality of Switzerland would be at an end—a neutrality guaranteed by the treaties of 1815, which the noble Lord the Member for Tiverton, called the charters by which the European Powers now held the territories which they possessed. If, then, the cession in question were to take place, a most scandalous and iniquitous proceeding, and one which would affect the future position of the European nations perhaps to European convulsion, would have been resorted to. He would, therefore, again entreat his noble Friend to name a day when the discussion upon the subject might be entered upon.

ADMIRAL WALCOTT: Sir, as other opportunity will offer to enter upon this discussion, and as the House is very naturally desirous to proceed with the Naval Estimates, I will restrict myself to the expression of my concurrence in the suggestion of the hon. and gallant Admiral (Sir C. Napier) that the Victoria Cross should be conferred on Admiral Hope. It has, I admit, been almost always the practice of the Government of this country not to grant rewards for deeds of heroism which were not followed by success; but then I should remind the House that Admiral Hope had acted in the case of the encounter at the mouth of the Peiho not upon his own responsibility, but upon the authority and at the request of the British Minister, Mr. Bruce, so that he did not come within the scope of the rule by which honour was refused to unsuccessful bravery, because of the stimulus which a contrary course was supposed to afford to the undertaking of rash and disastrous enterprises. I trust, however, that in honouring Admiral Hope, the Government will not be unmindful of the almost superhuman gallantry which had been displayed by the officers and men who had served under his command. I trust, Sir, that I may be permitted again to avow that I believe the circumstances of the action of the Peiho justified the Admiral in commencing the endeavour to force the passage to enable Mr. Bruce to proceed to Peking, and redound, on calm consideration of the fact, most signally to his honour.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, he must express his regret that the gallant Officer who had just spoken, as well as some other distinguished members of the naval profession, should seem to think that the Government had not done justice to that most heroic officer, Admiral Hope, for his conduct at the mouth of the Peiho. He could, however, state with the utmost sincerity that the Admiralty highly appreciated that conduct, as well as the bravery of the gallant band who were under Admiral Hope's command, and the loss of many of whom the country had reason to deplore. The Admiralty, he might add, had not confined their appreciation to mere words. Admiral Hope had had several promotions placed at his disposal, in consequence of the encounter of the Peiho, and three officers had already been promoted on his recommendation. Besides those, through death vacancies, there had been four or five promotions; and the Admiral had been further informed that he was at liberty to recommend for advancement a gunner, a boatswain, three engineers, and other meritorious petty officers, to the number of six. The Admiralty also took that occasion of expressing their high sense of the gallantry of himself and the officers under him. Whether that declaration was to be made again it was for the Government to consider. The House, however, must bear in mind that there must always be some discrimination between that which was a victory and that which was not so, for the reasons alleged by the gallant Officer who had last addressed them. Undoubtedly the Government would be most glad to extend to Admiral Hope any proof of their approbation of his gallantry; but if rewards were to be bestowed on officers who, however gallant their conduct, and however well conducted their operations, did not attain success, it would lead hereafter to very great inconvenience. Imprudent officers might be led to undertake expeditions at great loss of life, with the hope of receiving those rewards. Therefore it was certainly the bounden duty of the Government to exercise the utmost discrimination in this respect; but with regard to Admiral Hope and the gallant officers under him, they had had the full approval of the Admiralty.

COMMERCIAL TREATY WITH FRANCE.— COAL.—QUESTION.

MR. HORSMAN said, he rose to put a Question to the Government with respect to the Commercial Treaty with France. The House would bear in mind that when it had been first rumoured that that Treaty was about to be entered into, there existed in this country a feeling rather opposed to it, but that when it had been announced by the noble Lord at the head of the Government that no provision of the Treaty would be carried into effect until it had been submitted to, and received the sanction of Parliament, public confidence had, to some extent, been restored. The 20th Article of the proposed Treaty ran thus:—

"The present Treaty not to be valid, unless Her Britannic Majesty be authorized by the consent of Her Parliament to execute the engagements contracted by Her in the several Articles of the Treaty."

The question he wanted to ask was—in what manner Government intended to proceed to obtain the assent of Parliament to the Articles of the Treaty? His question had especial reference to the 11th Article, The other Articles would come before them in Committee of Supply, the duties being remitted by Resolution to that effect in the ordinary way. But the 11th Article was to this effect—

This Article was distinguished from all the rest, as it would not be brought under the consideration of the House in Committee of Supply, where they voted to take off duties. By this Article they only pledged themselves not to put a duty on, and therefore in Committee of Supply this Article of the Treaty would not be submitted to them, and their assent to it could not be obtained. He attached the more importance to this, because the Article was the most remarkable in the whole Treaty. The House would remember that the article of coal was the one first to be admitted into France, very much prior to the date at which the general admission of English articles was to be allowed. It was also to be admitted at a very much lower duty; not only so, but at a duty of an entirely different character; because, while all other articles were admitted under a protective duty, and a high protective duty, the article of coal was to be admitted at a low revenue duty, the only revenue duty in the whole Treaty. It was also remarkable that while we bound ourselves in all time coming not to make Coal an article of revenue to ourselves, we allowed France to make it an article of revenue to her. It was also remarkable in a constitutional point of view. By this Article Her Majesty bound her Ministers in the first place, in all time coming, not to propose an export duty on coal. She also bound herself, if any individual Member passed a Resolution through Parliament recommending the imposition of such a duty, to interpose her veto. No Chancellor of the Exchequer, whatever the exigencies of the country, whatever hostilities we might be involved in, and however other sources of taxation might be strained to the utmost, could, according to the terms of the Treaty, propose to derive a revenue from coal. But it was to be observed that this stipulation did not apply to France only; it must apply to all the other nations of the world. Whatever might be our relations with any other State of the world, a Minister could not, during peace, put an export duty on coal going to France, or any country with which we were not at war. He did not wish to say a word in favour of an export duty. Everybody knew that export duties were vicious in principle, and, indeed, indefensible; but the principle which applied to other duties as objectionable, did not apply to coal. Wine or cotton might be used and re-produced, but coal was an exhaustible commodity. Scientific men had been at one time much alarmed at the progress of the consumption of coal in this country. It was well known that the late Dr. Buckland, who was the intimate friend of the late Sir R. Peel, very much urged him to put an export duty on coal. And though he did not connect the two circumstances as cause and effect, it was known that Sir R. Peel did, in 1842, violate his principle of Political Economy, and did put an export duty on coal, and on coal alone. He (Mr. Horsman) also attached the greater importance to this from the language of Lord J. Russell, in his letter of instructions to our Plenipotentiaries at the time the Treaty was about to be signed. His Lordship, after alluding to the vast market for coal, added—"Indeed there still remains more or less of the disposition, which formerly was strong, to view the export of coal with jealousy, or even to subject it to restriction." It had been formerly the opinion of the best scientific men that, even at the then rate of consumption, the coal-fields of England then worked could not last 300 years. Three hundred years, they said, was a very long time compared to the life of a man, but a very short time in the life of a nation. The greatness of England depended upon her coal. And if 300 years hence their coal should be exhausted, what, they asked, would become of the country, for which they were bound to legislate for the future as well as the present. But it was not now the question whether they should put an export duty on coal; they were absolutely going to the other extreme, and giving a bonus for its exportation. He had intended some time ago to move for the appointment of a Royal Commission to inquire into the statistics affecting the new and larger coal-fields in Wales, and how long, at the present rate of consumption, they were likely to last. Since he had seen this Article in the Treaty that notion had been revived; and he certainly thought it would be a very wise act on the part of Ministers to issue a Royal Commission to inquire what was the extent of coal to be had in the United Kingdom, and how long it was likely to last. This Article of the Treaty, the only one to be withdrawn from the notice and sanction of Parliament, was in his opinion so important, that he had rather all the rest had been withdrawn than it. He wished to know whether or not it was the intention of the Government, by any other mode, to take the opinion of the House to its approval of that Article?

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH said, the Treaty was very one-sided. With reference to the statement of the right hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Horsman) it was important to observe that while the article obliged us not to put any duty on the export of coal, there was no reciprocal obligation on France not to put export duties on articles sent to this country. Nay, more, on wine, brandy, and almost all other articles of French produce, an export duty was put. If this clause of the Treaty were allowed to remain as it was, it should be made to apply to export duties put on by France on articles of her produce.

MR. GREGSON remarked, that some very competent authorities considered that the coal of the United Kingdom would afford a supply, at the present rate of consumption, for 2,000 years.

COLONEL HERBERT said, he could not help observing that very important consequences were involved in this Article of the Treaty, which certainly required further explanation from the Government. As he read the Article, in the event of any angry discussion with France tending to war, and making war imminent, nothing short of an absolute declaration of war on our part would enable us to prohibit the exportation of coal. There was another point,—in the event of war with any other Power, even during the continuance of that war, nothing could enable us to prohibit the exportation of coal to France, thus making France a general coal depôt, with a power of selling it to the other nation with which we might be at war. In the event of war between France and any other Power we equally engaged not to prohibit the exportation of coal. It might so occur that France, being engaged in war with some other nation, we might be prepared, not to take part in it, but to take the line, perfectly right in a neutral Power, to prevent the exportation of coal to France for the purpose of carrying on the war. Coal was not yet decided to be contraband of war; but it was in the power of our Courts so to declare it. Whether so declared or not, however, it was obviously as much an article of warlike stores as gunpowder, or any other material which had always been so regarded. Such being the case he hoped to receive from the Government some explanation on this Article of the tariff.

MR. AYRTON said, he wished to express a hope that the second reading of the Corporation (City of London) Bill would be so fixed that its coming on would not be left in uncertainty from the number of notices which preceded it.

MR. J. L. RICARDO said, the object of our commercial legislation should be to exchange that which we could produce with the greatest facility for that which we most required. It was to be expected that many captious objections should be taken to the fiscal arrangements recently announced; but the very last objection to have been anticipated certainly was the one now urged against the exchange of that commodity which of all others we could produce cheapest and with the greatest advantage to ourselves. He could not agree with the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Horsman) in his estimate of the policy of an export duty. Most writers on political economy held that there was very little difference between an export and an import duty; and unless we put an export duty on coal, how were we to prevent that article from being exported? This was a question not for us, but for other countries to decide. There was nothing new in the exportation of coal from England. Now, however, the French Government were willing to admit our coal duty free, or at least at a reduced duty. Where was the great misfortune in that? As far as war-like objects were concerned, there was no reason why the French Government should not have admitted our coal and iron at any previous time, except that it had hitherto thought fit to levy an import duty upon them for State purposes. The present was not, however, a proper occasion for discussing the great question of the Commercial Treaty.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, he was willing to admit that it was not the proper time to discuss the general subject, but the object of the right hon. Member for Stroud was a simple one. He wished to obtain from the Government some explanation as to the manner in which a particular article in the Treaty was to be dealt with by the House. That question was one of great importance.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, that having already spoken he did not intend to trespass on the indulgence of the House by asking permission to enter into details with reference to that portion of the Treaty. He would simply assure them that full information would be given on that as well as on other points on Monday next. It was inconvenient to anticipate now what would be duly explained on the proper occasion. He had risen solely to answer the question that had been put to him relative to the Bill for the reform of the Corporation of London. That measure was fixed for Thursday. Other matters, however, stood for Thursday; and if that Bill could not then come on at a proper hour for its fair discussion, it would be fixed for some other day, when it could be considered at a proper hour of the evening.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, that before the right hon. Gentleman left the Chair he wished to call attention to the enormous increase in the Navy Estimates for the present year. These Estimates, the grand total of which exceeded £12,800,000, were larger in amount by more than a £1,000,000 than any that had ever been presented to that House in time of peace. Such an augmentation in our armaments was naturally supposed by the country to indicate that the Government were under an apprehension that war would occur at no distant period. It was desirable that the House should know from the Government whether there was any foundation for that impression. If there was not, the Government were not justified in submitting such extravagant Estimates to Parliament. The number of men required for the navy this year of peace was 85,500, being 6,000 more than they required when they were actually at war with Russia. The cost of the navy was £13,900,000, being £8,050,000 more than was required in 1851. The army and navy this year cost £14,626,000 more than was required in 1851. The expenditure under these heads was increasing at a fearful ratio, and must continue to do so unless the House took the matter seriously into its own hands. The greater the expenditure the greater the patronage at the command of the Ministry of the day. He took notice, with regard to shipbuilding, that the shipwrights' wages per ton were 50 per cent higher at Woolwich than at Chatham, and he thought the difference most extraordinary. He also wished to inquire whether it was the intention of the Government to go on creating a vast accumulation of Admirals. There were no fewer than 336 Admirals in the present Estimates, and that was an Admiral for almost every ship and gun-boat in the navy. With regard to Generals of Marines, there were no less than 38 in the present Estimates, though he believed that during the last war no such officer was known. He believed the appointment to be a sinecure. A vast amount of money was spent as bounties and gratuities, and he therefore hoped that the noble Secretary to the Admiralty would be able to give a better account than he had given last year of the success of the new scheme in procuring able seamen; and he likewise trusted that the noble Lord at the head of the Government would state whether it was on account of the apprehension of war with any great Power that he required so much money for naval and military purposes.

COLONEL SYKES said, he concurred with the hon. Member for Lambeth in his observations upon the alarming increase of the Naval and Military Estimates. If they went on increasing as they had done of late years, vast as was the increase of the capital of the country, it would be unequal to meet the enormous growth of expenditure. He could see nothing either in the external relations of the country or in its internal to account for the increase in the naval and military expenditure, which was progressing absolutely systematically and determinedly. The increase of £1,000,000 in the Naval Estimates of the year would have enabled the Chancellor of the Exchequer to remove the war duties on tea and sugar. It would be better for the country to be actually at war, because then they might hope to see some end of the expense, but there seemed to be no prospect of a cessation of the expenditure, which was occasioned by the state of suspicion in which they now were. When the noble Lord the Secretary for the Admiralty was on the Opposition Benches, he gave the House reason to suppose that he was in favour of economy. Since the noble Lord had come into office he had somewhat disappointed those expectations. In the name of common sense why could not a proposition be made for a mutual disarmament in France and this country.

MR. LINDSAY said, that though he deeply regretted the great increase in the Estimates, and did not think there was that necessity for it which others imagined, he acquitted the noble Secretary to the Admiralty from all responsibility on account of the increase. The noble Lord, simply as an executive officer, carried out the wishes of the House, and the only question was, whether they were getting the best value for the money spent.

MR. BENTINCK said, he had only two remarks to make in reference to what had fallen from the gallant Member for Aberdeen (Colonel Sykes) on the subject of mutual disarmament. He merely wished to say, what he believed was the opinion of every rational man, that the term was in itself an absurdity. There could be no mutual disarmament between this country and France. What was disarmament in England was not disarmament in France. He trusted that they would not again hear such a proposition brought forward. All he wished to say in reference to his noble Friend the Secretary of the Admiralty was, that he quite concurred in the opinion expressed by the hon. Member for Sunderland (Mr. Lindsay) that the increase in the Navy Estimates this year was not owing to any fault of the noble Lord, who was unable to carry out in office the economical views he had expressed when in Opposition. His noble and gallant Friend when in Opposition did his best to arrest the attention of the House and the Board of Admiralty to certain abuses which were alleged to exist. The noble Lord at that time fully established his case. He (Mr. Bentinck) could state from his own knowledge, that since the noble Lord had taken office, no man could have worked harder or have done more to carry out in practice the pledges he had given when in Opposition. It was mere justice to the noble Lord to say so much. So far from the results of the expenditure of the Admiralty for the present year being over and above what they ought to be, our armaments, great as they were, must, so far as the present defences of the country were concerned, be considered as hardly adequate for the maintenance of our position in case of hostilities such as might occur at any time on a very short notice, and as might involve an enormous stake if this country was not defended by a large maritime force.

CAPTAIN JERVIS said, he attributed the large demands which were now made upon the country for purposes of defence to the House of Commons having been so long "led by the nose" by the late Mr. Hume. In addition to the £70,000,000 of which the Chancellor of the Exchequer had spoken on Friday night, no less a sum than £10,000,000 would be required for national defences. If the House of Commons had done its duty from 1825 downwards we should not now be called upon to pay for what ought to have been done long ago.

Motion agreed to.

ESTIMATES.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET: Sir, it needed not the observations of the hon. Member for Lambeth (Mr. W. Williams) nor those of the hon. and gallant Member for Aberdeen (Colonel Sykes) to convince me of the great responsibility which rests upon my shoulders in presenting this year to the House Estimates for the navy larger than those which were voted last year by upwards of a million, and within one million and a half of the highest Estimates during the late war with Russia; therefore in asking, on the part of the Government, the Committee to vote so vast a sum of money, it behoves me to show the necessity for keeping up our large armaments, and continuing, certainly during the present year, our great system of construction of ships. I believe it will be conceded by all that, apart from the consideration of the navies of other nations, it is absolutely necessary that England, with her numerous Colonies and her enormous commerce, should maintain upon the seas a considerable number of vessels. Even supposing, therefore, that every other European Power were suddenly to disarm, and to lay up its vessels in its ports, we should still be obliged, for the police of the seas, to maintain a large force afloat. So that, no matter what may take place in the way of disarmaments, such as those which have been alluded to by other Powers, nothing of the kind would justify us in adopting a like course. Such, then, is one consideration to which importance ought to be attached when we discuss the Navy Estimates year by year. It is not my intention upon the present occasion to enter upon the history of the past. I shall confine my observations to the present, and as far possible to professional subjects, avoiding all matters of high national policy. Over and above the question of the maintenance of squadrons for the protection of our Colonies and the police of the seas, we must, of course, consider what is the condition of other countries with respect to their navies; for, be it remembered, the steam navy is a new creation. It is the product of the last decade. All nations have recently started fair. A few years ago we had a vast number of line-of-battle ships and frigates, and by turning out a certain number of new vessels every year, and patching up old ones, we managed to maintain our superiority at sea. But a change took place, and suddenly we found ourselves upon an equality with the rest of the world. It behoves us then, immediately to set to work to regain that superiority, of which the introduction of steam has temporarily deprived us. Let me, in the first place, as an important point for our consideration, give the Committee some idea of what other nations really possess. There is, happily, no longer any mystery in these matters. I rejoiced when the right hon. Baronet opposite (Sir John Pakington) gave us last year the fullest information about our own and foreign navies, and shall follow his example. I may also state that foreign nations have no sort of hesitation in showing us their dockyards. An idea at one time prevailed that the French did not like us to state publicly in Parliament the extent and composition of their navy. Only two years ago, in anticipation of a discussion in this House, and knowing there was some little difference of opinion as to the amount of the French force, I wrote to the French Minister of Marine, asking whether he would have any objection to give me a list of the French Navy. He sent me, in reply, the name and force of every ship in the navy. What I am about to state, therefore, need excite no apprehension, as being likely to give the least offence to other nations. I begin with France. The French Navy is really becoming very powerful. At the present time the French have 32 ships of the line afloat and 5 building; 34 frigates afloat and 13 building; 5 iron-cased ships—of which class of vessels I shall have occasion to speak presently—building; 17 corvettes afloat and 2 building; 39 gun-boats afloat and 29 building; 5 floating-batteries afloat and 4 building; 31 transports; 86 avisos afloat and 3 building. All these are steam vessels; and they make an aggregate of 244 afloat and 61 building. We have reason to believe from the best information we have received that most of those which are building might be launched within a few months, but I confine the force at the immediate disposal of the French to 244 ships. It is true that if any gentleman were to inquire at the French Admiralty he would be told that they had only 9 ships of the line at sea, the rest being in reserve; but we should never lose sight of the fact that every one of those 244 vessels could be manned and sent to sea in a very few weeks. "Ships in reserve" is a very good term for the French, and I do not quarrel with it, but according to our view those ships are perfectly ready. The result is, therefore, that the French have 244 steam vessels which, if hostilities were to break out, which God forbid!—and we have indeed, every reason to believe that no such eventuality will occur—could be manned and sent to sea within a very few weeks, some of them within a few days. But there is another Power which is making great struggles to create a steam navy—I mean Russia, and really in our consideration of this subject, I do not think this fact has been brought before the House with sufficient prominence. We are informed, upon very good authority, that the Russians have 9 ships of the line afloat—steam ships like those of France—and 9 building; 18 frigates afloat, and 3 building; 10 corvettes afloat, and 11 building; 30 small vessels, of which we do not exactly know the force, afloat; 112 gun-boats afloat, and 25 building; 8 transports. The total is 187 steam vessels afloat, and 48 building. That is a very formidable navy, and should be taken into consideration when we are discussing what amount of force we ought to maintain at sea. England, as is well known, has of late years been endeavouring to form reserves at a vast expense. First of all, the right hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle (Sir J. Graham) established the continuous service; then we had Coast Volunteers; and now we have what are called the Royal Naval Volunteers. Up to the present time the last-mentioned scheme has not been very successful. I mention this subject now, instead of waiting until I refer to our own force, in order to show the distinction between ourselves, who really have, so to speak, no reserves, and the French and Russians, who have vast bodies of men at their immediate disposal. I am obliged to say that before stating the force which we have in commission, and which, according to my calculation, is that which may fairly be compared with what the French have afloat. The distinction between the fleets of the two countries is this—that while all the French ships which are afloat can be manned at very short notice, it is only those which we have in commission which are in a similar position. Some little novelties are introduced year by year into the Estimates, and at page 13, this year, hon. Members will find the exact number of ships in commission on the 1st December last. On the 1st of

December last we had in commission the following steam ships—I exclude sailing vessels altogether—line-of-battle ships, 27; frigates, 43; sloops, small vessels, and gun-boats, 94; total, 164, being an increase of 46 vessels as compared with the number of steam-ships in commission on the 1st of December, 1858. In addition, we had the 10 coastguard-ships, the coastguard tenders and cruisers, all steam vessels, making a total of 244 steam ships in commission. Since that date we have commissioned 1 line-of-battle ship and 2 frigates. This, then, is the force you must compare with the French and Russian Navy, and I do not think that can be called anything like an undue or improper amount of naval power for this country. Of this force we have for the defence of our own shores, including with the permission of my gallant Friend the Member for Southwark (Sir C. Napier) the Mediterranean squadron, the following:—27 line-of-battle ships, 14 frigates and corvettes, and 29 sloops and gun-boats; total, 70, which is a very respectable force. Of the 27 line-of-battle ships 14 are now at home, and 13 in the Mediterranean. In addition to this force we have the 10 coastguard-ships, which are very useful for the defence of our harbours, and 17 or 18, or sometimes 20, tenders, gun-boats, and cruisers attached to them. In China, we have at this moment 14 frigates and corvettes, and 41 sloops and gun-boats; total, 55 vessels. We have, upon other stations, some at Vancouver's Island, some on the North American station, and some at other places, 3 line-of-battle ships, 19 frigates and corvettes, and 32 sloops and gun-boats; total, 54. This is the force which we have to oppose—God forbid that I should use that word as though any opposition was likely to occur—this is the force which we maintain at sea in comparison with the forces of France and Russia. I now will give the list of our entire Steam Navy. We have of line-of-battle ships 48 afloat, and 11 building, (and we expect within the next month to launch two of the latter which will make 50 afloat by the end of the financial year), besides 12 sailing line-of-battle ships fit for conversion. Of frigates we have 34 afloat and 9 building or converting; and likewise 6 sailing frigates fit for converting; steam block-ships, 9 afloat; iron-cased vessels, 4 building; corvettes 16 afloat, and 5 building; sloops, 45 screw and 35 paddle, total 80 afloat and 15 building; small vessels, 27 afloat; gun-boats, 169 afloat and 23 building; floating batteries, 8 afloat; transports, troopships, tenders, yachts, &c., screw 18, paddle 43, total 61; screw mortar-ships, 4 afloat; total afloat 456, building 67. Supposing the Committee is pleased to consent to these Estimates, we hope to add to the navy, before the end of the next financial year, 8 line-of-battle ships, 12 frigates, 4 iron-cased ships, 4 corvettes, 15 sloops, and 23 gun-vessels and gun-boats. That includes the conversion of 4 line-of-battle ships and 4 frigates. With regard to the Estimates generally, before I turn to the particular Votes, I wish only to state to the Committee that they will find that the great increase arises upon three Votes, those referring to the number of men, the building of ships, and the transport of troops. This expenditure under the latter head is very large, but I hope it is of a temporary and special nature, consequent upon the hostilities with China. I do not enter into the question as to the policy of those hostilities, but I think that, under the circumstances, it is right for the Admiralty to present an Estimate which will be adequate to the performance of the services that may be required. I will now ask the Committee to turn to Vote No. 1 upon which there is an increase of no less than £410,000 over the Vote of last year, in order to give us the power of augmenting our numbers by 11,700 men and boys, of which number we propose to add to the fleet 8,000 seamen, 1,000 marines, and 2,000 boys (this last addition being in accordance with the recommendation of the Royal Commission as to the establishment of training ships), 100 additional Coastguards-men afloat, and 600 ashore. The Coastguards-men on shore are to replace the old Custom House civilians, who are being superannuated. The Board of Admiralty have given to the question of the number of men required the most serious consideration, and that which has been asked for is only enough to man the ships in Commission, and to carry out another recommendation of the Royal Commission, that we should maintain a reserve of seamen in our own ports. We hope we shall be enabled to keep up a force at sea according to the numbers I have mentioned, perhaps with some little increase here and there, as well as a reserve of seamen in our home ports; and in addition we hope to be able to maintain a body of marines not less than 6,000 as a home force.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: What would you state as the average number of the home force?

LORD CLARENCE PAGET: We hope to have a reserve of 10,000 men over and above what are employed on active service. Of course it is impossible to say exactly what will be the force available, but it is the desire of the Admiralty to carry out the recommendation of the Royal Commission, that there should be a considerable reserve of seamen in the home ports, and available for an emergency. In connection with Vote No. 1, we propose to increase the pay of the masters, engineers paymasters, and chaplains of the Royal Navy. Last year, my right hon. Friend opposite (Sir J. Pakington) proposed what has given very general satisfaction in the navy, an increase in the pay of the surgeons of the navy. It was a great misfortune, however, that he overlooked the claims of officers of equal social position. There are three other classes of officers who labour under the same disadvantages as the surgeons—that is to say, to whom the higher ranks of the service are practically, if not absolutely closed. Masters may rise, but not engineers or paymasters. A very strong reason why we should improve the position of the assistant and second masters is to be found in the scarcity of these officers which the Navy List exhibits. They are men of great respectability and high education, and they naturally prefer the merchant service to the navy. If the pay in the latter service be inferior, the same remark holds good of the engineers, who do not care to give up the higher pay which they get in the merchant service to come into the navy. As to paymasters, there is no difficulty in procuring them, but they are in the same social position, and it is impossible to leave them out of view in framing the scheme. The proposal of the Government is that there should be a small increase of pay to each of those classes. The change will consist chiefly in putting them in a higher position, with their present pay,—which is calculated on length of service—that is to say, they will be allowed to count the time they have been second masters, and so on with the paymasters and engineers. It is also proposed they should have the advantage of counting the time during which they have acted before we have confirmed their present rank, and also part of the time they have been assistants, which will be a great boon to these officers. If

Her Majesty should sanction the arrangement, I will lay it on the table. The cost of this increase will be only some £25,000. I do not know that the scheme will give unbounded satisfaction. Some of the parties concerned may think it a rather nig-gardly advance, but it is all the Government think it right to propose. The item for good-conduct pay to petty officers is very much the same as last year. There is one large item not in the present estimate which was very considerable in that of last year; I mean the half bounty. The charge for seamen's clothing, tobacco, and soap, £380,502, is very large this year, even though £274,594 it is assumed will be re-paid by seamen in the course of the year; and I had some doubt whether it ought to fall entirely on the present Estimate, or be in part provided for in that of last year. The enormous addition to the fleet, and the gratuitous issue of clothing exceeded the calculations of the comptroller; and our store being exhausted, this large item required to be taken. It makes a large increase in the Estimate, but will not be a permanent charge. The Vote for victualling depends, of course, on the number of men, and needs no further explanation. In the third Vote, that for the Admiralty, there is an increase to the amount of £14,323. I have received from the Accountant-General of the Navy a very curious statement as to the amount of the cost of the management and superintendence of the Admiralty since 1821 to the present time, year by year, which shows very clearly that we are much harder worked now than our predecessors used to be. In 1821 the Navy Estimates amounted to £6,382,785; yet the superintendents of the Admiralty and Navy Boards, which were then separate, consisted of not less than thirty-four people—seven Lords, eighteen Commissioners, and nine Secretaries. The Estimates for the present year amount to £12,802,000, or more than double those of 1821; and the superintendents of the Admiralty consist of only thirteen persons, namely, six Lords, two Secretaries, and five principal officers. On referring to the accounts of 1821, I find that the establishment of clerks was then about as numerous as now. The cost of the establishment of the Lords, the Secretaries, the principal Officers and the Clerks of the Admiralty was £123,986 in 1821, against £97,308 at the present time; so that while we have a navy of double the amount, the comparative cost is as I have stated; but there are several items of expenditure over and above what I have stated in Vote 3; for instance the Judicial Department, and other miscellaneous items; one item of increase in this Vote is in consequence of the Board Order which was made at the time when the right hon. Baronet was at the head of the Admiralty. It provides that the Director of the Works Department shall no longer be charged with Vote 11, but that the expenditure shall be shown under the heads of each establishment; and I believe it is a very good arrangement. Another, is the employment of a considerable number of temporary clerks. I should also mention, that as there is such a vast amount of business in the Surveyor's, or as he is now called, the Comptroller's, Department, it is absolutely necessary to give him some assistance, and I believe it will be a positive matter of economy. The fact is, that this officer who superintends the dockyard expenditure, and who really ought to be constantly going into the dockyards, overlooking the construction of ships, and alterations taking place, is kept a prisoner in his office by the vast amount of business which he has to do. The matter has been much considered, and my noble Friend the Duke of Somerset has gone into the Report of the Committee on Dockyard Economy; and his Minute, which will be shortly in the hands of Members, alludes to this subject, and presents many suggestions and remarks, which will be found to be very valuable. Having given some attention to the question of the payment of the men in the dockyards, I must admit that it is fraught with difficulties. Whether to pay the men by day labour, whether by task or job; whether their earnings are to be unlimited, and whether they are to work extra time, are all matters of vital importance. The question involves the expenditure of millions of the public money, and therefore it has been considered very carefully by the Admiralty. But I am bound to say that, when the hon. Member who has given notice of such a Motion proposes an inquiry, he will not find any great opposition on the part of the Admiralty. In the meantime it will be our business to reform wherever we can. We shall not wait for the Report of that Committee to carry out improvements which we think are to the advantage of the service, but we shall really look forward to that inquiry with a considerable amount of interest. It is not that we consider the Dockyard Committee has not done its duty. They have made many most valuable suggestions, and some of them we have already carried out. With regard, for instance, to the entry of apprentices, we have taken steps to improve that system, and various other details upon which I will not dilate. We still think, however, that there is a feeling on the part of the country that we do not get the value for our money. With that feeling existing it is wisdom, both on the part of Government and of Parliament, to forward by every means an inquiry which may be thought necessary. If, on the one hand, it shall be found that the present system works well, no man will rejoice more than I shall, or more than, I am sure, will the right hon. Baronet. But if any method can be found of constructing men-of-war—always bearing in mind that they must be built with reference to the proper seasoning of timber and the other various requirements peculiar to themselves at a less expense—I boldly and honestly say, it will be the duty of Her Majesty's Government to give every possible assistance in making that discovery. There is no material increase in Vote 4, for the Coast-guard. We take, it will be observed, the same amount for the annual retainers, conduct-money, &c., for the Naval Reserve, as we did last year. This new force, to which the country looks with so much anxiety, has certainly up to the present time not fulfilled the expectations which were raised. I always felt, from the first, that it was an experiment. I know what seamen are. They are fine, noble, hearty creatures, but men of remarkably suspicious character, and if there are any people they are suspicious of, it is the Admiralty. We are really much indebted to the Board of Trade for the exertions which they have made in drawing up the regulations and giving us their assistance to carry out the measure. I wish I could state to the House that the men were entering freely; but they are not. They are labouring under some delusion. Captain Brown re-

that the men will not be called out until war is declared. I told them I could not give that assurance, but I also told them that it was perfectly certain there was no intention to call them out, except in the event of a critical emergency. Such a case as ought to make Englishmen flock to their colours; that the threat of immediate hostilities, or of something which would oblige us to make the greatest exertions for the protection of our shores, were the only circumstances under which the Government would call for their services. If I can reassure them by what I say to-night, I really believe little more is wanting to induce them to flock to the force. It is so far satisfactory that they are beginning to get over this extraordinary idea. I wish to declare to them that Her Majesty's Government have no sort of intention to kidnap them into the navy. And perhaps I had better add a more practical assurance—that if we wished we could not enter them in the navy, because the number is complete, and except for casualties we have no means of entering any considerable number of men over and above what we have at present. I think that is a very satisfactory state of things, and that the House will be glad to hear there is no difficulty in getting men. This vast force of ships, only the creation of the last few months, is wholly manned. [Sir JOHN PAKINGTON: How much has the bounty been reduced?] The bounty has been reduced to £4 for able, and £2 for ordinary seamen. I will not enter into the question of the propriety of the bounty. The bounty has been given, and all the men are enjoying it. They are now in that respect on the same footing as the army, and we can raise the bounty to-morrow without committing any injustice to the men already in the service. Her Majesty's Government have not come to any decision upon the subject generally. It is a small sum—only £20,000 out of the millions we vote for the navy. It is a gift on entering and it really is a scandal to the service that we should have cast this burden upon officers, many of them gentlemen of but slender means, who have enough to do to pay their way. Line-of-battle ships, frigates, and troop-ships will have three, sloops two, and gun-boats one. Vote 6 is for Her Majesty's establishment at home; and on this Vote I am going to ask the House to agree to an inconsiderable increase to permit the employment of two assistant-superintendents at the great yards of Portsmouth and Plymouth. What I have said about the Comptroller of the Navy is doubly true with regard to the Superintendents of these two great yards. One of the great reasons, I have always thought, why we hear of idling in the dockyards, and of there not being as much activity there as there ought to be, arises from the constant confinement of the Superintendents to their offices, instead of being about the dockyards detecting idleness and punishing misconduct. Their principal business is to write letters—and I put it to the House whether that is a proper occupation for such officials. If you want economy you must not stint your Superintendents. You must enable them to go about the dockyards and see that the men are not idling. The appointment of these two Assistant Superintendents may save thousands of pounds by keeping the men at work. The Admiralty have also thought it their duty to look into the whole question of the correspondence of the Superintendents and the clerical departments of the dockyards. I am afraid to tell the House the number of returns we asked for. Our table at the Admiralty is literally swamped with the dockyard papers, but we are endeavouring to go into this matter of returns with a view of suppressing such as are no longer necessary, and I trust that we may produce a great lessening of labour. It will be observed by the House that in all these yards additional temporary clerks are employed. We are quite aware of the growing evil of these temporary clerks. It has become a public inconvenience in these great establishments; but the House must remember that if you have additional workmen and additional ships in commission the work of the clerks is also increased in the same ratio. We propose to take into consideration whether some improvements may not be made in the establishment of the clerks with a view to lessening labour. No. 7 is the Vote for foreign yards, in which there is a small increase for increased business, principally at

Malta and the Mediterranean yards. On Vote No. 8, for artificers, my right hon. Friend opposite will, perhaps, find fault with me because we have reduced it somewhat. When the present Board of Admiralty came into office, we asked the House to agree to an addition of £100,000 on this Vote, over and above what the right hon. Gentleman had proposed. We did so because on reference to the Surveyor of the Navy he told us that if that £100,000 were not added to the Estimate, it would be impossible for him to complete the programme which the right hon. Gentleman had laid before the House. We asked the House, therefore, to agree to that £100,000; but we have now made such progress that the Government think it possible to revert to the same number of men as were employed when the right hon. Gentleman was at the head of the Board of Admiralty. This, therefore, is, in fact, not a decrease, but only knocking off the £100,000 which we took over and above the right hon. Gentleman's Estimate of last year. Vote 9 is the same as last year, with the exception of a small sum for the artificers of the fleet, who are allowed extra pay when they are employed in the dockyards ashore. Vote 10, for the repair and building of ships, I have always thought ought to bear the motto—

There is, I confess, to my mind too much pulling to pieces, building up again, altering in every shape, in converting sailing ships into steamers. Looking narrowly into these alterations, I may differ somewhat from some of my colleagues as to the extent to which the conversion of ships ought to be carried. Because I am in office I am not going to retreat from the opinion which I expressed out of office. I greatly dislike these alterations. My opinion is that these old ships are not worth the time and money expended on them. In my humble opinion, it is like putting "new wine into old bottles." The two words do not agree; they decay, and speedily become not worth the money you have laid out on them. If you cut a hole into one of these old ships and put an engine into it, it may be made very valuable for the defence of the country as a superior kind of block-ship, but I cannot agree in the propriety of lengthening them at the bows, cutting them in two, and so on. This Vote is composed of several items, but I cannot say that it gives any great detailed information. The items are large and the information small. The Board of Admiralty have anxiously considered this Vote, and they are most desirous of giving every possible information with regard to it. I should have liked to lay this Vote on the table very much in the same form as Vote 11, for Public Works, but the Admiralty laboured under very great difficulties with regard to it. I am very unwilling to impute blame to any one, but if I were to venture to impute blame to any one, it would be to the House of Commons, who have never really asked for any detailed information with regard to this great Vote No. 10. I am naturally told when I ask for information, "How can we give an estimate for a future year, when we really do not know what proportion of money we have expended during the past year on building, or on repairing, or on what particular ships it has been expended." The Board of Admiralty called on the Accountant General to give a return which, in consequence of its novelty, I will not vouch for, but which I believe will be pretty correct, and which I very much wish was now on the table of the House—of the cost of ships during the past year. That return, which is of a very interesting character, gives the name and the cost of every ship in the Royal Navy, during the past Financial year, under six different heads—namely, ships building, converting from sail to screw, maintenance of ships in commission, of the steam reserve, of old sailing ships in ordinary, and maintenance of the dockyard craft. The other items expended under this Vote are also shown. I do not say that the return is perfect, because it is a novelty; it has hitherto existed in the dockyards, but it has never yet been practically turned to account, and the items consequently have not been properly checked; in fact, it may be said that its present value is nil as compared with what it will be in future years. As the name of the dockyard is attached to each ship, building or converting, with the particulars of the amount of material consumed, the cost of labour and the outlay on her engines, the Admiralty will be at once enabled to refer to the cost of each vessel, and to compare it with the cost of similar vessels in the other yards. In all matters of account there is nothing like publicity, and I am persuaded that one great and immediate effect of this comparative view of the cost of ships, will be a direct tendency to economy in the several establishments. Take the case of a vessel in commission—very few persons who have not turned their attention to that subject can form any idea of the cost to which the country is put by each additional line-of-battle ship. The public say, "Give us ten line-of-battle ships additional;" this return will give them an idea of the magnitude of the request. Within the last few days a gallant officer in command of one of Her Majesty's vessels, and an intimate friend of mine, called at the Admiralty, and in the course of conversation I showed him what his ship had cost during the past year, and he was absolutely thunderstruck. [Sir C. NAPIER: Such a return existed once before.] What has been done shows what is capable of being done, and I trust that if my right hon. Friend (Sir J. Pakington) succeeds to office, he will continue to require the same information. When two or three years have elapsed, we shall be able to place this Vote upon a much more intelligible and satisfactory footing by striking an average of the cost which this return will exhibit, and frame our estimate with proper details. I have shown the House what we possess in ships built; it will now be interested, probably, in knowing what we have constructed in tonnage, and what we propose to build during the present year. This is the best test, after all, of the exertions of the dockyards. It may possibly be remembered that, in proposing the Estimates last year, we announced our intention, of course subject to contingencies, of building 46,000 tons of shipping in the dockyards. [Sir J. PAKINGTON: Exclusive of conversions?] We said we would convert four line-of-battle ships and five frigates, in addition. What we have actually built amounts to 19,730 tons in ships of the line, 13,654 in frigates, 5,436 in corvettes, and 5,224 in sloops and gun vessels. We have not fulfilled our promise as to frigates, in which class I stated that we would build 16,000 tons, the reason being that there was an insufficiency of timber for the purpose; but we have made up for this deficiency in another way, for we have gone beyond our undertaking in the conversion of sailing, into steam frigates and screw ships. What we propose doing in the present, or, as my right hon. Friend reminds me, the ensuing financial year, is to build 13,216 tons of ships of the line, 13,500 tons of frigates, 4,871 tons of corvettes, 8,045 tons of sloops and gun vessels, and 302 tons of gun-boats, making a total of 39,934 tons. In addition we propose to convert four more line-of-battle ships and four frigates. It is necessary that I should afford some idea of the expenditure of timber that is required. Our ordinary establishments in the dockyards, which is regarded as two years' stock, consists of 60,000 loads of timber for ship-building purposes; but during the present financial year, instead of consuming the ordinary rate of 30,000 loads, we have used 64,000 loads of timber, the result of which has been that we have been literally unable to import timber with the same rapidity with which we were working it up. Of copper, also, it has been found exceedingly difficult to procure an adequate supply, for this last year we have consumed nearly 1,000 tons. Some discrepancy will be observed between Votes 8 and 10, which should bear a strict proportion to each other; but, having thus lessened our stock of timber, we this year require a larger sum by £81,000 on that account, and we do not increase the number of men in an equal ratio. It may not be uninteresting to the House to know what the French are doing in this respect. It is true that they have greater facilities for procuring timber than we have, but they have in stock 160,000 loads, or sufficient to build fifteen line-of-battle ships, fifteen frigates, and fifteen corvettes, which is a stock far above anything we have ever had in this country. The next item, for coals, also exhibits an increase, not only because we have a more numerous fleet, but because we were obliged to send a large stock to China. I pass to the next item, for the purchase of steam machinery, as to which the House would, doubtless, desire some information. We are building engines for line-of-battle ships to the extent of 5,700-horse power; for frigates, 7,100-horse power; other vessels and corvettes, 1,200-horse power; sloops, 3,000-horse power; gun-vessels, 1,200-horse power; gun-boats, 600-horse power—that is to say, a power in all equal to that of 18,800 horses. These cost £55 15s. each horse power. This is a very high price for machinery, no doubt. But if the Committee look carefully to the items that compose a steam engine for a man-of-war, they will agree with the Committee on Steam Machinery, who report that, regard being had to the difference between them, the Navy steam engines do not cost more than those of merchant vessels. They must have much spare gear, their engines must work in a small space, and they are in other respects very much more expensive than those of the merchant service. I will now turn to the iron-cased ships which are building, and which have excited so much curiosity and interest. The right hon. Gentleman opposite (Sir J. Pakington), hearing that they were building in France several of these vessels, thought it right to take a supplementary or special Vote—I think a supplementary Vote—for building two iron-cased frigates, one of which was ordered before the late Government quitted office. The right hon. Gentleman asked me, soon after the present Government came into office, whether the Admiralty were going on with the second frigate. I replied that the Board of Admiralty were carrying out certain experiments, and that if they were satisfactory the Admiralty would go on with the second frigate. Shortly afterwards the Admiralty ordered a second frigate to be built of the same dimensions as the first. These vessels are of enormous scantling and very large tonnage. The Warrior and the Black Prince are of 6,039 tons each, and 1,200-horse power. They will be entirely cased with iron, and I am one of those who believe that they will be vessels of a most formidable nature. And there will also be two of a smaller tonnage, 3,668 tons, which the Board of Admiralty have likewise contracted for. They will be iron-cased, and will have the same power of resisting shots, and the same capability of defence. The late Board ordered six sloops of 200-horse power and 12 gun vessels of 18-horse power. The present Board have ordered 10 gun-boats of 60-horse power, making the total cost during the present and future financial year that we are building by contract of £1,355,807. This sum, I ought to add, includes the machinery. It is an enormous sum, over and above what we are building in our dockyards. These are the principal items of Vote 10. We are very anxious to give every information on this Vote. We are duly sensible of the necessity of economy in building our ships, and we trust that the inquiry which is to be moved for by my hon. Friend on the labour in our dockyards will give us great assistance herein. At present the country is in the position of a very wealthy gentleman who has lived very generously, and has not called for his bills; who has been, in short, what is called a "fast man." If he determined to live economically for the future the first thing he would do would be to collect his accounts. That is the first pre-ness for economizing these great dockyard Votes. We want to know the amount of cost and the value of stock, and then we shall look about us and see if we cannot reform. I now turn with pleasure to Vote 11 (new works, improvements, and repairs in the yards), for this is the only Vote for the effective service that shows a real reduction. I believe that we have taken every sum that is requisite for keeping our dockyards in really good repair, while at the same time we have avoided any new works except in a few cases, the Vote being mostly expended in completing the work of our predecessors. I used formerly to be of opinion that many of our new works were on too grand a scale, and I confess that my visits to the dockyards have confirmed my views. I accompanied my noble Friend (the Duke of Somerset) to Woolwich the other day, and we looked at a magnificent building, overtopping the Thames, and looking like some great palace. This was the new Marine Infirmary. We walked over it and paced its stately colonnades, and I am afraid we were both sordid enough to say that its architectural magnificence cost too much money. At Keyham the same remark had occurred to me. No doubt, there are great public buildings in our dockyards, all of them very necessary, but too much attention has, I think, in many cases been given to architectural design, and too much scope to the taste of our engineers. Now, the present Board of Admiralty disapprove greatly of any unnecessary expenditure of this kind, and when the architects and engineers of our yards have brought us remarkably tasteful designs for our approbation we have rejected them, and asked them to give us something more simple. I take some pride in having kept this Vote down, and I do not believe that any substantial work really required has been omitted. For instance, we are going on with a dock at Portsmouth, which was commenced some years ago, and we have taken a small Vote for that. The next Vote for Medicines and Medical Stores, shows a small increase, but not beyond what is necessary for the increase of the fleet. Vote 13, for the Miscellaneous Services shows an increase of £18,529, the reasons for which are shown in the Votes; and I now turn to Vote 14—the Half-pay Vote—to which I would ask the attention of my hon. Friend the Member for Sunderland (Mr. Lindsay.) He is under the idea that the non-effective charge for the navy is growing year by year, and is becoming so great a burden as to require looking into. But so far from that, the Half-pay Vote for the future year shows a decrease of £27,049, in spite of an increase which I am about to ask for in favour of certain classes of officers. This is, in fact, a yearly decreasing Vote, and in a few years, as the older officers give way to nature—[Admiral WALCOTT: Hear, hear!]

—the Committee will remember my hon. and gallant Friend's eloquence on that subject—the burden will greatly diminish. I must now allude to the item of £12,000 as an additional charge for improving and altering the system of retirement of officers of the Royal Navy, with a view to the increased efficiency and reduction in the numbers of officers on the active list. The Admiralty has had under its serious consideration the rate of promotion among the junior ranks of the navy. It is not only an act of justice to the officers, but necessary to the efficiency of the fleet, that some measure should be taken which will enable the Board of Admiralty to promote officers in due time and prevent them, as it were, from rotting all their lives in one list. If a certain rate of promotion is not kept up, officers become indifferent and slack in their duty, and can no longer be depended on to exert themselves with zeal for the service. I believe there will be no difficulty in persuading the House to agree to this small sum. When we come to the consideration of the Vote itself I shall be prepared to state to the House the particulars of the plan, which will affect the ranks of lieutenants and commanders, and in some degree the captains. This is the only charge I need mention under this head, with one exception. We have at last succeeded in establishing pensions for the widows of warrant officers. I am convinced that no grant will be more appreciated by the navy; at present it is limited to £500, and that sum I may say, we have screwed out of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. All preceding Chancellors of the Exchequer have resisted the grant; but my right hon. Friend has conceded it, on the ground that it is just and right.

The last Vote to which I shall call the attention of the House is that for transport. It does not properly belong to the expenses of the navy; but the Admiralty has to provide all the means of ocean transport for the army. We have thought it right, in reference principally to the China expedition, to take for the present year the large sum of £120,000 for the freight of ships on monthly pay, or for the purchase of them, besides the Vote for the conveyance of stores and troops. I may now close this lengthened statement. In doing so, I should belie my own feelings if I did not add that it is with extreme pain that I find myself compelled to be the instrument of proposing to take from the profitable industry of the country this vast sum of money for the Navy. But I am convinced that it is the wish of the people of this nation that their navy should be well and efficiently maintained; that the country should be under no alarm; that, whatever may happen, the people may be able to say, "We are safe under the protection of our navy." In a discussion on the defences of the country last year, some very valuable advice was given to the House by my hon. Friend the Member for Rochdale (Mr. Cobden). He thought that much of our naval force might with advantage be abolished; but there was one passage of his speech so marked by patriotism, and containing such sound and reasonable views, that I cannot help reading it to the House. I believe it cannot do better than follow the advice conveyed. The hon. Member for Rochdale said, "He did not wish to reduce our navy to the same force as that of France; but he should like to see the two Governments agree on some relative proportion of force; thus, the French navy might be two-thirds that of England; where the French had two ships, England might have three." If you examine the state of the French navy, you will find we have not surpassed what the hon. Member for Rochdale considered the necessary superiority of our navy over that of France. And, taking into consideration the strength of the Russian navy, I say we are bound to continue our exertions till we place our navy on a really sound and efficient footing. But I must also say, on the part of Her Majesty's Government, that though they have agreed to these very large Estimates, they do not consider themselves bound to expend them, should circumstances render a less amount sufficient. We thought it better to ask the House at once to grant a sufficient amount of money, and number of men, than to apply to it again with additional Votes and supplementary Estimates. But if the dispute with China should end peacefully, if the political horizon of the Continent, and throughout the world generally, should appear favourable, the Government will not feel bound to spend the full amount of the Vote, because the House has generously granted it. I thank the House for the indulgence it has extended to the statement I have made; and I shall be glad to answer any question in reference to it.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That 85,500 Men and Boys be employed for the Sea and Coastguard Services for the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1861, including 18,000 Royal Marines."

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: When I took up the Navy Estimates for this year I certainly felt some curiosity to see how far the opinions the noble Lord expressed last year, as to the new form in which certain Votes, especially Vote 10, ought to appear on the Estimates, had been carried out. But I found Vote 10 on the paper wearing very much its old shape. Still, it is only just to the noble Lord to say that his statement has not only been very clear, but made with that openness and candour which I trust henceforward will always distinguish these addresses, and which indeed are nothing more than the House of Commons has a right to expect from the Government of the day. I rise principally for the purpose of asking explanations concerning some portions of the speech of my noble Friend. The Government has, I admit, asked the House for unusually large Estimates; but I do not think they are larger than circumstances require; and they prove a determination on the part of Her Majesty's Government to act in the same spirit as the late Ministry. It is the first duty of the Government of the day, as I believe it is the anxious desire of the country, to maintain the navy in a perfectly efficient condition. There is, no doubt, a great increase in the Estimates, as compared with former years: but I am willing to believe, on the authority of the noble Lord, that they are not larger than the necessity of the case requires. The great expenditure is of course caused by the large amount of men called for, and by the efforts made to increase the number of our ships. I am extremely glad to see by the return which was this morning put into our hands by the Admiralty, that the programme which I submitted to the House a year ago, on the part of the late Government, has been essentially carried out by our successors in office. It will be in the recollection of the Committee that in the programme of last year I announced the intention of the then

Government to add fifteen to the number of our line-of-battle ships, partly by building and partly by conversion, thereby increasing the number of effective screw line-of-battle ships from thirty-three to forty-eight. I see by the Return before me that that programme has been exactly carried out during the year. My noble Friend has stated that a considerable number more are to be added during the ensuing year; that we are to have at least eleven additional line-of-battle ships, which will raise the number from forty-eight to fifty nine. This leads me to an inquiry of some importance, and that is whether the present Board of Admiralty has arrived at any decision as to the number of line-of-battle ships they propose ultimately to have. This is a point to which I know the noble Lord the Secretary of the Admiralty has devoted much attention. He has repeatedly expressed the opinion in this House that we should give up the building of line-of-battle ships, that line-of-battle ships are comparatively useless, and that we should devote our attention to the building of other classes of ships. I could not concur with the noble Lord in the views he thus expressed. I never would be a party to any change of that kind till we had fully established the proper superiority of England in line-of-battle ships to all the other nations of Europe. But I may state that, so far as the late Board of Admiralty had considered this subject, we had—I will not say definitely arrived at the conclusion—but had entertained the opinion that if this country possessed sixty efficient screw line-of-battle ships, it would be so far satisfactory as to enable us to pause and deal with this great question. My noble Friend and all who are conversant with the subject will admit that there is strong reason to suppose we are approaching a time when it will become a question how far these line-of-battle ships are the most effective ships of the navy. Why, we have heard this day from my noble Friend, as a part of the plans of the late Government, carried out by the present Government, of the building of such ships as the Mersey and the Orlando on a system which introduces a new element into this question—ships of the same tonnage as the largest in the navy, and carrying not a great number of guns, but guns of the greatest power and calibre, and forming very formidable armaments. Then we have the changes going on in the manufacture of ordnance, and the construction of Armstrong guns, all which fairly raise the question as to the limits within which we should confine the building of line-of-battle ships. I hope, however, that I shall not be misunderstood. Do not let us pause till we have fully established the superiority of this country in that description of ships. At the same time bearing in mind the great expense of building these ships, let us consider what will be the probable effect of the changes to which I have adverted. I should like to know, therefore, how far the Government are now laying down new ships of that class, and whether they have adopted any limit at which they may pause, and wait to see what the effects of the changes going on really are. Last year I promised, it will be recollected, nine screw frigates—five new, and four conversions in addition to the seventeen we then possessed, so that the total number of new frigates should amount to twenty-six. But I find that the present Board of Admiralty have hardly fulfilled that engagement, as the number of frigates in the present Return amounts to only twenty-five, which gives one less than we had promised. [Lord C. PAGER: There has been another frigate launched since the Return had been made up.] I did not mean to allude to the subject in a tone of censure. The difference would in any case have been very trifling. I am glad to find that the programme of the late Government has been so nearly fulfilled, and I trust that by the close of the next financial year the navy of this country will be in a satisfactory position. Having made these remarks on the building of ships, allow me to say a few words on that heavy item which was the principal cause of the excess of outlay last year—the addition of men. I stated last year that we proposed an addition of 3,000 men; and subsequently we brought down supplementary Estimates for 10,000 men and marines. This was a large addition; but the noble Lord has announced a still further addition, and I am bound to assume that the proposal is made by the Government in consequence of the strong opinion they entertain of its necessity. I am, therefore, not disposed to make any complaint on the score of that addition. I am glad to find that the Admiralty have not lost sight of the recommendation of the Commissioners to keep up a reserve of a certain number of men in our ports; though I own I could wish that reserve amounted to more than 1200 men. My noble Friend brought something like a charge against me with regard to the masters of the navy. He alluded to what I had done with regard to certain officers, but said I had overlooked the masters and other classes. That is not the case, for the late Government had it in contemplation to deal with the masters and those other classes to which he referred; and were only prevented carrying out their intentions, by circumstances which they could not control. I am therefore glad to find that the Government have taken up their case. My noble Friend also adverted to the Commission on Dockyard Labourers, and I trust he will take an early opportunity of stating what are the intentions of Government with respect to the Report of that Commission. I did not clearly understand what fell from my noble Friend as to the office of the Controller of the Navy. Is there to be any change in the arrangements of that office? [Lord C. PAGET: Instructions are to be given of a more direct character for its regulation.] I am happy to hear that the attention of the noble Lord has been directed to this subject, as when in office I contemplated considerable changes in this department; but, whatever the alterations now proposed may be, I should like to have more definite information regarding them. I hope, concurrently with this change of title, there will be some ready adjustment of the duties of the office. I was also glad to hear what the noble Lord said with regard to apprentices in our dockyards. I trust that what he proposes will have the effect of improving this class of workmen, and checking that tendency to political jobbery, that has been under all Governments a source of great complaint and annoyance, and which I did all in my power to suppress. The evil complained of is a very serious one; and I hope the regulations in regard to apprentices will go a great way to check it. I will not enter into the question of "conversions;" but I cannot concur with the noble Lord in the views he has expressed. Take the case of frigates; many of them are very fine ships, and capable of rendering service in every respect but one—that they have no engines; if we can lengthen them, and put engines in, I think we shall render a great service to the country. I hope the noble Lord stands alone in his objections, and I am glad he has not had sufficient influence with the Board of Admiralty to induce them to adopt his views. My noble Friend expressed great pleasure in the reduction made in Vote 11, but I believe it is quite indispensable that this country should, within a very short period, embark in a large expenditure for the improvement of our dockyards. I am convinced that you will be unable to keep up the navy, with due regard to economy and to the interests of the country, unless your dockyards are made more efficient than they are at present. For instance, take Chatham—[Lord C. PAGET.—We are taking 10,000*l.* with that view for Chatham.]—My noble Friend surely does not mean to say that £10,000 will be anything like sufficient for the purpose at Chatham. He only takes that sum to continue and carry out a previous arrangement, on which a considerable amount has already been expended, and to complete which a very much larger sum is required. If you intend to make Chatham a dockyard such as it ought to be, you must make up your minds to a much larger outlay. It only remains for me to allude to the two last subjects to which my noble Friend adverted—namely, the pensions for the widows of warrant officers, and the retirement of senior officers in the navy. With regard to warrant officers' widows, I always thought it most desirable to grant such pensions, but I was not so successful in carrying out my views in that respect as my noble Friend has been; and I congratulate him on achieving a success which I was unable to attain. With respect to the retirement of officers, that is a subject to which I am glad to hear the present Board of Admiralty have directed attention. There was no subject on which I felt more strongly when I left the Board, than the absolute necessity of adopting some improved mode of retirement, so as to remove that check to promotion, which has always been a matter of just complaint. I am glad that the present Board have directed their attention to the subject, and I shall wait with some anxiety to hear an explanation of their plan. I will only add, that in following my noble Friend, it affords me much satisfaction to be able to speak in the tone in which I have done.

SIR CHARLES NAPIER was glad to hear the noble Lord (Lord C. Paget) follow the example of his predecessor, and speak the plain and honest truth by giving an exact statement not only of our own navy, but also of those of France and Russia. He had shown that France had 244 vessels of every description ready for sea; Russia, 235; and England, 244. He had also told the Committee that France could man the whole of her ships with her reserves whenever she thought proper; and he (Sir Charles Napier) had seen it stated in a

Paris newspaper that France had not less than 90,000 men on whom she could at any time lay hands. Russia had always her fleet manned; England alone could not man her fleet—a state of things that was not very creditable to a great nation like England. He had worked for twenty years in and out of that House, in order to see the navy placed on a proper footing. He had been called an alarmist, and laughed at for many years on that account; but the country had at length adopted his views, and forced the present Government, as it did the last, to put the navy in a proper condition. With respect to the practice of conversion, he agreed with the late First Lord that ships could be converted with advantage. The Nep- tune, the Nelson, and others, which had been converted, had turned out remarkably well. He could not, however, agree in the propriety of cutting a hole in the stern of a ship without lengthening her. That course had been found by experience not to answer in the Edinburgh and Ajax. The Navy Estimates were certainly very large, but he believed the country would get the value of their money. The navy, as far as ships were concerned, was never in a better position than it was at present. But still the country must lay its account with building a new navy in the event of iron ships succeeding. Our great Ally was determined to have a large naval force, and was driving us on to build. He wondered the Government had not come to some understanding with him as to where all this was to stop. Between France and us it had become a matter of the longest purse, and he (Sir Charles Napier) was afraid that France was getting as great as ourselves. We had got ships, but what use were they so long as we had not men? It was melancholy to think that in this great maritime nation we could not raise an adequate reserve of seamen for the navy. There was quite a mania for rifle corps, but not 500 men could be got as a reserve. There must be some reason why the navy was so unpopular, and Parliament must try to get at the root of its being so. We ought always to have 10 line-of-battle ships afloat in the Channel; each of these, if first-rates, would have, as a full complement, 900 blue-jackets and 200 marines. Now, as they wanted soldiers, he would ask why they should not employ 100 of the marines of each vessel in that capacity, which would give them 1,000 men on shore, doing military duty; but who would be ready at any time for transference on ship-board should their services be required. He would take away 100 marines in peace, and fill the ship up with 1,000 blue-jackets. That would give 500 men on each watch; and in case of an emergency he would turn one watch over to another ship, and fill up with marines, whose places, as garrisoning the sea-ports, would be taken by that constitutional force, the militia. But more than that. What was to hinder them from separating the coast districts from the inland counties, and requiring them to furnish sailors as the inland districts did the militia? A reserve for the navy must be found somewhere or other, and as there was an enormous number of fishermen and of men whose occupation was looking out for wrecks along our shores, he should advocate the expediency of having recourse to a system of Ballot in our maritime towns, which should include the inhabitants of those districts. On the first appearance of war, the crews of these 10 ships of the line would man 20 of the same class, the difference being filled up with marines, landsmen, and the usual number of idlers, as they were called, such as cooks, stewards, and so on. But that was not all. There were the district-ships—not those abominable block-ships—he hated the very name of them; but good ships, such as the Majestic and Colossus, that he was glad to hear were now fitting out to take the place of the block-ships. There were 10 of these ships that, in case of emergency, could be filled up with the Coastguard and the Coast Volunteers. This would give the country 30 sail of the line, and he did not believe that any country would attack us if they knew that we could send 30 sail of the line to sea in the course of forty-eight hours. But, then, it seemed they did not know whether the Coast Volunteers would serve or not. He was told that the Coastguard men of Hastings went down by railway the other day to Sheerness, and that the men mustered very well. But why did not they send the Coast Volunteers at the same time? If they had done that, he supposed their wives and children would all have been up in arms against the Admiralty. The question, however, after all, was one of money. If £1 would not do it, they must try £2, or even £3, for a reserve would be cheaper than the present system of keeping up such a large fleet. He had now done with that subject, and he would come to the question of reserve.

He knew from the first that the system would never answer. The noble Lord complained that the men were suspicious, and he did not wonder; for the Admiralty were constantly breaking faith with the men. It was but the other day that the pensioners were promised, when they went on board ship, that those of them who had been petty officers should have the same rating now; and yet he had found that some of these old petty officers were now doing duty as able-bodied seamen. [Lord CLARENCE PAGET: The gallant Officer is quite mistaken. All the old petty officers have that rating when they go on board.] Yes; but where there are no vacancies for petty officers, they are made to serve as common seamen. But he objected to the present plan of reserve altogether. They were giving £6 a year to men who had never done a stroke of work for the Queen. Besides, the terms were not sufficiently stringent. A reserve that was allowed to be absent for six months was no reserve at all. The course which he should pursue would be to leave to every seaman when his ship was paid off the option of being placed in the reserve or not, as he might think proper, allowing him to count two years towards his pension for every three years' service. At present the Admiralty had no means of knowing what men entitled to pensions had refused to take them. The Admiralty ought to know the number, and if it could once be made known that 4,000 men had entered the reserve, the intelligence would spread throughout the merchant service, and the reserve would soon be filled up. If the force could not be filled up with £6, then a calculation must be made whether it would not be cheaper to pay higher than to maintain a large force at sea. Another point which he must mention related to the Channel fleet, which the Admiralty did not seem to know how to manage when they got it. Some time since there was mutiny, or something like it. On board the Liffey there was a disturbance, shot rolled about, mess-traps broken, and other disorders. In that case the Admiralty did not take proper steps, but simply gave way, and the men gained their point. Something of the same sort happened on board the Hero on a question of leave. The complaint was, he thought, a just one. When ships were fitting out in harbour there was plenty of leave; but whenever a ship was out of harbour, she was sent to Portland where the drills went on—a period most irksome to the men—and when the utmost indulgence should be granted. In that way the disturbance arose on board the Hero, and the Admiralty, instead of sending the squadron to sea, and sending her to the West Indies, allowed the men to remain the victors. In the Mediterranean, on board the flag-ship Marlborough, there was also a disturbance, and that was passed over. Then came the Princess Royal, the worst case of all. She came home from the Mediterranean, and, according to a very proper arrangement, another ship was ready, to which the crew was to be transferred; but there were three classes of men on board—the bounty men and the continuous-service men, upon whom the Admiralty had a claim, and those who had entered generally, upon whom they had no claim. When the captain left the ship the men cried out, “Pay off,” and then the Admiralty ought to have sent a member of the Board down to inquire into the matter, but, instead of doing so, they gave way. The continuous-service men and the bounty men should have been sent on board the Queen, and the others should have been required to return the stores, which would have occupied them for three weeks, and then they should have been told that their services were no longer required. Then, when there was a ship launch, and the Queen came down, the men ought to have had leave from Saturday to Monday, but instead of that one-half had leave and the rest had not. That, of course, created dissatisfaction, and a cry of “All or none.” The Admiral very properly said “None,” but unluckily the liberty men had been landed and were taken back from the dock-yard gates. It was an error to order those men back, although he would not say whose error it was. He must say, to the credit of the seamen, that it was not true that they had deserted in great numbers after taking the bounty, for he had seen a return showing that since bounty was given desertions had been fewer than before. Every one knew how easy it was for sailors to desert, but he did not think the Admiralty took proper means to punish desertion. He would punish every man, even with transportation, who took the bounty not intending to remain in the service. There was another evil in the service in respect to leave. When he was in Lisbon, he found that no leave was ever given there, but he granted leave to the men to go on shore. They got drunk as usual, and made rows, and complaints were made to him, and he got the police of Lisbon to take up every drunken English sailor and put him into prison, the consequence of which was, that all complaints soon ceased. If the same thing were done at home for a short time, it would soon put an end to such misconduct. It might be said this could not be done in England, but they could station a guard-ship close to where the men landed, warn them, and if they broke their leave or behaved ill, place them on board as prisoners. There need be no difficulty in giving men leave, and getting rid of those irregularities which were subversive of all discipline. The men would thus also be made much more comfortable and happy than they were at present. There was another point to which he wished to advert. If a ship were paid off with the crew, it was attended with great expense; but if they were transferred to another ship directly, and the ship turned over to the superintendent of the dockyard to return her stores, the whole might be effected with more regularity and economy. He trusted the Admiralty would take steps to remedy all the evils he had pointed out; especially let them see that the men had leave at all times in moderation, and that they were punished if they behaved improperly—imprisoned if they got drunk ashore and behaved in a disorderly manner. A great deal had lately been done for seamen in giving them mess traps, allotments, and paying them once a month, and those now guilty of breaches of discipline ought to be severely punished. In the Baltic a disturbance broke out on board one of the ships of the fleet. He desired an inquiry to be made to see if there were any grievances, and, if so, that they should be redressed. Grievances were found to exist; they were redressed, and the evil did not extend, as it might have done, to other ships in the fleet. He had laboured long to have the navy put on a proper footing, and he would never rest satisfied till it was properly manned, and till the men got redress of every evil they had any reason to complain of. They could not now be treated as they formerly were. The men were more enlightened, and they expected more indulgence. [Mr. WILLIAMS: Hear!] The hon. Member for Lambeth might cry "Hear," as if he wanted popularity; but he would not put an end to flogging for all that. He would flog, but he would flog in a proper manner. If a man behaved ill, he would try him by court-martial and punish him. He was not afraid to say so. The men themselves would not live in a ship if there was no discipline. A ship would be a hell upon earth without discipline, and if the hon. Member for Lambeth succeeded in abolishing corporal punishments in the navy tomorrow he would not get the thanks of the men.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE said, he wished to thank the noble Lord for his clear and business-like statement, which he had heard with peculiar pleasure. With regard to the pensions to warrant officers' widows, however, he should wish to know whether the arrangement was to be retrospective as recommended by the Naval Commission. If not, he should never suspend his agitation till that grievance was redressed. The present allowance as outfit for a petty officer when raised to a warrant officer was £30, but was quite inadequate, and there was often found great difficulty in getting proper men to come forward for the warrant, because pensions were taken away from their widows. With regard to boys, the Commission recommended that school-ships should be established at all the principal commercial ports. Provision was to be made for 2,400 boys, besides those who came forward voluntarily to be afterwards absorbed into the Mercantile and Royal Marine. He found no vote taken for school-ships, and he wanted to know what was the intention of the Government in that respect. He had heard from various ports, such as Hull, Greenock, Aberdeen, and Dundee, that these school-ships were looked for with great interest, and there was considerable disappointment that the recommendation of the Commission had not been carried into effect. When the boys went on board ship, a number of them were employed as officers' servants. He objected to that, as being a most prejudicial employment for boys; under such a system they became neither good seamen nor good servants. He next wished to draw the noble Lord's attention to the subject of the sergeants in the Marine Artillery. The Marine Artillery was established in 1804, and at first made part of the Royal Artillery. The separation was made about the year 1839. Up to that time the pay of the non-commissioned officers in the Marine Artillery went on increasing pari passu with that of the Royal Artillery; but since the separation this had not been so, and he thought the case of these men deserved the attention of the Government. The pay of sergeants in the Marine Artillery was now less by 2½d. a day than that of sergeants in the Royal Artillery. The pay should be equalized. With regard to the pay of other officers which had been passed in this Vote, it was the fact that the pay of captains of men-of-war was entirely inadequate to the duties they had to perform. The pay of captains was only £600 a year, and they were quite unable to maintain their position in society without trenching upon their private means. Besides this, the Admiralty had taken to cheat the captains. They appointed captains of a lower grade to the command of 90-gun ships, and cut down the pay to £450 a year. The number of midshipmen was also entirely insufficient; and it was important that young men should be encouraged to study and become candidates for warrants, and that after passing competitive examinations they should receive increased pay, and should be entered as the first men for promotion to warrants as they became vacant, and in the mean time be employed in many of the duties formerly fulfilled by midshipmen. The next point was that of naval instructors. Young gentlemen entering the navy were now called upon, he thought with great advantage, to pass examinations; but the Admiralty were now making bricks without straw, for there was a large number of ships, no less than fifteen, four of them flag-ships, to which no naval instructors at all were attached. Then, as to the reserve. Having been of those who first recommended this measure, he was sorry to find it did not work well. Various causes had contributed to this result. The bounty had operated greatly against the reserve, as had also the disturbance in the Princess Royal. Again, the Admiralty had not taken the proper steps for making the advantages of service in the reserve sufficiently known. The fact was, there was no one in the navy to discharge the duties of the recruiting sergeant. Men were furnished with a long printed list of regulations, which they had great difficulty in understanding, and which often led them to form wrong conclusions. The Admiralty might take a leaf out of the Horse-Guards book with advantage in this respect, and employ active petty officers at the different ports, in the same way as recruiting sergeants were now employed on behalf of the army. In a town like Portsmouth it might be expected that a regular office for the enlistment of seamen would be open; yet

hon. Gentlemen would be surprised to hear that the only place where anything of the kind was conducted was the house of Mrs. Louisa Wafer, a woman who exercised an extraordinary influence over seamen, corresponded with them in the most distant parts of the kingdom, and did more to man the fleet than could be well understood without being a witness to the fact. Another evil was the total absence of police on board ships in harbour, so that when the men went on shore there was no one who knew where to find them again. Besides all this there was a great want of proper dockyard accommodation; and he thought, if the Princess Royal, instead of stripping in the stream, had gone into a basin, and had her crew discharged there, such a disturbance as had taken place could not have occurred.

MR. WHITBREAD said, he hoped the House would bear in mind that, however accurately the naval programmes might be arranged beforehand, they were always liable to be deranged by disturbing causes; and the more ships there were in commission, the more troop-ships moving, the greater was the probability that repairs and other incidental circumstances would thus operate. The non-completion of the two frigates was owing to the fact that timber of the required dimensions was not in store at the time. More timber, however, was expected, and might arrive in time to ensure their completion before the close of the financial year. The right hon. Baronet opposite had inquired whether an opinion had been arrived at with regard to what should be the standard force of line-of-battle ships to be kept up. It was, however, impossible to fix upon any standard for our force, and say that that was the proper amount of naval strength for this country to keep up. That force must always depend upon what was done by other countries; and it was only by watching the growth of foreign navies—whether in line-of-battle ships, frigates, or iron ships—that we could arrive at any just estimate of our own requirements. With regard to the duties of the Comptroller of the Navy, changes were now in progress in his office, and when those changes were completed there would be no hesitation in furnishing the information which the right hon. Baronet desired. With regard to Vote 11, the dockyards would be kept in a proper state of repair with the sum taken in the present Estimates, and he believed that no great work had been postponed that was really necessary to be entered on this year. They had postponed, however, large works in the different dockyards which would have to be undertaken at some time or other, such as accommodation for longer ships; but looking at the large Estimates before the House which the Admiralty were obliged to frame, they thought there should be some saving in that Vote. The right hon. Baronet would be glad to learn that the Government had faced the somewhat difficult question connected with Chatham. It was in contemplation to extend that yard, and the Board, having considered the deficiency of accommodation in the great eastern arsenals, had come to the conclusion—looking to the natural disadvantages of Sheerness, and to the objections, in a military point of view, to the Isle of Grain—that St. Mary's Island was the only direction in which the dockyard accommodation should be enlarged, and they were in communication on the subject with a large number of persons interested in the property. As to the occurrences on board the Princess Royal, prior to the outbreak the account received by the Admiralty differed somewhat from that narrated to the House to-night. According to that account the petty officers represented, in the most respectful manner to the Admiral on his inspection, that they did not wish to be turned over to the Queen; and that request having been forwarded to the Admiralty was complied with. A great deal of that unhappy feeling arose from the fact, that the officers were in the habit of obtaining leave when the ship was paid off, while the men were restricted. The officers had now been placed on the same footing as the men in this respect, and not a murmur had been heard in the case of any of the ships that had since then been paid off. He concurred fully in the opinions of the hon. Baronet (Sir J. D. Elphinstone) as to the value of a reserve force, and he hoped that by the establishment of the training ships for boys by carefully studying the feelings and the interests of the men much would in time be done to make the service popular and respected.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON, in explanation, said, he did not intend to suggest that there should be or could be anything like a permanent standard of line-of-battle ships. But he thought there was a point at which, our navy having attained to a position of sufficient superiority, it would be well to pause in regard to laying down new line-of-battle ships until the Admiralty had ascertained the effect of the great changes effected lately in naval science.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, he would move, "That the Chairman do now report progress."

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, he hoped that his hon. Friend would not press his Motion, the universal wish of the Committee apparently being that some Votes should be taken.

MR. W. WILLIAMS observed, that he would withdraw his Motion on the understanding that no more speeches were to be made.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

ADMIRAL WALCOTT: My thanks are due to the noble Lord (Lord C. Paget) for the perspicuity and honesty of purpose which so eminently characterize the statement which he has submitted to the House; and my satisfaction is not unpardonably redoubled by recognizing in him a brother officer and an ornament to his profession. The measures which have been adopted to maintain the navy in a state of complete strength and efficiency recommend themselves to my judgment as the dictates of prudence. The attitude of armed and conscious power deters the opponent from his intention of invading an existing peace; and the display of vigour at the onset of actual hostilities accelerates an honourable termination to a war, whilst, on the other hand, a policy of hesitation and timidity enervates the spirit of a nation, and encourages aggression and pretensions on the part of its opponent, which, if they be tamely submitted to, threaten its security and endanger its reputation. Last year I strongly urged upon the noble Lord how desirable and important it appeared to me, that the Surveyor of the Navy should be elevated to a more commanding position in the service, by being constituted an honorary member of the Board of Admiralty. Without throwing any additional expense upon the country, the change would enable that officer to deliver his opinions with greater freedom and weight, which, under the present system, is denied to him. At the same time there are occasions when the service would derive much benefit by the existence of a Board, composed of the most eminent persons in the various branches of naval architecture and all matters connected with

val warfare, which should meet from time to time to review the suggestions made by competent authorities in reference to subjects of such vast importance. In dealing with the officers and men, it is only common justice to assure of certain reward the officer who displays zeal and reflects himself in the knowledge of his profession, and to observe strictly and fulfil the promises that have been held out to the seamen. I hope I am to understand that 2,000 boys will be introduced into the service every year; let me then add that two ships will not be sufficient for their proper instruction; the allotment could not exceed the number of 500 boys to a single vessel. If my earnest exhortations on this subject—the employment and training of boys from fourteen to eighteen years of age—had been heeded some years since, the service would not be now suffering from a paucity of men. The relative strength of the fleets of Russia and France, the enormous extent of the British commerce, the remoteness of many of our most valuable dependencies, the insecurity of political relations, and the uncertainty of a continuous peace are so many undeniable arguments imperatively demanding that our navy should be preserved in the highest degree of efficiency, as upon its supremacy hangs the welfare or downfall of England. In these disastrous circumstances, to which allusion has been made by the gallant Admiral (Sir Charles Napier), that occurred on board H.M.S. Princess Royal require passing observation. Any disposition to stifle, any contumacious disturbance, as detrimental to discipline, and, under particular circumstances, still more perilous, must be promptly quelled, and vigorously pressed. The first spark of fire must be trodden out—it must not be allowed to spread. Admiral Bowles was not informed that the men were actually standing at the guns; the knowledge would have carried great importance and influenced his decision, for there is no man whose heart is more open to kindly feeling, no man of greater experience or sounder judgment, no man who has contributed more largely, than the gallant officer, his time or his money, to every institution and project that could benefit the naval service of this country.

MR. BENTINCK expressed his concurrence in the well-merited tribute which had been paid to the able statement of the late Secretary to the Admiralty, and he was very glad to find the Estimates so framed as to afford the hope that the navy would be placed on the footing it ought to be. His noble Friend said that there was an impression that the country did not get the full value for the money expended. He believed that impression to be correct, and he was of opinion that the circumstance was owing to the system on which the Board of Admiralty was constructed. Until that Board ceased to be a political one and until professional men were chosen to fill the various departments and that the ships were properly constructed, he believed they would have always to complain of the naval expenditure. He (Mr. Bentinck) could not join with the noble Lord in holding out any expectation of a speedy reduction in the amount that would be required for the Naval Estimates. On the contrary, looking to the state of affairs in Europe he thought it more likely that it would be found necessary to spend a yet larger sum. They ought to lay the question fairly in the face; and they should at all events remember that injudicious economy in past years had at the end led to a far greater waste of public money than could possibly have been brought about by any amount of dockyard extravagance. He also wished to know what steps had been taken to supply the deficiency of naval instructors on board line-of-battle ships in commission.

MR. LINDSAY said, he should mention that the House report progress, for the whole question of the national armaments required a much more deliberate discussion than could be given it at half-past twelve. We had a large naval expenditure and a large armament, and he wished to know against whom we were arming. Was it against the Emperor of the French? Had we not just concluded a treaty of commerce and consequently of peace with him? He wanted the Government to state distinctly against whom we were arming. Why were they taxing the people? Where was the fearful expenditure to end? They ought to report progress that that Question might be further discussed.

Motion made, and Question proposed—
“That the Chairman do now report progress.”

GENERAL UPTON said, he would suggest that there should be an entry of boats in the interior as well as at the ports.

COLONEL DICKSON inquired whether there were no means by which the ships

the Royal Navy might be made serviceable for the conveyance of troops.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, the question of how to supply naval instructors in those ships of the line in which they were still wanting was receiving the best attention of the Admiralty; and a plan had been suggested of combining the office with that of chaplain. The ships of the navy were occasionally used for the transport of troops; but at present the crews were a little raw, and required to be trained.

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT hoped the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Lindsay) would not press his Motion for reporting progress. He hoped to propose the first Vote for the Army Estimates on Friday next; and if they did not take the number of men both for the army and navy this week, they would not be able to do so for some time, because the discussion on the Budget would intervene.

Motion, by le ve, withdrawn.

Original Question put, and agreed to. Also,

(3.) £1,458,087, Victuals.

House resumed.

Resolutions to be reported this day (Tuesday). Committee to set again on Wednesday.

CENTRAL ITALY. SAVOY.

MOTION FOR PAPERS.

THE MARQUESS OF NORMANBY—who had given notice of Motion for the Instructions given by the Secretary of State to Her Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires at Florence, directing him to attend the official reception of Signor Buoncompagni, and subsequently of a Motion for a return of the dates of all communications between the Secretary of State and Her Majesty's Ambassador at Paris, from the accession to office of the present Ministry—said, that in introducing the subject of his Motion, he thought it his duty to show the close connection between the Notice that he first gave, and that which he added last night. His first Motion referred to the line taken by the English Government in reference to the provisional ruler of Florence, and it was his intention to have called their Lordships' attention to that very extraordinary act in exemplification of the system pursued during the last few months by Her Majesty's Government as partizans of one particular settlement of the difficulty in regard to the affairs of Central Italy. Their advocacy of that particular settlement was in direct opposition to the course of conduct pursued by the Emperor of the French. But on that subject he would not dwell. He wished to call their Lordships' attention to another circumstance, which had become known since he last called their Lordships' attention to the Italian question—namely, a statement given, as he believed, on the authority of Count Walewski, that certain proceedings had taken place relative to the annexation of Savoy, subsequent to those mentioned by his noble Friend, the Foreign Secretary, in the explanation which he had given in the other House of Parliament, and declaring that the explanation of his noble Friend, though correct as far as it went, was incomplete. Noble Lords opposite need be under no alarm that anything he would say could prejudice the course they were now pursuing. He appealed to their Lordships whether, notwithstanding what had passed in the other House, any complaint could be made against him for bringing this subject forward now. The subject was one to which he had already adverted, and he took some credit to himself when he said it was a question on which he felt most deeply. On Friday last, under somewhat inauspicious circumstances, he put a question to his noble Friend opposite (Earl Granville) as to an impression universally prevalent in Paris, that the whole of the case, as regarded Savoy, had not been stated to the British Parliament. He then observed that the general impression prevalent on the Continent, and in diplomatic circles on this matter, was confirmed by a letter to which publicity had been given in a French newspaper. His noble Friend might sneer at anonymous communications in newspapers; but when he did so, he was indulging in a dream of the past, and adverting to a state of things which no longer existed. In every great European State, it was now the practice to make important communications to the newspapers, particularly was it so on the part of our nearest neighbour here in question, and only within the last six weeks a great European Congress was officially declared to have been postponed on account of an anonymous pamphlet. But, in respect to the letter to which allusion was now made, his noble Friend must be as well aware as he was, that it was reputed to rest on the authority of Count Walewski himself. When he referred to the subject on Friday, he had not the newspaper beside him in which the letter appeared, and could only state substantially, and in a few words, the general effect of what appeared in that very remarkable document. He would now read to their Lordships at length the very words of the letter:—

" Lord John Russell stated last week in the House of Commons that the English Cabinet, desiring to know the intentions of the French Government with regard to Savoy, Count Walewski had declared to them, in the month of July last, that the Emperor and his Government did not think of the annexation of that country to France. This communication of Lord John Russell was quite exact. But to make known all the truth, that the attitude of France with regard to Savoy should be properly appreciated, the noble Lord might have said, and perhaps ought to have said, more. . . . The declarations of Count Walewski were, then, perfectly true; but it is equally certain that later on, when events had considerably changed the situation of Italy, the Government of the Emperor saw in these eventualities new necessities, new duties for France. Count Walewski then held quite another language, and declared that if the Central States of Italy were annexed to Piedmont, France would be obliged to claim Savoy and the county of Nice. Count Walewski told Lord Cowley, that if the English Government did not desire to see the annexation of Savoy to France, they had only to cease urging the annexation of Central Italy to Piedmont, but the one rendered the other inevitable. Lord John Russell was not ignorant of these resolutions, so frankly declared by the French Government; and it is a subject of surprise that he stopped at the Month of July in the explanations that he communicated to Parliament on a subject that has pre-occupied public attention so much. However, the despatches of Lord Cowley cannot fail to be in one of the first volumes of the blue-book, which will be furnished to the English Parliament."

Now he was very much afraid that Count Walewski would be disappointed in the expectation that any such explanations as he spoke of would be found in the blue-book. It had been assumed by the noble Lord that conversations might have taken place between Count Walewski and the English Ambassador on these matters, but that they had never assumed an official character. Now he maintained—and would appeal for confirmation to the noble Lords who had the same acquaintance with diplomatic proceedings as had himself—that in all European countries when a communication was made by a Foreign Minister to the Ambassador of another country on any public question, whether verbally or otherwise, it by its very nature became official, and that any departure from that rule was a departure from the established usage followed in diplomatic intercourse. If their Lordships not see what monstrous abuses might arise from such a system, and confidential communications considered unofficial, and not at variance with constitutional doctrine, all our internal communications would be put into an official shape. It would, moreover, place the Foreign Secretary beyond the pale of official responsibility; and not only this, he would be that, in order to have perfect identity of opinion on questions of foreign policy, all Members of the Cabinet should be aware of all that had passed, and it was therefore unfair to his colleagues if anything was kept back by the Foreign Secretary. The usual practice was that everything in the shape of a public despatch was circulated for the information of the Cabinet; but private letters were generally communicated only to the Foreign Secretary, the Prime Minister, and the Leader of the House in which the latter did not happen to be. That, at all events, was the practice which had been adopted by the Government of Lord Melbourne, of which (the Marquess of Normanby) had the honour to be a Member. If that course was not observed, many things which arose during the recess would have occurred without the knowledge of the noble Lord's colleagues. It was a good old rule to have an official record of every diplomatic transaction, and one which he thought ought to be usefully observed. The letter which he had just read to their Lordships was strangely at variance with any appearance of sincerity and completeness in the statement which had been made by the noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs. He must say that he did not understand the change of policy which seemed to have taken place with respect to the Italian question as indicated by the speech of the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary at Aberdeen, which was the first communication to the public after the despatches received at the end of the month of June. In these they were distinctly told that everything in Central Italy was purely provisional. But in the speech which he had made at Aberdeen, the noble Lord stated that the people of Central Italy had conducted themselves with perfect order, as if they were citizens of a country which had long been free. He should like to know where his noble Friend got that information. They might have conducted themselves as citizens of a country which had long been free, but they could not have conducted themselves as citizens of a country which was any longer free, inasmuch as not one of the Governors of the different parts of Central Italy had been chosen by popular election. They were all nominated by a new method of shuffling the cards, putting the same persons into different positions in the Piedmontese Government, and the people had no choice in the matter. Had they liberty of speech there? It was well known that Signor Farini, the Governor of the Romagna, has issued a proclamation announcing that any person who adhered to the old regime would be visited with the pains of high treason. Had they freedom of the press there? On the contrary, the censorship was substantially in force throughout all the new Governments. Had they liberty of person? He could prove to their Lordships that not hundreds, but thousands, of the citizens were now imprisoned on account of their loyalty. One word with respect to the way in which the new Governments were appointed. They would recollect that the King of Sardinia, acting in conformity with that treaty by which he was so great a gainer, recalled his Royal Commissioners from the Governments of Central Italy. Thus Signor Buoncompagni was recalled from Tuscany as the King's Commissioner; but he had not long returned to his own country till he was sent back again by the Prince Carignan, though he was very far, indeed, from being the object of the popular choice. In the same way Signor Farini was recalled; but though they recalled Farini the Commissioner, they reappointed Farini the Dictator. Then let their Lordships turn to Parma, where Count Palieri had been appointed Commissioner. It might have been supposed that when the old Government retired, he would have called the citizens together, and asked what was next to be done. Not a bit of it; but of his own accord he appointed Signor Manfredi, his Private Secretary, the Commissioner of the neighbouring state of Modena, and when the Commissioners were recalled, Manfredi came to Parma as Governor, but after a few days Farini appeared as Governor of both Provinces, appointed by Manfredi to Modena. And all these things were done by proclamations—the people were never consulted on any one of them. Their Lordships would perhaps allow him to go into some detail as to the acts of these new Governments. Everybody knew the character of the Duchess of Parma—how much she had done for her people, and how beloved she was among them, inasmuch that on a former occasion, when her Government was overthrown by a popular tumult, she was restored to her throne by the spontaneous action of the people themselves. In the late transactions she might have held her place, for there were many brave hearts devoted to her, but she would not allow her troops to fire upon the people. One regiment of 900 resolute men, under the command of Major Bouzi, was prepared to act, and the tumultuous mob showed no disposition to face them; when upon their approaching the town after the departure of the Duchess, General Scotti conveyed to Major Bouzi a message from the Duchess, ordering them not to fire, as the Duchess would prefer to suffer anything rather than her troops to fire upon the people for whom she had done so much. On receiving the message, Major Bouzi came to an agreement with the commander of the popular party, and agreed that his regiment should lay down their arms and enter the city, on condition that their safety should be guaranteed. This was agreed to by the leaders of the mob; but no sooner were they within the gates than Major Bouzi was fired at, and as the pistol-shot grazed his head he was stabbed, and for two hours he was dragged through the streets of the town with every mark of indignity, and thrown into a dungeon more dead than alive. All the officers received similar treatment, and none of them were allowed to go out of prison, except on condition that they would join the popular army. Was all this concealed from his noble Friend the Foreign Secretary? If it was, where was his information? If it was not, how could he tell the people of Aberdeen that the Italians had conducted themselves as citizens of a country that had long been free? He wished now to refer to the fate of Colonel Anviti for the sake of correcting one or two errors that had gone abroad on that subject. Count Anviti did not go of his own accord to Parma, nor was it true that he was generally unpopular there. In the year 1855 his life had been attempted by a secret society there, and the person guilty of that attempt was tried and executed. He was travelling from Bologna, and at a particular place, where the railroad was broken, he was recognized by the brother of the man who had been executed for attempting his life. He was obliged, in consequence of that unfortunate occurrence, to go into the town, and there the unhappy man was seized and dragged through the streets for five hours, murdered with horrible cruelty, and his body mangled after death, without the slightest attempt having been made to rescue him by any person in authority; and from that time to this, in spite of the high-sounding proclamations which had been put forth, not a single person had been put on his trial for that horrible outrage. All that happened during the regime of one of the new Governments of Central Italy, the people of which, according to his noble Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, had conducted themselves with perfect order, as if they were the citizens of a country which had long been free. But suppose there had been order, he contended that that proved nothing. In the French Revolution of 1848, they all knew that perfect order was maintained up to June; and at Rome, the same thing happened till Count Rossi was assassinated. In fact, nothing was easier than to control the mob in the first days of a revolution; but that proved nothing as to its future character. He (the Marquess of Normanby) read to their Lordships on the first day of the Session a letter from a Tuscan gentleman of the highest respectability. He had since heard from that gentleman, who said: "You will not be surprised that that letter has been made the ground of violent abuse. Why I cannot tell you, because it contained an exact description of the truth." He would read a letter which he had received a few days ago from an English merchant of the first consideration at Leghorn. That gentleman said:—

"Intervention is prohibited in Tuscany, but, my Lord, intervention exists everywhere, and armed foreign intervention. The Governor-General is Piedmontese, the Minister of War is Piedmontese, the Commander of the Gendarmerie is Piedmontese, the Military Governor of Leghorn is Piedmontese, the Captain of the Port is Piedmontese; besides a great many others of the same nation occupying other responsible positions. This I consider armed foreign intervention. Let this be removed, and let the despotic pressure of the present Government be taken away, and I believe that the country would vote in a large majority for the restoration of the dynasty of Lorraine. I believe nearly the whole army to be in favour of the Grand Duke which is now kept out of Tuscany; and certainly two-thirds of the National Guard are for the Grand Duke. All the Powers have been neutral here, in as far as not taking part in ceremonies or in acknowledging the present Government. Since the peace of Villafranca the British agents have assisted at all ceremonies and balls."

Surely the recognition of that Government was not in accordance with the assurance that was given last Session by the noble Lord at the head of the Foreign Department. His informant went on to say that,—

"The troops are dispersed out of Tuscany—the people are afraid to make a great demonstration—they know that for one word the prisons are ready to receive them. Private meetings have been held at Leghorn by influential persons, and some members of the National Assembly. A public meeting is impossible. The convocation of the Assembly was requested by twenty-three members, and refused. At these private meetings it was decided that Ferdinand IV. should be received with a constitution and an amnesty. The people have been grossly deceived from the beginning, all promises have been broken, the price of food has been raised, and the national debt enormously augmented."

Although some of those facts might have been withheld from the noble Lord, still he must have known some of them when he directed the English representative to attend Signor Buoncompagni's reception. He (the Marquess of Normanby) had referred, on a former evening, to a remarkable work written by Signor Ampère, a most distinguished man, originally a refugee from the Romagna on account of certain disturbances that had occurred in that district, who addressed the new Government of Central Italy in the following terms:—

"You must have been induced by the false position you have created for yourselves to consent in these times (which you call those of liberty, but which are not so) that perversions of the truth should be made a means of government. You transformed the answer of Victor Emanuel that he would advocate before the great Powers the vote of the Tuscan Assembly, which had adopted him as their King, into a positive acceptance; and, in order to persuade the ignorant multitude, you ordered public rejoicings in honour of that which you know was not a fact. You declared yourselves Ministers of a King who had never appointed you. You administer the Government in his name. You pass sentence in his name. You pledge the public faith to one who has not given you any authority for such a purpose ; and though it is through you that you force the Tuscans to recognize him as King, you are the first to show a mark of disrespect which destroys his prestige, by imposing upon him the choice of a regent, which you have no right to do if he is the King, and whom you had no right to nominate on his behalf if he is not."

Having pointed out the actual condition of the Tuscan Government, it was hardly necessary to allude to the particular person who had been selected for the favour of the noble Lord at the head of the Foreign Department of this country. They had all heard of Signor Buoncompagni—his name was a kind of by-word and reproach in Italy on account of his treachery in a profession which, above and beyond all others, required the strictest honour and good faith. The kind of estimation in which he was held had been well described by a noble Lord in the course of last Session. Signor Buoncompagni was nominated Commissioner-General for the King of Sardinia. He was recalled, and an offer of the Regency was then made to Prince Carignan, and then, strange to say, Prince Carignan, who had nothing to do with Tuscany, while refusing the regency, appointed or nominated Signor Buoncompagni as Governor-General. As had been shown, that appointment caused great indignation in Florence, and even Liberal members of the Assembly protested against it ; but still the English Secretary of State desired Her Majesty's representative to attend an official reception of Signor Buoncompagni, to whom he was not accredited. He (the Marquess of Normanby) believed that it was an established point of diplomatic etiquette that that should not be done. He had not forgotten the lesson he received the other night from the noble Earl opposite upon the inexpediency of giving autobiographical details in the House ; but where events were analagous a comparison was sometimes useful. He was Ambassador in Paris in 1848, when the revolution broke out : but, after the revolution, he remained there unofficially, having no regular communication with any member of the Provisional Government, and was personally acquainted only with M. Lamartine. When the National Assembly was convoked, M. Lamartine sent to him and to other members of the corps diplomatique a sort of invitation to attend the ceremony. He consulted with his colleagues and with the Government at home ; it was universally agreed by them that not being accredited to the Government, and, with their assent, he declined to attend the opening of the Assembly in his official capacity. The Foreign Secretary of that day was Lord Palmerston, and the Prime Minister was Lord J. Russell. The actors had now changed their parts, but they were the same men who approved his conduct in 1848 ; and, therefore, he wished to know what there was peculiar in the position of Signor Buoncompagni to make him a special exception to what had hitherto been a universal practice. He regretted very much the present position of our Foreign Office. When the present Government entered upon office England was maintaining a dignified attitude of perfect neutrality, and professions were made of a determination to continue in the same course. But soon came the chimerical idea of a great kingdom in Central Italy, and the Government pursued it in their own utter ignorance—he meant ignorance of the wants, the wishes, and the prejudices of the people in the different States of Italy. The Emperor of the French, having entered into certain engagements with Austria, was very creditably desirous of fulfilling them ; but it seemed that the noble Lords whom he had mentioned thought by showing favour to those factious Governments to overreach the Emperor. They had given to the Emperor of the French a reason, or, at all events, an excuse, for a course of proceeding which had excited universal reprobation in this country. Such he took to be the position of the Italian question. He was anxious that the papers for which he had moved should be produced, because he could not comprehend, in spite of the explanations which had been offered elsewhere, when the communications on the subject to which he had drawn attention were received by Her Majesty's Government. It was a painful duty to dispel the illusions which still existed in the public mind of England respecting Italy. He had, however, endeavoured to discharge that duty by bringing before Parliament information which he had received from trustworthy sources, and he was glad to believe that at last some glimmer of light was breaking from the cloud of prejudice and ignorance, and that there was now a greater prospect of the establishment of Italian independence on legitimate foundations, freed from all foreign interposition, and so as to promote the cause of loyalty, truth, good faith, and good order. The noble Marquess concluded by moving: First—

“That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty for, Copy of any Instructions from the Secretary of State to Her Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires at Florence, who is not accredited to the Provisional Government there, directing him to attend the official Reception on the 1st of January of Signor Buoncompagni, now acting as Governor-General of Tuscany, having been nominated as such by Prince Carignan of Savoy without any subsequent popular Sanction on the Part of the Tuscan People.”

And second—

“That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty for, Return of the Dates of all Communications between the Secretary of State and Her Majesty's Ambassador at Paris, on the Subject of the Annexation of Savoy and Nico to France, from the Accession to Office of the present Ministry up to this Time.”

EARL GRANVILLE was happy to say that he did not think it had ever before been his lot to be accused of want of courtesy in that House. That, however, did not diminish his regret to find the noble Marquess now complaining of his want of courtesy on a former occasion. As far as he could remember, not a single word fell from him which could bear out such a charge; but if he had unintentionally erred in this way, either as to manner or tone, he was very sorry, for he should lament much if anything he spoke or wrote should evince a want of consideration towards one with whom he had had both diplomatic and personal relations. With regard to the Motion of the noble Marquess, it was almost without precedent, if not irregular, to call for the production of Correspondence which the Government had stated it would not be for the public service at present to produce. At the same time he (Earl Granville) had not the slightest objection to the particular return for which the noble Marquess had moved as an addendum, for the dates of the communications respecting the annexation of Savoy, from the accession to office of the present Government. But the noble Marquess had laid great stress upon a letter in the Indépendance Belge, coming, he said, from Count Walewski, the statements of which, he thought, were inconsistent with the statements made in this and the other House of Parliament. Now, the statement he (Earl Granville) had made was, that there was no official communication between the two Governments

during a certain time, but he had not denied that there might have passed communications, in private conversation, between the French Minister of Foreign Affairs and the English Minister at the French Court. The noble Marquess had made an assertion that no communications could pass between a Minister of Foreign Affairs and an Ambassador without being official. That he (Earl Granville) entirely denied. Between men who had long known each other and who stood in these relations there were frequent conversations and arguments which bore no official character. He had been informed by his noble Friend the Foreign Secretary that in looking back to his private correspondence he found a private letter from Earl Cowley detailing a private conversation with Count Walewski upon different phases of the Italian question, and containing, as an obiter dictum, an allusion to a contingency which was declared in the despatches to be quite impossible. He (Earl Granville) thought, that after official communications had taken place on this subject in more than one despatch, after an announcement had been made respecting it in Parliament, and after a satisfactory assurance had been received that the question had dropped, his noble Friend was quite justified in taking no notice of a private conversation, which Earl Cowley believed it unnecessary to embody in a despatch. It was useless, then, for his noble Friend to give an official form to a matter which seemed at that time at rest. That was all he (Earl Granville) had to say on this part of the subject. But the noble Marquess went on to move for

“A copy of any instructions from the Secretary of State to Her Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires at Florence, who is not accredited to the Provisional Government there, directing him to attend the official reception on the 1st of January of Signor Buoncompagni, now acting as Governor-General of Tuscany, having been nominated as such by Prince Carignan of Savoy, without any subsequent sanction on the part of the Tuscan people.”

Then, profiting by this Motion, the noble Marquess had gone into the same sort of general charge against the whole Italian people, which he indulged the House with on almost every occasion he could. Now, he wished to ask the noble Marquess on what authority did he claim to advance these vague accusations? The noble Marquess had had sufficient Parliamentary experience to be aware that—although private letters to himself, filled with every sort of assertion in detail, might help to confirm some particular opinions of his own, and might perhaps afford to himself matters of some interest and amusement, yet in a public assembly like that, discussing grave public questions, on which they had a certain bias of opinion, very little importance could be attached to weak translations and quotations from private letters—the House not knowing the names of the writers, or what personal motives they might have for thus sending them to be communicated there by the organ of the noble Marquess. It was really childish to think that the British Parliament would be influenced by such unauthorized communications as those. When, therefore, the noble Marquess asked whether the Government knew all that, he having read all those statements from his private letters, he scarcely knew what to say to him; but this he would say, that a collection of tales of that description had been given to Her Majesty's Government, and that Her Majesty's Government did thereupon inquire into the truth of them, and found there was no foundation for them whatever. It was of course impossible—it would be contrary to human nature—to suppose that, in such very peculiar times as these, a golden age could be existing in Italy—that there should be absolutely no offences committed amongst the populace, and that the Government on no occasion should have committed any fault; but from all that he had heard, and from the authentic information sent to Her Majesty's Government by our officials abroad, on their public responsibility, he must say that he believed on the whole the condition of Central Italy was remarkable, especially if it were contrasted with the state of things in 1848—that it was most remarkable at present for the general order and peace, and for the general satisfaction which reigned there. The noble Marquess would have done better to have postponed the discussions on these points till the papers which were last night laid before the House of Commons should have been presented also to their Lordships' House. He would there have seen that although Mr. Corbett pointed out certain things in which he thought the Government of Florence had been wrong, and other things on which the feelings of the people had flowed in this direction or in that, yet the general inference from those despatches was that there never were elections carried on with more order and regularity than those for the return of the Tuscan Assembly; and the result, be it remembered, was that that Assembly was composed of the men most remarkable in the country, by their birth, their property, their scientific, literary, or industrial qualifications. He (Earl Granville) really thought it was hardly necessary, as the papers had not yet been put into their Lordships' hands, to go further into this question. The noble Marquess had spoken of the "ignorance" prevailing among public men on the Italian question; but when he was complaining of want of courtesy towards himself, he thought he might have refrained himself from applying such a term to the most experienced statesmen of the present day. But to give the House some little idea of the value of the information which the noble Marquess himself possessed, he would ask upon what grounds did the noble Marquess suppose that such a despatch as that for which he had moved really existed? He (Earl Granville) believed that no such despatch existed. The only thing at all bearing upon the matter was a despatch, which would be found among the papers now printed, directing Mr. Corbett to treat Signor Buoncompagni exactly in the same unofficial way in which he had previously treated Baron Ricasoli. Now, from the abuse lavished by the noble Marquess on Signor Buoncompagni—abuse which, in speaking of the actual head of a Government to which we wished well, in every sense of the word, might better have been avoided—he (Earl Granville) did not understand whether or not the noble Marquess thought that Her Majesty's Government and Mr. Corbett ought to have made a difference between Signor Buoncompagni and Baron Ricasoli. But he thought nothing could have been more foolish or wrong than to do so. The principle on which Her Majesty's Government had proceeded was that of sending a person to act as chargé d'affaires at Florence, giving him orders to hold only unofficial communications with the de facto Government of the day; and nothing would have been so foolish as for him or for the British Government to enter into the claims of any one particular person, and to discuss whether that person really was the head of the Government or not. The simple rule was to take the state of affairs as they found it. Whether or not Mr. Corbett had throughout acted wisely and judiciously, and in strict compliance with diplomatic usages, he (Earl Granville) would not discuss, but certainly Mr. Corbett had done well in showing friendly attention to those who were actually carrying on the Government at Florence. The noble Marquess, however, had quoted from his anonymous correspondence a complaint that the English chargé d'affaires was the only one who had exhibited any civility of that sort. But he (Earl Granville) found in these papers a case somewhat similar, namely, that when the Assembly met, there, in the tribune allotted to the corps diplomatique, appeared not only the English and Sardinian, but also the French representative. Some of the other matters alluded to by the noble Marquess, which he found in his correspondence, were of such a kind that, at all events, no information of them whatever had reached any single individual except himself in this country. Now, he (Earl Granville) did implore their Lordships not to be led away by such representations. It would indeed be madness to suppose that there would not be some offences given and some faults committed by any Governments placed in such a peculiar position as those of Central Italy were; but he repeated that the general state of the country was most satisfactory, whether with regard to the good order that was preserved, or the wishes exhibited by the people. As for the general charge made by the noble Marquess against Her Majesty's Government, that, whereas the late Government left this country in a very high position at the beginning of the war, Her Majesty's present Government had now entirely lost that position through their partizan feeling in favour of the annexation to Sardinia—if the noble Marquess would look at the papers now produced, he might there see that from the beginning the attitude of Her Majesty's Government had been anything but that of the partizan of any particular scheme. He would see, for instance, that when that very distinguished man, whose death was so much deplored, the Marquis Lajatico, came to London, Her Majesty's Government refused to receive him in a diplomatic capacity, but that in conversations with him Lord John Russell endeavoured to impress upon him the reasons why it seemed to Her Majesty's Government desirable that the Tuscans should recall the hereditary Grand Duke. After that, when the future Government to be adopted was under discussion, Her Majesty's Government still refused to give any opinion, but merely stated that they would respect the wishes of the Italians. And if there were latterly one or two despatches in which the advantages of the annexation were urged, they were urged chiefly because it was known to be the expressed wish of Central Italy to be so annexed; and the despatches then merely added some other arguments which would naturally suggest themselves with regard to the forming of a larger kingdom, for the sake of the Italians protecting their own independence. But even on that occasion it would be seen that his noble Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs intimated that the approval of Her Majesty's Government was always open to any other arrangement satisfactory to the people. Instead, then, of the course pursued by Her Majesty's Government having brought us on the Continent into that deplorable position which the noble Marquess supposed, he (Earl Granville) believed that the influence of England on this Italian question had increased, and was still greatly increasing; and he admitted that this was owing to no merit of the present Government, except that of having followed a disinterested course, and one in unison with the wishes of the Italian people, and one in which he felt they were supported by the great majority of the people of this country. With regard to Austria, indeed, it could not be expected that the policy Her Majesty's Government thought right should be entirely pleasing to Austria, since Austria and England started from such different points of view as to everything that could regulate Italian policy. But, at the same time, these despatches showed—and, indeed, Her Majesty's Ministers had directly expressed the same to the Austrian Government—that although in Italy these subjects of disagreement still remained, it was the strong wish of Her Majesty's Government to see the power of Austria consolidated, so as to make her continue what she had been—an important element in the European equilibrium. And as for the people of Italy themselves, he was quite sure that, notwithstanding that we were no party to the war last year, which they hailed with so much enthusiasm, they still appreciated the attitude which we had since adopted with regard to them; and it was impossible not to see that they looked up to us as a model of free Government. The people of England, he was equally certain, felt grateful to Her Majesty's Ministers for having shown, in their name, a judicious sympathy with the people of Italy, so far as to protest against any forcible intervention from without, and to claim that the Italians themselves should be left to settle their own affairs, whilst we abstained from any engagement that could fetter our action hereafter. He was borne out, therefore, by public opinion in thus repudiating the charges which the noble Marquess had brought, with so much strong language, against Her Majesty's Government.

THE MARQUESS OF NORMANBY said, that the grounds on which he supposed a despatch relating to the attendance of the British chargé d'affaires really existed was that Mr. Corbett had distinctly stated that he had done so, in consequence of the instructions he had received.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY: My Lords, the noble Earl has complained that on the Motion of the noble Marquess, your Lordships' House has been more than once, and more than twice, occupied with this question during the present Session of Parliament. If however the noble President of the Council has become wearied and impatient at the frequent observations and criticisms of the noble Marquess, I think that is very much to be laid at the door of the Government themselves. It is very much their fault that these repeated conversations take place, and that these repeated appeals are made from this side of the House; because they have imparted to us no information, at least only by bits and scraps; sometimes there is a speech in the other House, sometimes a few words in this; sometimes an official document in the Moniteur; sometimes an announcement in Reuter's telegraph; sometimes we have asked questions and sometimes we have moved for Returns: and out of this confused mass we have had to try to extract something like the truth of what has taken place during the last six months in Italy. Without wishing to glorify the Government to which I had the honour to belong, I may say that was not the case when we were in power. I beg your Lordships to recollect that just on the eve of my leaving office I presented to your Lordships a collected and full statement of the correspondence that had taken place on the affairs of Italy, between the 1st of January and the end of May. But from that moment up to this we have only had, as far as I have seen, one or two despatches published by the noble Lord now at the head of Foreign Affairs soon after he came into office, which were confined to a correspondence with the Prussian Government; and since that time we have received nothing official from Her Majesty's Government on the subject. It is, therefore, really the fault of the Government that these frequent conversations have taken place. My Lords, a great deal of misrepresentation has taken place with respect to persons and with respect to things in this great controversy on this question. And no one person has been more misrepresented than myself. I have been—I suppose for some party purpose—held up in this House as a partizan of Austria and a constant supporter of Austrian tyranny in Italy, and yet on your Lordships' table I laid a paper, the very first of the Government to which I belonged, written as early as the beginning of January, 1859, on the 12th of that month, in which I stated positively and categorically to Austria that in no case would England assist her in her military occupation of Italy. In the face of that I have been accused of being partial to that Government, and wishing her success as against Italian liberty and independence, whilst we threw every possible difficulty in the path of France. Our object was to establish and maintain a bond fide neutrality in regard to Italy. I knew, and my Colleagues knew, that such was the wish of the English people; and I felt myself that, up to the moment we left office, we had maintained that wish. If I had done what was asserted I should judge, from the displeasure shown both by France and Austria, that the anger of both had evinced that we had not favoured either the one or the other. I believe, although many events have since occurred, that no circumstances have transpired which would have justified Her Majesty's Government in departing from the principle of non-interference; but I am apprehensive—although I have not seen the papers presented, at last, to the other House, and I feel, of course, great diffidence on the subject—but, from all that we have heard, and that has been said by the noble Lord the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs in the other House, I am apprehensive that that strict impartiality and neutrality, and that system of non-interference, that was commenced by the late Government has not been persisted in by the present. I fear that that noble Lord has not carried out the principles he enunciated and maintained in his speech at Aberdeen. If it be true that, expressing strongly their opinion that a kingdom should be formed in Northern Italy composed of those united Provinces that have now rejected their former Sovereigns, and if, believing this to be the best policy, the Government have forced it or urged it upon France, and if in consequence France has used it as a reason and a pretext for carrying out an object which she appears for a time to have abandoned—if that is the “logic of the facts,” and believing the Emperor of the French’s argument to be true, then such a consummation—the loss of Savoy to Piedmont and its annexation to France—rests on the head of Her Majesty’s Government. Indeed, it is the first fruits they have gathered of the consequence of abandoning the principle of non-interference which they first espoused and first professed to follow, and the fruits to be reaped from which may be far more bitter if they persistently continue in that course. Every man has a right to his opinions on these subjects, and the opinion of Her Majesty’s Government, it appears, is, that a strong Government should be formed in Northern Italy. I have the greatest respect for the experience, the abilities, and the judgment of many noble Lords opposite and of their colleagues in the House of Commons, but that is not, in my opinion, the real way to give strength and peace to the Italian people. I conclude that they wish—what I wish and what I believe every man in this country wishes—that Italy should be a free and independent nation, that she should be strong enough to resist aggression, and to take her proper place among the other nations of Europe. But I do not think that the scheme proposed is the best scheme for arriving at such a consummation; and my Lords, I will tell you why. If the strong kingdom to be found in Northern Italy is to comprise the union of the Duchies of Tuscany and Parma, and the Romagna, to Piedmont, and if that has for its consequences the annexation of Savoy to France, how can the northern kingdom, or Northern Italy, be a strong kingdom in a military or strategic point of view? It would, in reality, be open at both ends—it would be exposed at both extremities. France would hold the key of the Alps in Savoy, and Austria would hold the key of Northern Italy on the Mincio. Italy in herself would have no protection at all from the north and from the east, and we all know that the geographical formation of Italy makes it difficult to defend it in a military point of view, unless she is in possession of enormous forces. The very shape of Italy, taking the entire country from the top of the boot to the foot, would necessitate its having a navy almost as large as England has to protect her against foreign aggression. Its natural configuration exposes its armies, however strong, to be turned in the flank or rear by sea, and if in addition to that it has the doors of the Alps open at both ends, it is palpable that it cannot be a strong country or one capable of being strongly protected. I do not believe that it is in that kind of strength it must look for its protection. Looking at the character of the Italians, at the divided sovereignties it has possessed for ages, at the different feelings that prevail, and the different dialects that are spoken, I believe Italy would be strong as a nation of confederated States—neutralized, and therefore free, of course, from the interference of the foreigner—and that if thus confederated together they would form what might be called a strong nation. I say so because I believe that constituted into such a kingdom as Her Majesty’s Government propose it would only be strong enough to give offence, but too weak to protect itself. Although these are my private opinions as differing from those of Her Majesty’s Government, let it not be supposed for a moment that I wish to urge them upon Italy. I would not do so even were I a Minister of the Crown at this moment—unless, indeed, I had official authority to do so, and the people demanded it on the part of those States in my Ministerial capacity. My Lords, let us, in God’s name, leave Italy to make its own arrangements and work out its own independence. Let us not interfere or commit ourselves. If Her Majesty’s Government have any power and influence over the Emperor of the French, let them induce him to withdraw his army from Italy. In what has been foreshadowed I only see France substituted for Austria—a consummation that I foresaw and denounced more than a year ago. With respect to the smaller matter brought before us by the noble Marquess, the compliment paid to Signor Buoncampagni—I agree with the noble Marquess in regretting that any mark of respect, which was not a very evidently necessary one, should have been paid to that individual. I am no prude in politics. I am not at all disposed to be severe on the ambitious or on any display of party feeling; and if any man ever carried illusions of a Quixotic or chivalrous nature with reference to the generosity of nations and of governments into the midday of life, and it happened that that gentleman happened to reside at the Foreign Office for six months, I will answer for it that they would be expelled. I have no such illusions whatever, but yet I must say there is a line beyond which the greatest indulgence cannot be extended. In the earliest ages it was ascertained that even the divine maxims of the Christian religion were not sufficient to keep society together, and there was a code of honour established by man himself to assist the code of morality; and if nations deal with nations, and erect a code of honour, it is impossible, without its rules being properly observed, that official relations should be properly maintained, and if not, the whole state of society must become one of disruption. I will remind you—and I have excellent authority for what I say—what Signor Buoncompagni did. He stood in the high, and I may almost say sacred character of Minister from the King of Sardinia to a friendly Sovereign, the Grand Duke of Tuscany, and it appears by the evidence of Mr. Scarlett, our own Minister at Florence, that this person was one if not the most active of the conspirators in bringing about the revolution in Tuscany, and in hurling from his throne the Sovereign of that State. To English minds this seems incredible and almost inconceivable. Suppose for a moment that the Sardinian or any other foreign Minister at the British Court should be discovered conspiring with Irish agitators, or any foreign band of conspirators, not only to break the law, but actually to drive the Sovereign from the throne—would it not be looked upon as perfectly incredible? But this was really the case in Tuscany, and before the ink was dry that signed away the Grand Duke's power over his subjects, that gentleman, Signor Buoncompagni, who had been accredited by the King of Sardinia as Minister to the Grand Duke, sat almost in his place, inasmuch as he was one of the commission who managed the Duchy. Now revolution is revolution. We do not expect it to be created without great and extraordinary causes; but that is no reason why you should connect yourself with those who took part in them even in the most indirect way, or pay them useless or unnecessary compliments. I cannot therefore, any more than the noble Marquess, understand why our chargé d'affaires went, though apparently without orders, in his official character and in his official dress, to the levée of M. Buoncompagni. If he went without orders, of course these remarks on the Government go for nothing; but there is not one of your Lordships who will be of opinion that with respect to public morality, and in other views of the question, it was right. I have only one word to say with regard to Savoy, and that is to express my surprise at the fact of a more complete statement not having been made to the House on that scheme. Considering the footing which I am glad to see the noble Lord at the head of Her Majesty's Government has established with the Emperor of the French, it appears to me that they ought to be perfectly clear and well informed on the subject. Does the Emperor of the French mean, or does he not mean the annexation of Savoy to France? The question is a short and easy one to ask, and for His Majesty it ought to be an easy one to answer. I do not understand by what process the difficulties have taken place. Her Majesty's late Government, when they had an inkling of this scheme, lost no time in putting the categorical question. The answer Lord Cowley, he believed, gave when the inquiry was put was, that he had no idea of it at all; and, if I recollect the language of Lord Cowley, he said that not only was there no treaty, but that there was no intention to conclude such a treaty. It was quite evident that Lord Cowley did not believe that any such intention was seriously entertained, and then the matter dropped. But it appears that Her Majesty's Government have since had communications with the French Government, and that some proposals have been made respecting the annexation of Savoy. It appears that we have not the papers yet; but what we want to know is, what is the impression of Her Majesty's Government in regard to this matter; if they have had no answer from His Majesty's Government, we can pretty well judge for ourselves whether such a consummation is likely to take place. The matter is of the greatest European importance, because it gives to France the gates of Italy as well as Savoy. It is a question of such importance that Her Majesty's Government must have formed some opinion upon the subject, and unless the noble Lord says at once that it is not for the public benefit, I think we ought to press on him, and

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE said, he would beg leave to remind the noble Earl (the Earl of Malmesbury) of the forbearance which was exhibited to himself and the Government of which he was a member last year, when, at a most critical moment they had no particular reason for trusting the noble Earl's management of these matters, the Opposition forbore not only from moving for any papers, but also from originating any discussions, for which many persons were most anxious. The noble Earl, like the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Normanby) had mixed up two questions which he did not believe had any necessary connection with each other—for he had assumed the annexation of Savoy to France, to be part and parcel of the annexation of the liberated States of Central Italy to Piedmont. No such connection existed; and although unfortunately the possible contingency of the annexation of Savoy to France had been admitted into discussion by the Sardinian and French Government, he did not believe any such scheme would be carried out; but he believed, and strongly hoped and trusted, that the consolidation of a strong Italian Government, by the liberated Duchies would be accomplished. The feeling of the country was very strong against the one proposal, and very much in favour of the other. The noble Marquess had blamed the Ministry for having given too great a moral support to Signor Buoncompagni at Florence. But as his noble Friend, the Lord President, had well said, it was not the person that was in question, but the Government. As the noble Marquess was fond of referring to his own autobiography, he would upon this point remind him of the support which in 1848 he, as British Ambassador at Paris, gave to M. de Lamartine, at a time when other members of the Provisional Government of France were doing things and holding language of which no loyal Englishman could approve. It was right to afford support to M. de Lamartine at that moment, because he was rendering services to the cause of humanity and to Europe, which would better secure his immortality, even than would his writings; and for the same reason, so far from blaming Her Majesty's Government for what they had done towards recognizing and strengthening the Provisional Governments of Italy, he (the Marquess of Clanricarde) was only disposed to censure them for not having gone so far as they might in support of Governments, which, in his opinion, were entitled to the admiration of Europe. He confessed that he had listened with extreme pain to the speeches delivered both in the last and the present year by the noble Marquess. There were few Englishmen who would have spoken as the noble Marquess had done with reference to the struggles of the Italians against the most despotic and oppressive Governments which ever afflicted a civilized people; and his belief was that the noble Marquess's information was as incorrect as his political reasoning was erroneous. This he asserted confidently, not only upon authority of the highest kind, but also from what the noble Marquess himself relied upon, personal observation and personal knowledge. The noble Marquess said, that he had long resided in Florence, and was well acquainted with Tuscany; but their Lordships knew that a resident in a country who was attached to a particular clique or party, who adopted their views and lived with them, was often infinitely less informed about what was really going on in the country than might be a stranger, who, if actuated by a thirst for information, could often, in the course of a short casual visit, find out a great deal of which the other had no knowledge. Such we had found to be the case with regard to India; and it was made especially manifest in the instance in which Directors of the East India Company, who had resided in India for twenty years, denied the existence of the torture which was discovered and proved by Mr. Danby Seymour during a visit to that country of only six months. The ignorance of the noble Marquess—to use his own terms—was, he believed, as great as that of the East India Directors. The statements as to Milan were, he asserted, totally erroneous. For many years that city had not been in so happy and contented a state as it was at present; and if there was a little less gaiety than usual, it ought not to be forgotten that for two years there had been a failure in the crops of wine and silk. It might be true, as the noble Marquess said, that the taxation had been increased 15 per cent; but why did he not inform their Lordships what was its amount in Venetia, under the government of that country, from whose rule—for it was really the rule not of the Grand-Dukes, but of Austria—the people of Central Italy had emancipated themselves? The taxation in that country—it was so called by Austria, but it would be termed confiscation by every other civilized people—amounted to 130, and in some instances, for it was levied capriciously, to 200 per cent; that was, people were charged with taxes infinitely greater in amount than their yearly income, and their property was sold to raise these enormous imposts. What did their Lordships think of taxing a man more than his yearly income? There was but one word for it, and that was “confiscation.” One might suppose, from what had fallen from the noble Marquess, that the people of Northern Italy only wished that their former benign Governments should be restored to them; but to that statement he gave the most direct and flat contradiction. [The Marquess of NORMANBY: I said no such thing.] At all events, the noble Marquess said there was great discontent under the present system, particularly at Milan. He (the Marquess of Clanricarde) had witnessed the Reform agitation, and some contested elections, and he had lately been present at a demonstration in Italy; and never had he witnessed before, among all classes of the people, such enthusiasm, unanimity, order, and happiness as at Milan during a demonstration there of popular feeling. It was all very well to say that a stranger might have been deceived; but a person coming from a free country might generally be supposed to know something of popular demonstrations, and could easily collect from his intercourse with different parties whether their sentiments were real or not. He had also visited Parma, and here he must say he was sorry the noble Marquess should have thought it necessary to bring into discussion the conduct of the late ruler of those countries. For his own part, he had reason to know that, with the exception of a few persons attached to the Royal household, by whom the departure of the Ducal family was regretted, there was but one feeling of anxiety among persons of wealth and respectability, to get rid of the system of government under which they had hitherto lived. He warned the noble Marquess that there were documents in existence the signatures to which could not be denied, and which, if laid before their Lordships, would not redound to the honour of the Princes who had been removed from the thrones of Italy. What was the so-called Papal Government in Bologna and Romagna, and how had it been carried on? It was notoriously a Government under which life and property were not secure from the rapacity of Austrian commanders and the pillage of Austrian soldiers; while, on the other hand, it offered no protection from the banditti and malefactors of the country. It was a Government under which several young men, under twenty-one years of age, were shot one morning for ordinary delinquencies. What would be thought of a Government under which a man was shot by Austrian soldiers for having stolen four baiocchi (about 2*d.*), and whose sentence recited that he had committed a simple act of robbery unarmed? The fact was that Austria, and not the Pope, had governed Bologna. He was as anxious as any one for the maintenance of the Pope as a temporal Sovereign. He was aware that a great number of good Catholics thought it would be better if the Pope were not a temporal Sovereign at all. Looking, however, to the state of the Christian world, and of Europe, it was his deliberate and well-considered opinion that it is most desirable for Europe, and for those rulers who had Protestant subjects, that the Pope should occupy an independent position as a temporal Sovereign. Austria, however, had been more anxious than ever had been Sardinia to obtain possession of Papal territory, and had filched from the Pope a portion of his States. He was deeply concerned that there should be so much delay in settling the Italian question. He asked their Lordships to consider the position in which the Provisional Governments in Italy were now placed, and to see the importance of a strong Government being established as speedily as possible in that country. The movement that had been going on in Central Italy was under the control of the most influential and wealthy men, and was sympathized in by all who had an interest in the establishment of peace. He defied the noble Marquess to produce at that table a list of men in Tuscany and Bologna who would form a better selection of representatives than that which the Assembly contained. He held in his hand a list of 169 representatives, among whom were to be found not only many of the old historical names, but the most distinguished of modern times. The list comprised two Princes, twenty-nine Marquises and Counts, twelve Knights, six men of high military rank, twelve professors and men of learning, four ecclesiastical dignitaries, four judges, and so on. The Provisional Government had a very difficult part to perform. They had not only to encounter those who favoured the return of the Dukes, but also the Revolutionary party, with whom it would be extremely difficult to deal, unless there was the speedy prospect of a strong and free Government being established. They had been told by France and Sardinia that they must be exceedingly quiet and cautious in all their movements. If the people of Italy had been told to remain as they had done for six months, and that at the end of it they might be assured of their liberties being secured to them, he could have understood it; but everything was left vague and indefinite, and he feared that unless a speedy settlement was arrived at, there was great danger of a renewal of the war. He cautioned the Governments of France and England that if great care was not taken there would be a renewal of the war. Austria was now constantly sending recruits to the army in the Papal territory; and he had heard it said that not fewer than 800 men had been despatched at one time from Trieste to Ancona. That, if true, appeared to him to be an infraction of the neutrality which had been agreed upon. He had thought it right to make these remarks, because he considered the Provisional Government of Italy and the people of Italy had been most unfairly treated by the noble Marquess. His noble Friend might now go from one end of that country to the other, and walk about the towns at all hours in a great deal more safety than he could ever have done while it was under the Austrian rule. The noble Marquess in his zeal for the Grand Duke of Tuscany seemed to forget all that had passed in 1848. When the Grand Duke was expelled by the revolution in 1848, he was recalled by the party now in power; he gave in his adhesion to the state of things then adopted, and pledged himself solemnly to administer the Constitution which was then established, and the first thing he did was to strike a medal in honour of the persons who established it. But he afterwards forfeited every pledge he had given as soon as he found himself supported by the arms of Austria, and totally abolished the Constitution. He believed that the Grand Duke, had he proved faithful to the Constitution, would have been most acceptable to the Italians. The question now was, whether there was to be for ever bad or good Government in Central Italy, and he trusted the Italians—and that without loss of time—would be permitted freely to institute the form of government which would be most pleasing to themselves.

EARL GRANVILLE was understood to explain that the despatches which had been recently received from Earl Cowley made no allusion to any territorial acquisitions on the part of the French Government.

THE EARL OF CARDIGAN thought that nothing could be more desirable than that Her Majesty's Government should endeavour to prevail on the Emperor of the French to withdraw his army from Northern Italy. But the case of the occupation of Rome by French troops stood on different grounds; and he believed that before one hour elapsed after the withdrawal of those troops the lives of the Pope and the Cardinals would be in the greatest peril. The noble Earl, the President of the Council would bear him out when he said that the Government of the Pope and the Cardinals, as it was constituted in Rome, was of so hateful, arbitrary, and intolerable a nature, that there was none more unpopular, and that to leave it without the support of French troops would be to endanger the safety of all the authorities there—unless, indeed, the French were to be replaced by Austrian troops.

THE EARL OF DERBY said, their Lordships need not be under the least apprehension that he was going to follow, much less reply to, the very discursive speech of the noble Marquess opposite (the Marquess of Clanricarde). He concurred with the noble Earl, the President of the Council, that, the papers having been laid on the table of both Houses of Parliament only on the previous evening, any further discussion of the question raised by his noble Friend would be premature. But certainly it would not be desirable to enter into the various topics which the noble Marquess opposite had imported into his speech, including allusions to the biography of some of the Princes and statesmen of Italy, to his own early reminiscences of the time when he presided over an institution of the friends of civil and religious liberty, to the history of the old Catholic Association, and to the language held by the disciples of Dr. Cullen—topics by which he had to a considerable extent amused and enlightened their Lordships. He (the Earl of Derby), not having been in Italy for thirty-eight years, and not being possessed of that twenty years' experience which, according to the noble Marquess opposite, was necessary to make a man ignorant; nor, on the other hand, having made that quick transit through a country by which one suddenly became acquainted with all the circumstances of which twenty years' residence made a person ignorant, he should certainly not attempt to express any opinion as to the personal character of the gentlemen whose names had been introduced into the debate, nor to discuss the merits of the different Assemblies.

This, however, he would say, that the Italian topic was becoming day by day more important, and it probably might be necessary in the course of the present Session to discuss in a more deliberate manner the state of Central Italy. He was afraid events there were acquiring alarming importance, and he thought their Lordships' attention should be steadily directed to the country. But, while deprecating at that moment any further discussion, he was anxious to ask the noble Earl opposite a few questions. In the first place, would the noble Earl inform the House whether the papers that had been laid on the table would contain the latest information which the Government were enabled to afford on one of the subjects—and that the most important one—to which the noble Marquess had directed attention? If those papers would contain the latest information on the subject of the supposed intention to annex Savoy to the French dominions, he (the Earl of Derby) had not another word to say, and he would wait their appearance. On the other hand, if they would not include that information, he must take the liberty to ask whether the noble Earl would afford any information to the House with regard to the present intentions of the Emperor of the French as to the annexation of Savoy, and the light in which Her Majesty's Ministers regarded that policy. If the noble Earl was unable to give that information, he (the Earl of Derby) was compelled to tell him that the irresistible conclusion would be either that the noble Earl and his colleagues had not dealt very ingenuously with that and the other House of Parliament, or that they had been kept in a state of ignorance and consequently deceived as to the intentions which our Imperial Ally entertained on the subject in question. The answer recently given in both Houses of Parliament was to the effect that in the month of July last Her Majesty's Government had a communication with the Government of the Emperor of the French, and had been assured that there was no intention to propose or suggest the annexation of Savoy to France. Her Majesty's Government went on to inform their Lordships that they had intimated to the French Government that such a project would meet with their entire disapprobation. Was it or was it not true that since July, and previous to that question having been put and answered in both Houses of Parliament, a further communication had been received from the French Government that an alteration of opinion had taken place on the part of the Emperor of the French? If there had been such a subsequent correspondence, he (the Earl of Derby) was compelled, however painfully, to say that the Government, in giving the answer they did, merely referring to earlier communications, gave an answer which, though true to the letter, at the same time left both Houses of Parliament under an erroneous impression on a matter of the deepest importance. If, on the other hand, when the Government gave that answer, they were still under the impression that the Emperor of the French adhered to the views expressed in July last, but that since then they had ascertained from conversation, or otherwise, that a different opinion prevailed which had been concealed from them, then he thought it was a most unfortunate state of feeling, and the relations between the two countries were very different from the state of perfect confidence and harmony which it was the boast of the present Government to have established. He thought, therefore, Parliament was entitled to ask whether Her Majesty's Government had any reason to believe that there had been any change of views on the part of the French Government since July last with regard to the annexation of Savoy; whether any communications had been made to them upon the subject, and whether they had expressed their opinions upon the annexation. If the noble Earl should say that negotiations were still going on and that the correspondence had not been concluded, he (the Earl of Derby) had not a word further to say, but would wait the production of that correspondence for an explanation of the course that had been pursued. But he would entreat the House to mark the position in which they now stood. Her Majesty's Government had given them no information on the subject of a later date than the month of July; and the correspondence, when it is produced, would tell their Lordships whether, when they gave that answer they had in their possession communications of a later date, showing that that correspondence had been again renewed. The foreign journals, who were under strict control, and would not be allowed to discuss the question without the sanction of their Government, made no scruple in treating of the annexation as virtually decided upon. He did not ask the Government to say whether that was the case, but he hoped they would take the earliest opportunity of telling us the substance of any information they may have received, and we can then judge what might have been done if we had had the information sooner. The other and much less important question which he had to put was only to ascertain whether he had correctly understood the noble Earl. The Motion of the noble Marquess was for

He understood the noble Earl (Earl Granville) to say that no despatch had been written instructing Mr. Corbett as to the course he should pursue; but what the House ought to know was, what were the real facts. Did Mr. Corbett officially attend at a public reception of M. Buoncompagni, to whom he was not accredited by the Government? Did he take a course different to that taken by other Ministers residing at that Court? Was he in possession of the views and wishes of Her Majesty's Government before doing so? And if he had received no instructions, but acted upon his own responsibility, did Her Majesty's Government subsequently signify their approval of his conduct? He (the Earl of Derby) did not intend to enter into the question of whether the course taken was a correct one or not, although he had a strong opinion upon that point; but he wished to know what were the real facts.

EARL GRANVILLE, in reply to the first question of the noble Earl, said he had last week stated the most recent answer of the French Government, and he had also stated that negotiations were still proceeding between the Governments upon the subject, and that therefore he could not produce the papers. In answer to the second question, he had only to state that no other instructions were given to Mr. Corbett by the Government than a direction that if M. Buoncompagni should come to Florence as the head of the Government, he should be treated with every respect and in the same way as other Ministers did.

THE EARL OF DERBY thought that when such general instructions were given to Mr. Corbett, the Government could not say they had given no instructions to that gentleman with respect to his official reception; and it was still more impossible that the Foreign Office could be ignorant of a fact so significant in diplomacy as whether the representative of England had attended, in an official capacity, the public reception of a gentleman at the head of a Government to which he was not accredited. If they had received information of the fact, he wished to know whether or not they had approved of his conduct?

LORD WODEHOUSE thought the noble Earl had assumed too much. Did Mr. Corbett attend in an official capacity? He could not have attended in such capacity, because he had no credentials. That gentleman's position was simply this:—When the Grand Duke retired, the noble Earl who was then Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (the Earl of Malmesbury) instructed Mr. Scarlett to maintain, not “official,” but “officious” relations with the Provisional Government. When the present Government came into office they were of opinion that it was unnecessary to retain Mr. Scarlett there, and accordingly they directed the Minister to leave, and that Mr. Corbett, the Secretary of Legation, should remain in the same “officious” capacity as Mr. Scarlett had been. There was no official character attaching to him at Florence, and no act which he could do would involve the recognition of any Government there by Her Majesty's Government. As his noble Friend (Earl Granville) had stated, it would have been undesirable for the Government to inquire into the source or nature of the authority of M. Buoncompagni, since their real position was one of officious relations with the authority for the time being, no matter how it had been established, if it was established for the preservation of peace and order. The noble Earl had expressed astonishment that the Foreign Office should not have been informed of the prodigious event of Mr. Corbett's attending Signor Buoncompagni's reception. Speaking from memory, he might say that Mr. Corbett did not report that circumstance; but, if he had done so, no very grave importance could have been attached to it. Whether he was right in going at all was of no consequence, as he was acting under instructions placing him only in an officious position; and he (Lord Wodehouse) ventured to say that no authority could be produced to show that a person so placed could, by attending an official reception, compromise his Government to the recognition of any other Government.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY thought the noble Lord had not answered the question whether other Ministers attended officially. The noble Lord must know that an official reception compromised any gentleman in the position of Mr. Corbett if he attended it at all. If Mr. Corbett did attend that official reception without instructions, he (the Earl of Malmesbury) could only say that that gentleman committed an act which must be called extremely "officious" in another sense.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH said he could not understand how the correspondence respecting the suggested annexation of Savoy and Nice came to be confined to the Governments of England, France, and Sardinia. Our interest in the matter must be shared by every other European Power; in fact, our interest is not so immediate as that of some other Powers. He questioned the right of the King of Sardinia to give Savoy to France without the consent of all the Powers which gave Savoy to his House. Let their Lordships remember the position of the House of Savoy before the Treaties of 1815. The King only retained possession of Sardinia, and that under the protection of our fleets; but the treaties restored him to his ancient dominions, and added to them Genoa, for the especial purpose of making Sardinia stronger, and preventing that influence of France over Italy which had been so injuriously exercised in former times. Any attempt on the part of the King of Sardinia to yield Savoy to France without the consent of the Powers which gave it to him would be an act of treachery to them, and, further, would be an act of treachery to the people of the Central States of Italy, who had shown such confidence in him as to desire him to be their ruler. Savoy was the frontier of Italy. All those Italian States, which at no distant period expected to be united to Piedmont, were as deeply interested in the continued possession of Savoy and Nice by Piedmont as was the King of Sardinia himself. It was, indeed, stated that Piacenza was to be given to the King of Sardinia, and they were told much of the strategical importance of that place; but Savoy and Nice are strategically much more important than Piacenza; and, indeed, if the King of Sardinia had the option of having all Tuscany and giving up Savoy and Nice, or of keeping Savoy and Nice without having Tuscany, he would, if he understood his own position, without hesitation keep Savoy and Nice. This was not the occasion on which to enter fully into the subject, but he felt most deeply with regard to it, and he did hope that at no distant period their Lordships would be afforded a regular opportunity of expressing their opinions.

THE MARQUESS OF NORMANBY said, that, agreeing, as had been stated, on both sides, that this discussion should not now be prolonged, he would detain their Lordships by a few words only in reply. He accepted the assurance of his noble Friend (Earl Granville) that no discourtesy was intended on Friday last. The noble Earl was mistaken in thinking he asserted positively that the letter in question was written by Count Walewski. What he did say was, that the letter bore internal evidence that its contents must have been communicated from Count Walewski. He must next condole the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Clanricarde) on the failure of his well-prepared attack. It must have caused the noble Marquess some pains to examine so very carefully into his (the Marquess of Normanby's) despatches in 1848, and try to establish a discrepancy between his present objection and his declaration then, that he thought M. Lamartine deserved all the support which Her Majesty's Government could give. But in saying this he intended to raise no question of the recognition of the Provisional Government; and, therefore, the noble Marquess had fallen into what, in his own country, would be called a blunder, and, in the country which he had been lately visiting, a fiasco. With regard to the reception which Mr. Corbett had attended, it should be remembered that a reception on New Year's-day bore on the Continent a peculiarly official character. The French chargé de affaires, it seemed, wrote to his own Government to ask er he should attend it; and it was stood at Florence that he had a reply negative. It was very unusual that, such circumstances, the British representative should have been present, was still more extraordinary if the Government had not been informed MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE said, the expression he had quoted was not used in any despatches, but in the written by the noble Marquess.

MARQUESS OF NORMANBY said, whether despatch, diary or biography, the noble Friend's object was to establish a inconsistency; and he thought that established to the satisfaction of all, of the noble Marquess, that no such inconsistency had been found to exist.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Tuesday, February 14, 1860.

THE SPANISH DEBT.—QUESTION.

MRS. BURGHLEY said, he wished to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, what is the exact amount that Spain has agreed to repay to this country; whether she has consented to do so voluntarily, or at the request of the late Government?

MRS. JOHN RUSSELL said, that the amount of the debt was £496,385. Application for payment of the debt made in a despatch addressed by the Earl of Malmesbury, dated November 17,

The negotiations had been continuing from that time, and the present Government found them still going on when they came into office. He must say that the Government of Spain had throughout dealt with the greatest fairness and candour with regard to that debt, when it was properly ascertained, according to their view, of what the sum really was. Mr. Buchanan had also pursued the negotiation with the greatest prudence and judgment, and at the end of the last year the Government came to an agreement on the subject, the result of which was the payment of the sum in question.

THE REFORM BILL.—QUESTION.

MR. EDWIN JAMES said, he rose to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, to what period he intends to postpone the introduction of the Bill for Reform of the Representation of the People in Parliament.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, that question was not one for him to take the place in the Bill on which is a day's introduction of it. I am not successful in introducing it on the 5th of March.

WINE AND MEDICINES FOR THE NAVY.—QUESTION.

LORD CLAUD HAMILTON said, he wished to ask the Secretary of State for the Navy, whether the attention of the Admiralty had been directed to the quality of the wine supplied to the Navy for medicinal use, it having been described as being of the best quality for the use of invalids, although it was not of the best quality for medicinal duty. And, also, whether the Admiralty could give any assurance to the House that the wine supplied to the Navy are not adulterated and deleterious.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, that the wine supplied for the use of the Navy was supplied from Apothecaries' Dispensaries, and were of the best of the kind. As regards the wine no complaint had been made from any of the ships. The statement of his right honourable friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that the wine supplied to the Navy had caused some little complaint at the Admiralty, and therefore the Admiralty had made inquiries into the subject.

THE FRENCH ARMY IN NORTHERN ITALY.—QUESTION.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, he would beg leave to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether preparations have not been made for placing the French army in Northern Italy in a state ready for immediate active service, and a Military Intendant and Staff sent to Tuscany to prepare for the arrival of French troops there; and whether such preparations are made with the intention of occupying any part of Central Italy by French troops, in order to "protect the voting" should fresh elections be resorted to, or for any other ostensible object?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, the Government had heard of no preparations for putting the French army in Northern Italy in a state of active preparation, except that the number of men in the cavalry having been described as not being sufficient to take care of the horses, an additional number were sent for the purpose. With regard to a military staff and intendant being sent into Tuscany as reliefs, all he could say was, that he heard constantly from Her Majesty's Minister at Florence, and no rumour of any such arrival had reached him or was mentioned in his despatches, nor were any preparations being made to protect the voting. His answer generally was that no such preparations were in progress as those referred to by the hon. Gentleman.

TREATY OF COMMERCE WITH FRANCE. QUESTION.

MR. EWART said, he rose to ask the President of the Board of Trade, Whether, in the Treaty of Commerce with France, the English or the French is understood to be the correct version of Article 10, "the privileges, favours, or advantages granted to national vessels" being stated in the English version to be granted "generally," while in the French they are stated to be granted "sans exception."

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, he believed it was understood that the French and English versions of Article 10 of the Commercial Treaty with France had exactly the same meaning. The precise words perhaps might not appear to correspond, but the general meaning of the two versions was exactly the same. He begged to assure the hon. Member that neither by the English nor by the French version would the privileges of the free-men of Liverpool, as regarded their exemption from certain local dues, be affected.

LUNATIC POOR IN IRELAND.—QUESTION.

COLONEL GREVILLE said, he wished to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland if it is the intention of the Government to introduce a measure to consolidate and amend the law relating to the Lunatic Poor in Ireland?

MR. CARDWELL said, that a Bill which he had in contemplation on this subject would not be proceeded with, and there was no intention on the part of the Government to bring in any further measure.

THE MADRAS IRRIGATION AND CANAL COMPANY.—QUESTION.

MR. SMOLLETT said, he would beg leave to ask the Secretary of State for India, Whether application has been made on behalf of a London Joint Stock Company, called "The Madras Irrigation and Canal Company," for the guarantee of a minimum interest of 5 per cent per annum, payable from the Indian revenues, upon a capital of two millions sterling, for the purpose of enabling the said company to prosecute certain irrigation schemes in Cuttack and in other districts of Orissa; and whether it is intended to accede to this proposal?

MR. T. G. BARING said, that an application had been addressed to the Secretary of State for India in Council for the guarantee in question, but the application was refused; and, he might add, that it was not the intention of the Secretary of State for India to accede to any such proposal.

THE MAYNOOTH GRANT.

MOTION FOR COMMITTEE.

MR. SPOONER said, he would have most willingly withdrawn from the discussion of a subject which he had so often brought under the notice of the House, but that he had been induced from the first to bring it forward by the thorough conviction that the continuance of the Grant to Maynooth was a national sin, and would at some time or another produce terrible consequences to this country. He retained the opinion that it was a great national sin, and he believed that it was already bringing forth its fruits. No one who read the papers could fail to see that the priests educated at that College had been most mischievous in exciting feelings of disloyalty towards Her Gracious Majesty and hatred to the Protestant Reformed Church. He hoped that he should not have to detain the House long. In fact, he found from the state of his eyes, that it would be impossible for him to do so. He had often experienced the indulgence of the House, but he had never more need of it than on the present occasion.

The education at Maynooth was now producing its fruits, and he would first of all show this by comparing the language held by the Roman Catholic Bishops in 1792, when they were humble suppliants for relief, with that held at a meeting which lately took place in Dublin by Dr. Paul Cullen, who had been unconstitutionally recognized in that fantastical and farcical inquiry called Lord Harrowby's Commission, by the illegal title of the "Delegate Apostolic" in Ireland. In a petition presented to the Irish Parliament in 1792 the Irish Bishops held this language:—

"We solemnly and conscientiously declare that we are satisfied with the present state of ecclesiastical polity; we acquiesce in the establishment of the National Church; we neither repine at its possessions nor its dignities, and we are ready on this point to give every satisfaction in our power."

In another petition, 1808, they said—

"Your petitioners most solemnly declare that they do not seek in any way to encroach upon the rights, privileges, possessions, or revenue appertaining to the Bishops and Clergy of the Protestant Church."

Contrast this with the language held by Dr. Cullen at a meeting in Dublin not long ago, which was received with "loud cheers."

"No country," said he, "presents such a nuisance as the Church establishment in Ireland, with its mitred dignitaries, its universities, schools, and its enormous wealth derived from the confiscation of the property of our ancestors—a nuisance which, if it existed in any other country, would be daily denounced by all shades of the British press."

These were the abominable opinions which the British people were compelled to pay for teaching. The next point which he wished to submit to the House was a declaration of Dr. Moriarty, President of Allhallows, Drumcondra, who was one of the witnesses before the late Commission, on the subject of the oath of allegiance. He had often made a charge against Maynooth that the doctrine was taught there that oaths must be dealt with in an equivocal way; that there was no sin in swearing one thing and meaning another. The quotations which he had given to prove that had never been refuted or denied; and he now made this charge, that doctrines were taught there completely subversive of the oath of allegiance. In his examination Dr. Moriarty was asked, "Are there no circumstances under which the Pope could release subjects from their oath of allegiance?" His answer was boldly, "Most emphatically I say none;" and then came his Jesuitical "but," which was this,—"but there are certain cases where the allegiance of subjects ceases, and where the Government of the country may be justly overthrown, and I consider the Pope is the best and fittest authority to decide in many cases whether such circumstances have arisen." The power of the Pope was represented as merely declaratory, and not involving the allegiance of the subject. In answer, however, to the next question, whether the Pope would not thus have removed the obligation from the conscience, the answer given was, "he could declare it removed." He confessed that, not being himself a Jesuit, and not having received his education in a Jesuit's College, he was unable to realize the distinction. The examination proceeded:—"But the declaration of the Pope would have the effect, would it not, of removing the obligation from the conscience?" "No," was the reply; "he merely decides and declares that it is removed." He was then asked, "With whom does the responsibility rest? Is it [the responsibility of disobeying] removed from the party by virtue of the opinion expressed by the superior authority?" Answer—"Were we to consult the Holy See upon our allegiance or obedience to our temporal Sovereign, and that an answer were given us, it ought to satisfy the consciences of Catholics, considering that we know it to be an authority divinely appointed and divinely assisted for our guidance in the way of salvation, and consequently in the path of duty." Was the State to continue a system of instruction which not only declared persons to be absolved by the Pope from their oath of allegiance, but entered into the reasons for that release? Such a course he held to be a violation of the coronation oath taken by the Sovereign, and opposed to the Articles of the Church, to which many who heard him had expressly declared their assent. If the case rested there, it ought to be strong enough to prevent any Government or house of representatives from daring to tax the people for the maintenance of such an Institution. But he went further, and charged those connected with the College of Maynooth with teaching doctrines completely subversive of the allegiance due to the Throne, and dangerous to the Constitution by the Divine blessing established in these realms. At a public assembly held in Dublin on the 9th of November last (the same above referred to), the Pope's delegate, Dr. Cullen, had thus expressed himself:—

“Again, when, to gratify the ambitious views of a Dutch Prince, the daughter of a weak and unfortunate Monarch, forgetful of the ties of gratitude and kindred, banished her father (James II.) from his hereditary dominions, did not the Catholics of Ireland resist the torrent of Dutch Calvinists, and French Huguenots, and Scotch Covenanters, and English Evangelicals let loose upon them; and, though they were weak and unfriended, did they not defend with valour and energy the cause of Royalty and their King?”

Was not this a gross insult levelled at the present dynasty? At the same meeting a gentleman named Reynolds, formerly a member of that House, incidentally mentioned the name of the Queen, which was hissed from one end of the room to the other, while a reference to the Pope was hailed with three cheers. These were not trivial ebullitions of the moment, but were evidences of a deep-seated feeling, which only required opportunity to become dangerous. There was one particular doctrine of the Roman Catholic Church, for the inculcation of which, among others, this £30,000 was paid—namely, that all who were baptized, whether by Protestant Ministers or by Protestant laymen, became, by the fact itself, members of the Roman Catholic Church, and subjects of the Pope, to whom they owed allegiance. It was true that Protestants might renounce the benefits to which they thus became entitled, but by so doing they rendered themselves heretics, and liable in the eye of the Church to punishment, even to the extent of death. As long as Roman Catholics were weak it was vain for them to hope for the infliction of these penalties; but if ever power once more fell into their hands, those who had heretically refused communion with their Church would become the legitimate objects of their attack. That these doctrines did exist and were entertained he had proved by quotations in former addresses to the House. He implored hon. Members not to treat the matter lightly, for it was not to be supposed that sins such as he had described could be suffered to go on with impunity. Where were the Ministers of the Crown—where was the Attorney General for Ireland—that they had taken no move in the matter? In former days similar attacks against the honour and dignity of the Crown would not have been suffered, but would have led to legal prosecutions, and, if necessary, the Representatives of the people would have addressed the Queen to instruct her Ministers to cause the Law Officers to defend the religion which they had sworn to uphold. The Throne and the religion of the State in these days, however, were no longer assailed by attacks slyly insinuated, but by aggressions boldly and impudently avowed. A remarkable article had recently appeared in the great leading organ of the press, which had never yet been found supporting what could in any way be termed bigoted opinions, (and had constantly charged him (Mr. Spooner) with bigotry, while it gave him credit for honesty); and he trusted that the document to which he referred would have its full weight with the House and with the public. What said this great organ of opinion now? It said—

“It is only due to the memory of men who underwent much obloquy for the time, and were even treated with a peculiar and galling kind of contempt not usual in English political warfare, to ask ourselves, after an experience of just thirty years, which side was in the right? Have the results been in accordance with the sanguine anticipations of Canning, of Mackintosh, of Grey, and of Brougham, or has the measure turned out as was predicted by Lord Eldon, ‘that hater of all that was liberal and pleasant,’ and by Lord Winchelsea, at whose tirades we have all laughed so heartily? There is, unhappily, no doubt about it; the genius, the liberality, and the eloquence were wrong; the narrowness, the bigotry, and the prejudice were right. Ever since the day of deliverance the conduct of the Roman Catholics has more and more confirmed the predictions of their enemies, more and more disappointed the anticipations of their friends. . . . It would be childish to deny that we have raised up among ourselves a party which is neither Liberal nor Conservative, neither English nor Irish, which holds its allegiance to a foreign Power paramount to its allegiance to its domestic Sovereign. . . . Where but in a Roman Catholic meeting, presided over by a Bishop, and harangued by Deans and Canons, could the name of the Queen be received with a burst of disapprobation which rendered the speaker inaudible from the very voices which yelled out a determination to fight for the Pope? From whom but a Roman Catholic Bishop could one hear it laid down that it was the duty of a constituency in these islands to exercise their influence on their representatives to induce the Government to put down a rebellion in a foreign State; and only because that tyrannical Sovereign was the head of their Church, and they had therefore a vested interest in perpetuating his tyranny and corruption? There is no divided allegiance, as was apprehended. The allegiance is wholly

MR. BAINES seconded the Motion. He regretted that, from a miscalculation as to the time the division on the preceding Motion was likely to last, he had lost the opportunity of presenting three petitions in favour of the Motion from the town of Cambridge—two from members of Dissenting congregations—complaining of the statutes of the University requiring the attendance of students twice at chapel on a Sunday, thereby preventing them from attending their own places of worship; also of the statutes of St. John's College excluding Dissenters from fellowships, while they were threatened to be excluded from fellowships in Trinity College. The statutes alluded to in the Motion of the hon. Member for Westmeath seemed to him to be a retrograde step in the march of enlightened and liberal legislation. Parliament had admitted Dissenters of every name to seats in that House, to the bench of justice, to municipal corporations, and the Act of 1856 was expressly intended to admit Dissenters to the University of Cambridge. They were admitted to take degrees, but excluded from those fair rewards of learning and merit to which others, being Churchmen, were admitted. If the position of a fellow was one which gave ecclesiastical power, or function, or office in the University in which education for ecclesiastical purposes was distinctly intended, he should not seek that it should be enjoyed by Dissenters; but he did ask that Dissenters might be permitted to enjoy those fellowships which were left in ancient times as a reward of learning and merit, and which were not connected with any ecclesiastical function or office. He need scarcely remind the House that the Dissenters who were excluded by these statutes, taking the population of the United Kingdom, constituted the larger part of the nation. It was not for the benefit of Cambridge or of the country that so large a part of the population should be excluded from the attainment of the honours and emoluments of learning and merit; it was only for the benefit of the religious sect exercising it that this monopoly was established and sought to be maintained. The restrictions and disqualifications to which he had referred were in the nature of pains and penalties for holding a certain religious belief. He thought the day had gone by when pains and penalties for religious belief could be enacted or continued in this country; yet it was proposed that a new test should be established by two of our principal colleges, which would inflict pains and penalties on the larger part of the people of England. It ought to be known that the declaration originally required from the fellows of St. John's was not that they were members of the Church of England; it was this,—that they would embrace from their heart the true religion of Christ, follow the authority of Christ before that of man, and seek from it their rule of life. Here there was nothing whatever in favour either of one or another body of Christians; but from the time of James I. it had been impossible for Dissenters to take degrees at the University until 1856; and it was by being excluded from degrees that they were shut out from the honours and emoluments which were the rewards of distinction; but, surely, when an Act of Parliament passed to remove the former of these disqualifications, it ought to remove the latter too. If Dissenters were allowed to compete for wranglers, and obtained high positions, as some of them had done, in the Tripos, surely they ought afterwards to be allowed to compete for those emoluments which were one of the inducements to enter the University. He trusted the spirit of that House would be altogether adverse to that retrograde step it was now sought to take, and that, acting on the principles of liberal legislation, which especially on the subject of education had recently prevailed, they would accede to the Motion. By so doing they would remove one more cause of irritation between Dissenters and Churchmen, and break down one more barrier in the way of that unity and cordiality of feeling which ought to exist between all classes of Her Majesty's subjects. In that hope he seconded the Motion.

“That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that She will be graciously pleased to withhold Her consent from certain portions of the Statutes of Trinity and St. John's Colleges, Cambridge, now before Parliament, relating to the compulsory ordination of the College Master, the compulsory celibacy of the Senior Fellows, the removal of Fellows who may have openly seceded from the Church of England, the filling up of the vacant places in the Seniority by the Master and the remaining Seniors, and the delegating to the Master and Seniors exclusively all rules respecting the attendance of the Undergraduates who are not members of the Church of England at the College Chapel; and that Her Majesty will be graciously pleased to give such directions as to Her may seem fit, to refer the above-mentioned Statutes to the Cambridge University Commissioners.

LORD STANLEY said, that as he was the only one of the Commissioners appointed under the Act of 1856 for the University of Cambridge who had the honour of a seat in that House, it might be desirable that he should give a brief explanation on the points referred to in the present Motion. Neither the Colleges nor the members of the Commission had any reason to complain of the manner in which the subject had been brought before the House. If discontent existed in the minds of any class of the community in consequence of what had been done, or if a misunderstanding prevailed, as appeared from the speeches of the hon. Mover and Seconder to be the case, it was expedient that it should, if possible, be removed, and that the House should judge whether any cause of complaint existed or no. With regard to the most important point touched upon by those hon. Gentlemen, namely, the exclusion from fellowships in Trinity and St. John's Colleges of persons who were not members of the Church of England, it was not necessary to vindicate the conduct of the Commissioners, for the plain reason that the matter was one in which they whose duties were defined by the Act of 1856 had no legal power or jurisdiction whatever. That Act removed all disabilities upon persons obtaining degrees; it opened scholarships and exhibitions, and enabled undergraduates to enjoy emoluments without any profession of religious opinion; but it did not repeal that part of the Act of Uniformity, by which all persons taking fellowships were required to belong to the Church of England. If the hon. Member wished to raise the question of opening the fellowships to Dissenters—which he (Lord Stanley) would hardly advise him to do—he should therefore introduce a Bill into that House for the purpose. Parliament had imposed the restriction, and Parliament alone could remove it. With regard to the removal of Fellows who might have seceded from the Established Church, the House would probably think that Parliament having expressly confined the fellowships, wisely or unwisely, to members of the Church of England, it was necessary that the College Statutes should provide some means of declaring that, when a Fellow had ceased to fulfil the condition on which his appointment rested, the appointment itself should determine.

The mode of procedure pointed out by the new statutes was less likely to lead to arbitrary removal than that which previously existed, because he imagined that formerly any Fellow taking a step implying secession from the Church of England might have been proceeded against for heresy, and on that ground deprived. If the present tenure of the office, as dependent on church-membership, was to continue—and the Commissioners certainly had no power to alter it—it seemed desirable that the law should be enforced in the mildest manner possible, and not be liable to be abused for purposes of intolerance. Accordingly, under the new statutes the loss of his fellowship was made to depend entirely on the voluntary and deliberate act of the person seceding from the Established Church. It was, as far as it went, a relaxation of the existing rule. With respect to the other points touched upon by the hon. Member, it should be remembered that the Cambridge Commissioners were not invested with absolute or unlimited authority to make statutes either for the University or for the colleges. He, for one, did not complain of that, he did not wish that larger powers should have been granted, but it should be borne in mind when considering the statutes as finally passed, that they did not embody the unmodified views and wishes of the Commissioners, but were the result of negotiations with the governing bodies of the various colleges, ending, as such negotiation almost invariably did, in a compromise by which many reforms were carried and some abandoned. The Act constituting the Cambridge Commission provided that no statute should have the force of law unless it had the assent of two-thirds of the governing body of the college which it affected. In those governing bodies the ecclesiastical element was predominant; and considerable disinclination was evinced by them to accept changes that appeared to them to wear the form of innovations, especially when pressed upon them by external authority. His own individual opinion was, that the college master should not necessarily be in holy orders, but that it should be left optional with those who elected him to choose a layman or a clergyman. Indeed, that was the view put forward by the Commissioners in the Minute of July 1857, with which they opened their negotiations with the various Colleges; and the same principle was repeated in the draught of the statutes

Was all this to go on, or would they do something to stop it? He had always said that the fruits of Maynooth teaching would one day be seen; were they not now visible? Yet did not the members of the Government consult the Popish party in all they did? And those he generally acted with did so a great deal too much. Both parties tried too much to reconcile those who would never be reconciled, but who would go with both parties just as far as would serve their purpose, and enable them to carry out their disloyal and rebellious opinions. (Hear, and No). Let those who cried "No" contradict the facts he had stated. Let them prove that these meetings had never been held, that such speeches had never been made. He challenged denial of what he had stated. He had differed from Lord Eldon on the question of emancipation, for, judging from what he saw of the conduct of Roman Catholic gentlemen at that time, he did not fear admitting them into Parliament, and what assistance he could render them out of the House he gave them. But it was done in ignorance of that priestly domination in which another generation had been nursed up, and the doctrines subversive of everything loyal that had been taught from Maynooth to the deluded Papists of Ireland; those doctrines would on any opportunity lead them to unite themselves to any enemy who might attempt to change the succession, and go back to the line of that poor Prince who was so shamefully used, as the Pope's delegate had said, by his own child. It was an extraordinary fact that there had been a change in the books used at Maynooth. Bailey's "Moral Theology" was formerly used, which taught, on the validity of marriage, that the rite was good and binding though not celebrated by a Roman Catholic priest. Bailey's work was now superseded by Scavigni's, with the approval of the Pope. Scavigni's work taught that no marriage was valid unless celebrated by priests of the Roman Church. By this teaching the Queen of these realms was only nominally married, and consequently the issue of that marriage were illegitimate. Were they prepared to give such doctrines all the authority of the House by voting a grant to teach them? There was a descendant of the Stuarts still existing, who, but for the Act of Settlement and the Protestant oath now required, would undoubtedly be the heir to the throne of England. If they permitted it to be taught that the children of the English Sovereign were illegitimate, and any persons should attempt to act on that belief, could they be prosecuted as traitors and rebels, would not such persons turn round and say, "You taught it, you paid for the books from which we learned it." They were standing in a most dangerous position. Their duty was to defend their Queen's rights, privileges, honour, character, and dignity, and yet they were paying money to those priests who taught their flocks that Her Majesty was not their rightful Sovereign, and that her children were illegitimate. He felt that he had already trespassed too much on the attention of the House, but he had one or two more observations to make. He wished for many reasons that the Chancellor of the Exchequer was in his place. What were the opinions of his right hon. Friend on this subject? He knew the opinions of his right hon. Friend had been changed, but they had made too deep an impression on his (Mr. Spooner's) mind for him to change them; they remained there unshaken and immovable. The worst thing he would wish for his right hon. Friend was, that he should come back to his old opinions, and stand forth as the powerful defender of the rights of the Protestant Church. What did his right hon. Friend say on the subject in his well-known book—The State in its Relations with the Church. There was this remarkable paragraph in that book—

"The support of the College of Maynooth was originally undertaken by the Protestant Parliament of Ireland in the anticipation—which has since proved miserably fallacious—that a more loyal class of priests would be produced by a home education than by a foreign one, and that a gradual mitigation in the features of Irish Romanism would be produced when her Ministers were no longer familiarized with its condition in Continental countries where Romanism is the religion of the State. . . . Instead of which it has been found that the facility for education at home has opened the priesthood to a lower and less cultivated class, and one more liable to the influence of secondary motives. It can hardly be denied that this is a well-merited disappointment."

As to the grant—

"In principle it is wholly vicious, and it will be a thorn in the side of the State of these countries so long as it is continued. When foreigners express their astonishment at finding that we support in Ireland the Church of a minority, we may tell them that we support it on the high ground of conscientious necessity for its truth, but how should we blush, at the same time, to support an institution—Maynooth—whose avowed and legitimate purpose it is constantly to denounce that truth as falsehood.

If, indeed, our faith be pledged to the College, by all means let us acquit ourselves of the obligation; but it is monstrous that we should be the voluntary feeders of an establishment which exhibits at once our parsimony, lax principles, and erroneous calculations."

These were the sentiments of his right hon. and much respected Friend—not declared in the heat of debate in a hasty speech, without due consideration and reflection—but deliberately published to the world with the sanction of his high name. As to the alleged compact, how did it stand? When was it made? Certainly not at the Union—it never formed any part of that treaty; but even were it so (which is clear it was not), it has long since ceased; for all the grants to the charitable and public institutions, made by the treaty, were only to last for twenty years. Certainly it was not made by that House. The vote for the support of the College was granted annually in the estimates, and might be withheld at any time. It was actually withheld in one year when Mr. Perceval was Minister. It frequently varied in amount. The present arrangements had been made by Sir Robert Peel without any consideration; who held that we were perfectly free to repeal it at any time, if we found it did not answer the intended purpose, and if the message of peace was not received in a spirit of peace—those were his (Sir R. Peel's) words. Exactly the same view was held by the noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs when the question of compact was discussed. Compact there was none. Parliament freely gave, and Parliament could take away. The plea on which it was given by Sir Robert Peel was that it would prove a message of peace to Ireland, and promote the feeling of loyalty among the Roman Catholic priests in that country. Had this expectation been realized? Did they not know that juries were frequently so much under the influence of the priests as to give verdicts contrary to the direction of the Judges on points of law, and contrary to the clearest demonstration of fact, their conduct amounting, in truth, to an utter perversion of justice? There was another question he had already hinted at, and to which he wished more fully to refer—

he meant the conduct of Parliament in regard to the Coronation Oath. What did they require when the Sovereign of this country was crowned? He called the attention of hon. Members to the words of that solemn oath which Her Majesty took in ratification of the sacred compact between Her and Her people in presence of Almighty God. [The hon. Gentleman here read the words of the oath from the printed form.] After administering that oath how could they require Her consent to a grant to Roman Catholic priests who taught that the very truths She swore to maintain were but falsehoods? It was not likely that he should have an opportunity of again addressing the House on this subject, but he could not leave them without once more expressing his earnest opinion that by supporting Maynooth they were committing a great national sin; and they might rest assured that although individuals were punished for their sins in another life, nations were always punished in the present world, and punished by the subversion of their rights and privileges. God forbid that it should be so with this country! but they had been too long going on in their present sinful course, and he called on them as they professed to be Christians—both those belonging to the Established Church and Nonconformists—to use their endeavours to put down this monstrous system. Those who claim to be the friends of civil and religious liberty should remember that wherever Roman Catholicism was predominant its clergy were hostile to that principle, and strove to gain the ascendancy over the civil power. Oh, that he could convince the House of the sin and danger of continuing this system! He took, perhaps, a stronger view of this subject now that he approached so near to the natural term of human life. All he could say was, that if the House persisted in its present course, the guilt would not be his. He would be wholly unworthy of the honourable position in which a large constituency had placed him if he did not manfully declare that we were now committing a great national sin, and if he did not implore the House to cast aside party feeling, and give to this question its calmest and most solemn consideration. He was reminded by the results of this ungodly and impolitic measure of a place in Holy Writ where it is said, "They hatch cockatrice eggs and weave the spider's web." That House by its grants supplied the eggs, the Maynooth professors hatched them, and Ireland was overrun with spiritual serpents. Meanwhile the wily Jesuits had been secretly weaving the spider's web in which many hon. Members had been caught already; and he would warn them that they would find that web too strong to allow of their escape. Before concluding, he wished to call the attention of the noble Lord at the head of the Government to an Irish weekly newspaper called The Irishman, the chief writer in which was said to be a Mr. Mitchell, a pardoned rebel, who spurned his pardon, and who was now living in Paris. The law officers of the Crown ought to be instructed to watch the articles appearing from time to time in that paper, the tendency of which was of a most subversive and insidious character. Under the pretence of the defence of Ireland there was a series of strategic articles, evidently the work of a military hand and meant for a revolutionary purpose. One clause in his present Resolution was intended to preserve vested rights.—[Divide.] He hoped he had not trespassed long on the time of the House, and he had guarded himself against saying anything that could give personal offence to any hon. Member. There was no compact which bound Parliament in this matter; but, young men having been induced to enter this College in the expectation that certain privileges would be continued to them, it would not be fair to turn them adrift until their education was finished. These, then, were his views, feebly and most imperfectly expressed. He only wished that some of the eloquent Gentlemen beside him had consented to take up this question. But he felt himself actuated by honest motives, and by a conscientious desire, if possible, to be of some use in his generation in supporting that blessed Constitution under which we still had the happiness to live, but the security of which was endangered by the principles which the Jesuits of the Roman Catholic Church upheld and taught. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving that the House should resolve itself into a Committee to consider the Acts for the Endowment of the College of Maynooth, with a view to the withdrawal of any endowment out of the Consolidated Fund, due regard being had to vested rights and interests.

MR. RICHARD LONG said, that in rising to second the Motion, he followed one who, through a long political life, had distinguished himself by his perfect consistency, and who, whatever the depth of his political or religious convictions, had always endeavoured to express himself with temper and moderation. The grounds upon which he based his own opposition to the grant were very simple. In stating those grounds, he hoped he should avoid saying anything that could be personally offensive to any hon. Member. He held, that according to the theory of our Constitution, there was but one Church established within the realms of England and Ireland, and that was the United Church of England and Ireland. He, therefore, did not consider it was the duty of the State to hold out pecuniary assistance to any body of Nonconformists; and he could not distinguish the Roman Catholics from any other body of Nonconformists. Although he was opposed to the continuance of the Maynooth Grant, he by no means wished that it should be put an end to without giving an adequate compensation to vested interests. His hon. Friend, by the terms of his Motion, had shown a much more forbearing spirit than the Protestant Dissenters, who, on a recent occasion, displayed a desire to deprive the Established Church of her rights without any compensation. He should probably be told that in taking his present course he was alienating from him and his friends the support of the Roman Catholic Members, who were the natural allies of the Conservative party. Now he (Mr. Long) could not think so meanly of the motives of the Roman Catholic Members of that House, as to suppose that on a question of this kind, involving a point of conscience, those hon. Members would take offence at a firm but temperate refusal to support their Church from funds contributed by Protestant ratepayers, or that they would on that account refrain on other occasions from acting in harmony with the party with whose views their own really coincided. He would remind those hon. Gentlemen that it was not to the Liberals, as the party opposite were commonly called, they were indebted for the endowments granted to the Roman Catholic chaplains of the army and the navy. He was not saying whether that measure was right or wrong; but if it was right, it was strange that a Liberal Government, which had had a prolonged tenure of power, had not found time to adopt it. When in 1850 the Pope thought fit to revive his ancient jurisdiction in this realm, and sent over a Cardinal Archbishop of Westminster, what was the conduct of the Liberal Government, and the then chief of the Liberal party? He remembered seeing about that time a caricature in a well-known humorous periodical, in which there appeared the figure of a certain noble Lord opposite, in the shape of a little boy, who, after chalking upon the walls of Durham the words "No Popery," was seen running away in terror of what he had done. He could not help reminding Roman Catholic Members of the conduct of noble Lords and right hon. Gentlemen on the Liberal side of the House. One of the former, some years ago, published a memorable letter on the subject of the assumption of ecclesiastical titles. To that letter he need not more particularly refer; for every hon. Gentleman in the House no doubt knew of its contents. The conduct of the leaders of the Liberal party in respect of Roman Catholic affairs, was such that in the remarks which he was making in support of a Motion for the repeal of the Maynooth Grant, he did not think he ran any risk of alienating the support of Roman Catholic Members from the Conservative party. It could not be possible that Roman Catholic Members found in the present occupants of the Treasury bench exponents of their opinions, or that they could expect to find in them sincere upholders of the Maynooth Grant. He would wish to allude briefly to the state of the Roman Catholic Church in this country; and in so doing, he should refer to an extract from a work of the Count de Montalembert. In the passage to which he would refer, the Count observed, that when the last of the Stuarts attempted to recover the throne of his fathers, the Roman Catholics in this country were a miserable few, but that at the present time, wherever the flag of England floated, it sheltered Roman Catholic colleges, schools, churches, and other institutions. In another passage the same writer, referring to the British empire, said that churches, houses of education, and monasteries, for the Roman Catholics, were being founded with a facility and a liberty which not only had never been surpassed, but had never been equalled in any other country, Roman Catholic or Protestant; and he further remarked, that in Ireland, under the operation of the Incumbered Estates Act, large properties had passed out of the hands of Protestant proprietors into those of Roman Catholics. If, then, the Roman Catholic Church in these realms was so rich, prosperous, and powerful, its followers must be perfectly well able to give up the miserable grant of £36,000 per year, which was doled out to them by an unwilling Parliament, and was paid by Protestant ratepayers. He would ask the Roman Catholic Members would it not be better, for peace' sake, to accept such terms as were offered—a fair compensation for vested rights and interests. It was the conduct of Sir R. Peel in 1845, in preparing the ignis fatuus of expediency to principle, in reference to this grant, that had alienated from him a party perhaps the strongest and most compact that had ever existed in that House. He would on the present occasion appeal to the Conservative party to hold by their principles. They could not consistently endow error. They must choose between England and the Church of Rome. If England was right, Rome must be wrong. This was the ground on which he appealed for Conservative support for the Motion of his hon. Friend; and hoping that a large majority would confirm the views of the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Spooner), he had much pleasure in seconding the proposition then before the House.

"That this House do resolve itself into a Committee, to consider the Acts for the Endowment of the College of Maynooth, with a view to the withdrawal of any Endowment out of the Consolidated Fund, due regard being had to vested rights and interests."

MR. P. O'BRIEN said, he did not intend to occupy the House at any length on a subject which must be almost, if not entirely, exhausted. He did not think the House of Commons ought to be converted into a religious conventicle, and therefore he would regard the matter, not from a religious, but from a political point of view. If the Regium Donum were to be withdrawn, and the Church establishment in Ireland abolished, then he would not advocate the Maynooth Grant; but when other bodies received State allowances, the Roman Catholics, bearing their share in the burdens of taxation, had a right to demand a share of the Government grants. No case had been made out for depriving the Roman Catholic Church of a grant which it had hitherto received; and he confessed he never heard this Motion brought on without recalling O'Connell's saying that the most dangerous enemy to religion that ever existed was a pious fool.

MR. HENNESSY said, he must take leave to deny that there was any foundation for the charge of disloyalty brought against the Roman Catholic bishops in Ireland by the hon. Member for Warwickshire (Mr. Spooner). At a great meeting in the County of Tipperary, the Archbishop of Cashel said:—"We know how to preserve inviolate allegiance to the Queen, our only legitimate Sovereign." At a meeting in the North of Ireland, the Roman Catholic Archbishop of Armagh, Primate of all Ireland, said:—"Our Gracious Majesty, whom may God long preserve, has no more loyal subjects than we are." The Irish bishops uniformly spoke in the same tone, and their expressions of loyal devotion were received with loud applause. The hon. Member for Chippenham (Mr. Long) had not used a single argument which might not have come from the other side of the House with more propriety. The hon. Member had appealed to the Dissenters and Nonconformists to support the Motion. He wished to bear witness to the consistency of the Nonconformists and Dissenters on this question, but he could repose no confidence in the highly inconsistent course of the hon. Member for Chippenham. If, indeed, church rates, tithes, and the Regium Donum were given up, then the Catholics would give up Maynooth; but, so long as they were burdened with the expense of those establishments, they thought it would be an act of injustice—of one-sided and partial injustice—to refuse this paltry, miserable grant to Maynooth.

MR. CARDWELL said, it was the obvious wish of the House to go to a division. He would only say a few words, out of respect to the hon. Member for North Warwickshire, and in consequence of the interest which the question excited in Ireland. He wished to call attention to the importance of closing the subject by a decisive vote to-night. The hon. Gentleman opened the case upon the principle that a continuance of the grant would be doing injury to the Established Church, and sapping the foundations of allegiance to the Sovereign, and he pushed his argument so far as to indicate that this was only the beginning of a series of measures which would end in the repeal of Catholic emancipation. The seconder of the Motion founded his opposition to the grant on arguments—which as the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Walpole) then Home Secretary, had judiciously pointed out on the last occasion this subject was brought forward, would lead to the withdrawal of the educational grant from the Roman Catholic body. In a former Parliament it was determined by general consent not to enter upon arguments when almost every quotation upon the subject had been exhausted, but at once to express their opinion by the legitimate process of a decided vote. He thought the new Parliament would show their prudence if they closed a discussion which produced such irrelevant topics and excited such angry feelings. By expressing a decided opinion, he trusted the House would declare that the arrangement so long made with regard to Maynooth was not to be determined, and that they were not disposed, by countenancing Motions calculated to excite religious animosities, to take the first step in unsettling the religious institutions of the country.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he rose to warn the House against being induced, by the dictum of a Minister, to close, without due consideration, the discussion of so important a matter as that which they had now before them. If they did they would soon lapse into the condition of the French Chambers. The hon. Member for the King's County (Mr. P. O'Brien) was so courteous as to apply the term pious fool to his hon. Colleague in the representation of North Warwickshire. If the hon. Member's observation had any force in it, there must be a goodly company of fools in that assembly, for repeated votes of that House had declared their wish that this grant should terminate, not by an arbitrary and unjust Act of Parliament, but by an arrangement granting to those who enjoyed salaries under the Act of 1845, adequate compensation for their offices, and by those decisions the House had only expressed the opinions of the country. It was not, indeed, difficult to understand that there should be in this country a strong desire for the termination of this grant; for if they looked over the world they found at this moment, in almost every part of it, a universal repudiation of those Ultramontane doctrines which were inculcated at Maynooth by professors paid by this Protestant State. France, Italy, Sardinia, Spain, and Russia all united in condemning them. According to the hon. Member for King's County (Mr. Hennessy), nothing could be more loyal than the conduct of the Roman Catholic archbishops and bishops in Ireland. But there was a policy in that loyalty. He had not forgotten that in August last the leading journal, which reflected the opinions of that school of

Roman Catholics, and circulated them more widely than he could wish—that at that time, when it was supposed that the Emperor of the French was the servant of Rome, The Tablet declared that no act could make His Majesty so popular and secure him such universal support in Europe as the invasion of England, and added that during such an operation he would be secured against any attacks by secret societies in France. What, he (Mr. Newdegate) should like to be told, did the conductors of The Tablet know of the operations of these secret societies that they thus confidently predicted their forbearance. At that time, he (Mr. Newdegate) did not observe any such loyal expression on the part of Dr. Cullen and the other Roman Catholic bishops in Ireland, as those for which the hon. Member for the King's County wished them to have credit; but he had noticed that whenever they were at public dinners they gave the toast of "The Pope" precedence of that of "The Queen," and thus offered a deliberate insult to the Majesty of this country. Now that they had discovered that the Emperor of the French would not act as the mere servant of the See of Rome, and had expressed his determination not to restore the temporal power of the Pope—which had been so badly used—there were abundant expressions of loyalty on the part of these archbishops and bishops towards Her Majesty. His comment on this fact was, where was this loyalty when it might have been expressed in disavowal of the disloyal expressions of the Ultramontane paper at a time when there was a prospect of an immediate rupture between France and England. At that time there was apparently a silent acquiescence in the disloyalty of their organ on the part of these Roman Prelates. The hon. Member opposite (Mr. P. O'Brien) had quoted an observation made by Mr. O'Connell. He (Mr. Newdegate) would take the liberty of quoting some remarks from the same authority in reference to this very grant to Maynooth. He (Mr. O'Connell) was in Ireland when the grant was sanctioned by that House in pursuance of the proposal of Sir R. Peel; and he expressed his gratitude to England in these words:—

"I would not, I confess, go this length, when I came into this room to-day, for I had a little inkling that there was some trick under all this liberality; but my friend Dr. Gray brought me the Act of Parliament, and I read it in my seat here, and I proclaim it excellent in all its parts.

[Cheers.] . . . But is this to make us give up agitation? [Cries of 'No, we will die first,' and cheers.] I do not mean to quarrel with any one who differs in opinion from me on any subject; still less am I inclined to quarrel with any one who thinks with me, that it was the repeal agitation that produced this change in Sir Robert Peel with reference to Maynooth. [Cheers.] Agitation, I thank you. [Cheers.] Conciliation Hall, I am obliged to you. [Cheers.] Repeal Association, Maynooth ought to pray for you. [Loud cheering.] There is a story told of the officers of the Irish Brigade: as long as a young man who came into the French army as a cadet conducted himself well, he was left a cadet, so they always found it necessary to become a little riotous to get promoted to the rank of officer. [Laughter.] We, in Conciliation Hall, represent the officer. The Irish cadets understand the policy of misconducting themselves. This is a boon to us to misbehave in future, and we are too honest not to give them the price for their money. [Cheers and laughter.] . . . When they tell us that we should thank Sir Robert Peel and the two hundred myrmidons that go with him from one side of the House to the other, I say, thank Conciliation Hall! thank agitation! [Cheers.]

Take the history of the grant from the first. The first grant was made by the Parliament of Ireland in 1795, and in 1798 there was a rebellion in Ireland. The existing Act of Parliament was passed in 1845, and in 1846 a Coercion Act was necessary to save life and property in Ireland. Had Ireland been peaceful since? Had not the fruits of that grant been the dissemination of principles among the Irish people which were not necessary to the Roman Catholic religion, but were intended and were used for the purpose of establishing and extending the temporal power of the See and Court of Rome? It was not for the interest of the Roman Catholic laity that the Government should authorize the dissemination among the priesthood of Ireland of Ultramontane opinions, for those opinions would neutralize the efforts of the laity, who might be disposed to lead the people of Ireland to peaceful pursuits and habits. An inquiry had been instituted in 1826, and it was then proved that Dr. Kenney, then Vice President of Maynooth, was a Jesuit, and had, four years before, founded a Jesuit college in the immediate neighbourhood of Maynooth. The character of the teaching at Maynooth had verged towards the Ultramontane doctrines, until at last all other teaching had been superseded by the doctrines of Liguori, as had been proved before the Commission of 1851. It should not be forgotten that when the grant of £30,000 had been made to Maynooth to improve the accommodation and increase the comforts of the students it was spent in increasing the number of the rooms by one-half, so that half as many more boys could be admitted, notwithstanding the express provision of the Act of 1845, that no more than 520 students should be admitted, while the building itself was left in that state of discomfort which it had been the object of the grant to remove. In fact, no instance existed in which the authorities at Maynooth had not acted in a spirit of defiance; they were continually disseminating Ultramontane doctrines, which were admitted even by the Catholics themselves to be subversive of all order and peaceful principles. He trusted that the House would act in conformity with the prevalent opinions of Catholic as well as Protestant Europe, and put an end to the scandal of a Protestant State finding means for the dissemination of Ultramontane opinions.

MR. HADFIELD was understood to say that the reason why he and others on his side of the House voted in favour of the Motion was because they objected to all grants for religious purposes. He could not, however, help expressing his amazement at the inconsistency of hon. Gentlemen opposite, who were so anxious to get rid of this grant, though at the same time they were straining every nerve to retain church rates.

MR. SPOONER said, he would just make one or two observations in reply, and seeing the anxiety hon. Members exhibited for a division, he would not detain them many minutes. He begged the hon. Member for King's County (Mr. O'Brien) to understand that if upon reaching his home, and, as a gentleman, reflecting upon the observations he had made that evening, he found he could forgive himself for having uttered them, then might he feel assured of his (Mr. Spooner's) forgiveness. The right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Cardwell) had made a very characteristic, and, considering the circumstances, appropriate speech upon the subject of his (Mr. Spooner's) Motion. It was short, because he (Mr. Cardwell) felt that the more the subject was considered the more it would damage his favourite grant. It was wise, therefore, for him to retire, leaving his own opinions regarding the matter in mystery, and his (Mr. Spooner's) views unanswered. He (Mr. Spooner) could not concur in what had been stated, that the Roman Catholics were the natural allies of the Conservatives.

Mr. Newdegate

For his part, whichever party strove most to conciliate them by unconstitutional and anti-Protestant concessions, would receive from him the least confiding support.

MR. P. O'BRIEN said, he could assure the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Spooner) that when he had used the playful expression complained of, it was very far from his intention to be personally offensive to the hon. Member for North Warwickshire. He used it only generically, as applied to a class; and if he had offended the hon. Member for North Warwickshire in any possible way, he begged to express his regret.

TRINITY AND ST. JOHN'S COLLEGES (CAMBRIDGE).

ADDRESS MOVED FOR.

MR. POLLARD-URQUHART said, he rose, pursuant to notice, to move that an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, requesting that consent might be withheld from certain portions of the statutes of the Colleges of Trinity and St. John's, in the University of Cambridge, now before Parliament. By an Act passed in 1856, entitled an "Act for the better government of the University of Cambridge," certain Commissioners were appointed, with power to frame statutes which were to become law within forty days after their presentation to Parliament, unless in the meantime an Address against their adoption should be presented to Her Majesty. The statutes were laid before Parliament on the 11th of July last, at which period everybody who had not been driven out of London by the heat and the river was occupied in attending to the election petitions against himself or other hon. Members, and it was impossible to secure the attention of Parliament to a subject like the present. Through the courtesy of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for the Home Department, the statutes had been allowed to remain over for consideration to the present Session; and a promise was given that Her Majesty would not be advised to grant her sanction to them till they had been brought under the notice of the House. Therefore, as a member of Trinity College, and interested in its welfare, he had brought the subject before them. He believed that there were faults in these statutes which were calculated to be prejudicial to the welfare and usefulness of the colleges as centres of literary and scientific activity, and were at variance with the best interests of the Church of England, and consequently of religion itself. By statute 3, it was enacted that the master should be a member of the Church of England. Statute 6, provided that the College should be governed by a board, consisting of the master and eight of the senior Fellows, each vacancy being filled from among the other senior Fellows by election of the other members of the board. Statutes 16 and 21, taken together, provided that the master should be a member of the Church of England, and should relinquish his position in the event of his secession. Practically, the effect of these statutes was to limit the highest honours to members of the Church of England. In St. John's College the case was still worse; a student could not read for honours unless he was a member of the Church of England. The statutes were unjust in themselves, and adverse to the best interests of the University. They were drawn up in times when conformity with the Church of England was believed to be more of a test of loyalty to the Crown than it was at present. The statutes were then enforced for a political purpose; but the same principles enforced now could not but weaken the University. Mr. Mill, in speaking of our educational system, described it as one for making the students think right what we thought right, and as an abuse of the human faculties. No great minds could be formed under such a system, as its effect must necessarily be to cramp the energies of the students in their search after truth. It had also inflicted great injury on individuals. During the time he was an undergraduate of Cambridge, a Quaker gentleman was fourth wrangler; but he was not allowed to be a fellow of his college. In 1837 a Jew was second wrangler, but he was not allowed to take a degree; that had since been remedied, but he would not now be allowed to contend for a fellowship. Three years ago a Baptist gained high honours; if these statutes passed all his hopes would be destroyed. The senior wrangler of the year was a member of the Free Church of Scotland, and it was doubtful whether he would be able to subscribe the Articles of the Church of England. The Bishop of St. David's, one of the brightest ornaments of Trinity College, Cambridge, was in favour of the repeal of these exclusive statutes. The system of holding out rewards and punishments was, as Archbishop Whately remarked, calculated to bring over to the Church only those who were influenced by interest or vanity, while it would repel those who had a sincere sense of religion. The operation of the statutes to which he had called the attention of the House would exclude many of the best men from the highest emoluments of the University for daring to think for themselves. That part of the statutes which referred to the election of seniors would have a most prejudicial effect. It was true they were to be elected in rotation unless good reason were shown to the contrary; but what would be good reason where all must be members of the Church of England, and from long habit and association were taught to regard whatever belonged to the Church of England as right, and whatever was antagonistic to her then opinions must be wrong? The Bishop of St. David's had been compelled to resign his tutorship at Cambridge on account of his having written a pamphlet in favour of the admission of Dissenters to the University. For the same cause it was possible that the most distinguished ornaments of learning would not be chosen a senior or a member of that body to whom the government of the college was committed. It was extremely possible that the author of such a book as the Vestiges of the Natural History of the Creation would not be elected a senior. It was extremely possible that such a distinguished scholar as Dr. Donaldson, the learned author of the New Cratylus, would be excluded in consequence of his original researches in early Jewish history; the effect, in short, would be to shut out those great original minds from the highest rewards of the University, whom its best friends should wish to become identified with it. He appealed to the noble Lord (Lord Stanley), Member for King's Lynn, as a member of the University and of the same college to which he himself belonged, and attached to it by the same affectionate recollections, would he wish men of the most original research and European reputation to be altogether excluded from having a principal place in these colleges, and could he deny that this was likely to be the result if these statutes should become law? He was quite certain the noble Lord would do this question justice; at all events, he hoped all those hon. Members who wished to see in the Universities a fair field open to all, and no

MR. BAINES seconded the Motion. He regretted that, from a miscalculation as to the time the division on the preceding Motion was likely to last, he had lost the opportunity of presenting three petitions in favour of the Motion from the town of Cambridge—two from members of Dissenting congregations—complaining of the statutes of the University requiring the attendance of students twice at chapel on a Sunday, thereby preventing them from attending their own places of worship; also of the statutes of St. John's College excluding Dissenters from fellowships, while they were threatened to be excluded from fellowships in Trinity College. The statutes alluded to in the Motion of the hon. Member for Westmeath seemed to him to be a retrograde step in the march of enlightened and liberal legislation. Parliament had admitted Dissenters of every name to seats in that House, to the bench of justice, to municipal corporations, and the Act of 1856 was expressly intended to admit Dissenters to the University of Cambridge. They were admitted to take degrees, but excluded from those fair rewards of learning and merit to which others, being Churchmen, were admitted. If the position of a fellow was one which gave ecclesiastical power, or function, or office in the University in which education for ecclesiastical purposes was distinctly intended, he should not seek that it should be enjoyed by Dissenters; but he did ask that Dissenters might be permitted to enjoy those fellowships which were left in ancient times as a reward of learning and merit, and which were not connected with any ecclesiastical function or office. He need scarcely remind the House that the Dissenters who were excluded by these statutes, taking the population of the United Kingdom, constituted the larger part of the nation. It was not for the benefit of Cambridge or of the country that so large a part of the population should be excluded from the attainment of the honours and emoluments of learning and merit; it was only for the benefit of the religious sect exercising it that this monopoly was established and sought to be maintained. The restrictions and disqualifications to which he had referred were in the nature of pains and penalties for holding a certain religious belief. He thought the day had gone by when pains

and penalties for religious belief could be enacted or continued in this country; yet it was proposed that a new test should be established by two of our principal colleges, which would inflict pains and penalties on the larger part of the people of England. It ought to be known that the declaration originally required from the fellows of St. John's was not that they were members of the Church of England; it was this,—that they would embrace from their heart the true religion of Christ, follow the authority of Christ before that of man, and seek from it their rule of life. Here there was nothing whatever in favour either of one or another body of Christians; but from the time of James I. it had been impossible for Dissenters to take degrees at the University until 1856; and it was by being excluded from degrees that they were shut out from the honours and emoluments which were the rewards of distinction; but, surely, when an Act of Parliament passed to remove the former of these disqualifications, it ought to remove the latter too. If Dissenters were allowed to compete for wranglers, and obtained high positions, as some of them had done, in the Tripos, surely they ought afterwards to be allowed to compete for those emoluments which were one of the inducements to enter the University. He trusted the spirit of that House would be altogether adverse to that retrograde step it was now sought to take, and that, acting on the principles of liberal legislation, which especially on the subject of education had recently prevailed, they would accede to the Motion. By so doing they would remove one more cause of irritation between Dissenters and Churchmen, and break down one more barrier in the way of that unity and cordiality of feeling which ought to exist between all classes of Her Majesty's subjects. In that hope he seconded the Motion.

“That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that She will be graciously pleased to withhold Her consent from certain portions of the Statutes of Trinity and St. John's Colleges, Cambridge, now before Parliament, relating to the compulsory ordination of the College Master, the compulsory celibacy of the Senior Fellows, the removal of Fellows who may have openly seceded from the Church of England, the filling up of the vacant places in the Seniority by the Master and the remaining Seniors, and the delegating to the Master and Seniors exclusively all rules respecting the attendance of the Undergraduates who are not members of the Church of England at the College Chapel; and that Her Majesty will be graciously pleased to give such

LORD STANLEY said, that as he was the only one of the Commissioners appointed under the Act of 1856 for the University of Cambridge who had the honour of a seat in that House, it might be desirable that he should give a brief explanation on the points referred to in the present Motion. Neither the Colleges nor the members of the Commission had any reason to complain of the manner in which the subject had been brought before the House. If discontent existed in the minds of any class of the community in consequence of what had been done, or if a misunderstanding prevailed, as appeared from the speeches of the hon. Mover and Seconder to be the case, it was expedient that it should, if possible, be removed, and that the House should judge whether any cause of complaint existed or no. With regard to the most important point touched upon by those hon. Gentlemen, namely, the exclusion from fellowships in Trinity and St. John's Colleges of persons who were not members of the Church of England, it was not necessary to vindicate the conduct of the Commissioners, for the plain reason that the matter was one in which they whose duties were defined by the Act of 1856 had no legal power or jurisdiction whatever. That Act removed all disabilities upon persons obtaining degrees; it opened scholarships and exhibitions, and enabled undergraduates to enjoy emoluments without any profession of religious opinion; but it did not repeal that part of the Act of Uniformity, by which all persons taking fellowships were required to belong to the Church of England. If the hon. Member wished to raise the question of opening the fellowships to Dissenters—which he (Lord Stanley) would hardly advise him to do—he should therefore introduce a Bill into that House for the purpose. Parliament had imposed the restriction, and Parliament alone could remove it. With regard to the removal of Fellows who might have seceded from the Established Church, the House would probably think that Parliament having expressly confined the fellowships, wisely or unwisely, to members of the Church of England, it was necessary that the College Statutes should provide some means of declaring that, when a Fellow had ceased to fulfil the condition on which his appointment rested, the appointment itself should determine.

The mode of procedure pointed out by the new statutes was less likely to lead to arbitrary removal than that which previously existed, because he imagined that formerly any Fellow taking a step implying secession from the Church of England might have been proceeded against for heresy, and on that ground deprived. If the present tenure of the office, as dependent on church-membership, was to continue—and the Commissioners certainly had no power to alter it—it seemed desirable that the law should be enforced in the mildest manner possible, and not be liable to be abused for purposes of intolerance. Accordingly, under the new statutes the loss of his fellowship was made to depend entirely on the voluntary and deliberate act of the person seceding from the Established Church. It was, as far as it went, a relaxation of the existing rule. With respect to the other points touched upon by the hon. Member, it should be remembered that the Cambridge Commissioners were not invested with absolute or unlimited authority to make statutes either for the University or for the colleges. He, for one, did not complain of that, he did not wish that larger powers should have been granted, but it should be borne in mind when considering the statutes as finally passed, that they did not embody the unmodified views and wishes of the Commissioners, but were the result of negotiations with the governing bodies of the various colleges, ending, as such negotiation almost invariably did, in a compromise by which many reforms were carried and some abandoned. The Act constituting the Cambridge Commission provided that no statute should have the force of law unless it had the assent of two-thirds of the governing body of the college which it affected. In those governing bodies the ecclesiastical element was predominant; and considerable disinclination was evinced by them to accept changes that appeared to them to wear the form of innovations, especially when pressed upon them by external authority. His own individual opinion was, that the college master should not necessarily be in holy orders, but that it should be left optional with those who elected him to choose a layman or a clergyman. Indeed, that was the view put forward by the Commissioners in the Minute of July 1857, with which they opened their negotiations with the various Colleges; and the same principle was repeated in the draught of the statutes afterwards sent down to the governing bodies, both of Trinity and St. John's. The feeling of those bodies was, however, almost universally opposed to it; and, finding there was not the slightest chance of the adoption of the measure in its original form, the Commissioners reluctantly withdrew it in order to carry other reforms which they deemed of more importance. Even had they succeeded, the assertion of such a principle in the case of colleges like St. John's would have been more of an abstract than a practical success, because, the governing body being opposed to having even the option of electing a layman, they would not have been likely to exercise that option in favour of a layman had they possessed it. This was an instance in which the Commissioners had thought it safer and more prudent to give way. Two other points touched upon by the present Motion — namely, first, the filling up of vacant places in the seniority by the master and the remaining seniors; and secondly, the compulsory celibacy of the senior fellows, were matters of detail connected with the internal administration of the colleges, and did not seem to him to involve any important question, calling for the interference of that House. The hon. Member complained of the filling up of the vacant places in the seniority by the master and the remaining seniors; but he did not indicate in what other way he would have the vacancies filled up. The Commissioners found that the practice was an ancient one, and were not aware that there were any objections to its continuance. It was a system of succession by seniority, as a general rule, with exceptions in the case of any grave defect; and a power of exception so invidious and so repugnant to the feelings of men living together and forming a society of their own, they might be sure would never be exercised without the strongest and most urgent reasons. The Commissioners had proposed considerable relaxations in regard to the compulsory celibacy of the senior fellows, but succeeded in carrying only a portion of them. The governing bodies, it was found, were most anxious to retain the rule as it stood; and the reason, good or bad, which was put forward why members of their body should not be married men was, that men who had families to provide for would be apt, as had been shown in other cases where corporate property was concerned, to look to their life interest in the college property rather than to its permanent improvement. As to compulsory attendance in chapel, the proposition originally made by the Commissioners was to give a right of non-attendance at chapel in cases where conscientious objections were entertained. But he was sorry to say that of all the propositions which were submitted by the Commission none had raised so strong a spirit of opposition as that. He was bound, however, to say on behalf of the Colleges that he did not think their objection, as a general rule, was based upon any wish to compel the attendance of those who had scruples of conscience about doing so; and he did not believe it would be the intention of any College to exclude Dissenters by any provision of that kind. They objected to be compelled to exempt them from attendance, but they did not object so to exempt them, if the power were left with themselves. It was clearly stated in the Act of 1856 that no person should be required on taking a degree, or obtaining a scholarship, exhibition, or any other college emolument, to make or subscribe any declaration of religious opinion and belief. There was a distinction, of course, between attendance in chapel and signing a declaration; but he had no hesitation in saying that if any such attendance were enforced in the case of scholars where conscientious objections were felt, it would be contrary to the spirit and intention, if not to the letter, of the Act passed by that House. In the case of pensioners there was no effectual power of interfering with the conduct of Colleges, for the plain reason that it was optional with Colleges to take or refuse any person who presented himself as a pensioner; and therefore, if they wished to exclude any one not of the Church of England, they might refuse him admission in the first instance, not assigning any reason. There appeared to the Commissioners not the remotest prospect of carrying their proposal as to attendance in chapel as originally framed, and they were therefore very reluctantly, as far as he and, he believed, others of their number were concerned, led to modify it so far as to delegate to the masters and seniors the power of granting dispensation, but to leave the matter in their discretion. He would repeat that, as to the question of fellowships the Commissioners had no power of acting at all; that subject could only be dealt with by the Legislature itself. The two statutes respecting the compulsory celibacy of senior fellows and the filling up of vacancies in the seniority by the master and remaining seniors, were scarcely questions of sufficient moment to call for legislative interference. The other two matters referred to by the hon. Member who made the Motion, lay within a narrower compass, and might no doubt, be considered as involving a question of principle. He had stated his opinion upon those points, and he must leave it in the hands of the House to take what course they thought fit. For his own part, looking at the statutes as a whole, and considering the compromise come to between the Commissioners and the Colleges, he felt bound by the arrangements then entered into, and must vote against the Motion if it were persisted in. He did not think any good would be attained by merely referring the statutes in question back again to the University Commissioners. All the Commissioners could do, would be to send down their original proposals upon those points to the Colleges, and knowing what the feeling of the Colleges was, he had no doubt their answer would be that their opinion remained unchanged, and that they would not be responsible for the changes proposed. He would advise the hon. Member (Mr. Pollard-Urquhart), as the functions of the Commission expired at the close of the year, and as the legislation both for the colleges and university would by that time be completed, to wait till the whole of the new legislation on the subject was before the House; and then, if it appeared insufficient or to require amendment in regard to any of the points he had referred to, let the changes be effected by the direct authority of the Legislature. The Commissioners had not accomplished all that they wished, but they had brought about considerable changes; they had been met on the whole in a fair spirit, they had come to an arrangement on the chief subjects in dispute, and therefore, as to the present Motion, he felt that, as one of the Commissioners, he should be breaking faith with the Colleges if he were to acquiesce in it.

MR. WALPOLE said, he hoped the House would pause before it interfered with the proceedings of the Commissioners. Parliament had delegated to the Commissioners certain powers. Those powers were to be exercised by the Colleges in the first instance with reference to the statutes which they might have to propose, or any alteration of the statutes which they might have to recommend. If those powers were not exercised by the Colleges, then it was for the Commissioners to suggest such statutes as they thought the Colleges might with propriety adopt. If the statutes were settled between the Colleges and the Commissioners, or the Commissioners accepted the statutes of the Colleges, it was thought by Parliament that, instead of bringing all those matters under discussion again, they would be more likely to be well settled by leaving the Colleges and Commissioners to mutual action. Parliament also required that the statutes should be laid on the table of both Houses, in order that either House, within forty days afterwards, might address the Crown, if they thought any provisions of the Act of Parliament had been evaded. Those forty days had, in fact, expired, still he did not take exception to that expiration but for these two purposes — first, to point out the inconvenience of leaving the Colleges with uncertain statutes, when nothing was more desirable than that the Colleges and Universities should know the statutes on which they were to act at the earliest possible moment; and, second, to point out that the latter part of the Motion could not be complied with, because there was no power to send back statutes to the Commissioners with any specific direction. As soon as the forty days had expired the power of dealing with these Statutes remained in the Crown, and in the Crown alone. The Crown no doubt had power to approve, and, by implication, power to disapprove. It was thus intended that it should be left to the Crown to determine whether action should be taken in reference to complaints either against the statutes framed by the Colleges, or by the Commissioners. The hon. Gentleman would recollect that there was some discussion on the Oxford Statutes when they were framed by the Commissioners, and then it was thought by both sides of the House that it would be most inconvenient for Parliament to interfere; most inconvenient, because nothing could lead to greater embarrassment after delegating all these powers to the Colleges and Commissioners, to reopen questions which had been settled after great deliberation, much discussion, and mutual concessions. The hon. Gentleman (Mr. P. Urquhart) seemed to think that the provisions which had been made with reference to the two great colleges, Trinity and St. John, were not, as regards religious matter in strict accordance with the intentions of the Legislature; but, if he would look at the Act of Parliament, he would see that the limits were carefully determined, beyond which the Commissioners could not go. The Legislature had said that university education should be open to all classes of Her Majesty's subjects, whatever might be their religious opinions, and, in order to insure it, there was inserted in both of the Acts of Parliament, the power of founding what were called private halls in Oxford and hostels in Cambridge. This was done that all persons who did not agree with the Church of England might have the fullest benefit of university education. But this provision did not extend to Colleges. For to go beyond that, and to say that the Colleges should admit within their walls, not merely for purposes of education, but to enable them to receive the emoluments of colleges endowed for a different purpose, or to take a part in the government of the Colleges which necessarily followed a fellowship being conferred. Those persons whose religious opinions did not concur with the intention of the founder, was not consistent with the Act of Parliament. Those matters were expressly brought before Parliament, expressly discussed, and expressly negatived. Therefore it would be inconvenient by an Address to the Crown to interfere with that which the Legislature itself had already deliberately determined. He trusted, however, he should be pardoned for making one or two observations on the points suggested by the Motion. As to the requirement that the masters should be in holy orders, it was much discussed between the Commissioners and the Colleges, and he believed he might say that the general opinion of both those great institutions, Trinity and St. John's, was that to dispense with such requirement would be detrimental and contrary to the original intentions of the founders. With regard to the celibacy of the fellows, the hon. Gentleman would remember that that point was much discussed and debated between the Commissioners and the Colleges. The different Colleges took different views on it, but the grounds upon which Trinity and St. John decided against admitting married Fellows were so strong in themselves as to demonstrate the propriety of celibacy being enforced as a qualification, if they wished to have a constant succession of energetic and able men, instead of allowing married gentlemen to hold fellowships, to the detriment of those whose anxious ambition was to get those emoluments and distinctions. Moreover, he did not know how the government of the colleges was to go on if they did away with celibacy to any great extent, for their good government depended as much on having the tutors and authorities resident in the college as on any other circumstance. There might be some Colleges which would desire to take a different view, but, if so, that is a matter which had better be left for themselves to determine. With regard to the last point to which the hon. Gentleman adverted, the attendance of students, who were not members of the Church of England, at chapel, he would remind the House that there was really no compulsory attendance upon chapel. It was left to the governing body of the college to decide whether that attendance should be required or not; and he put it to any Gentleman whether any institution could go on if it were in the power of any person to say—"I will belong to your institution; but I will not comply with your regulations." The hon. Gentleman must know from his own experience of Trinity College, to which they both had the honour to belong, that compulsory attendance was not necessarily required when reasonable grounds for dispensing with that attendance might be alleged; and it was only within the last six months that the son of a member of the Jewish persuasion, well known in that House, had gone to Trinity for the sake of the benefits therein to be derived, and attendance at chapel was dispensed with in his case without a murmur and without debate. In conclusion, he would only say that though there had been differences between the University and the Commissioners, and between the Colleges and the Commissioners, yet by the good feeling which all parties had manifested, those differences had been allayed; and he therefore entreated the House to leave to the Commissioners, together with the Colleges, the discharge of the duties with which Parliament had intrusted them; and he felt no doubt that they would make such regulations and statutes as would best extend the benefits of the education given by the University, and best promote the interests of all classes of Her Majesty's subjects.

MR. BRISCOE remarked, that he should best support the principles involved in the Motion, by advising his hon. Friend not to press it to a division.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he wished to refer to the position of this Motion upon their Order-book. The House had just decided that the grant to Maynooth should be continued. Now, that was a grant for the benefit of the Roman Catholic clergy exclusively. Immediately after that decision of the House, a Roman Catholic Gentleman rises, and not content with the making of liberal professions [Mr. P. URQUHART: I am not a Catholic]—well, then, he would merely say this—he trusted that the House would not be induced by any Member, whatever may be his faith, to invade the rights of these colleges, which were seminaries for the education of the clergy of the Church of England, immediately after it had consented to continue an exclusive grant to the Roman Catholic College of Maynooth. At that moment there was going on in Ireland an agitation to break up the Queen's Colleges in that country, in which there was no religious test. Patience has its limits; and the members of the Church of England, both in and out of the House, might depend on this—if the friends of the Church of England were not more watchful, the interests of that Church would be sacrificed.

MR. POLLARD-URQUHART said, that in rising to ask leave to withdraw his Motion, he wished to thank the noble Lord, the Member for King's Lynn, (Lord Stanley) for the liberal support which he had given it.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

CORRUPT PRACTICES PREVENTION ACT (1854)—AMENDMENT BILL.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. MELLOR said, that since he had obtained leave to bring in this Bill, he had received numerous communications from all parts of the country expressing approval of the provisions of the measure, and complaining of the statement of the noble Viscount at the head of the Government that the House of Commons was much more alive to the evils of bribery than the country generally. He himself was firmly persuaded that the noble Viscount was mistaken, and he trusted that in future his correspondents would address their letters to the noble Viscount, who it appeared required to be convinced that the country was seriously bent upon measures for the repression of bribery. The disclosures brought about by the Gloucester and Wakefield Commissions might be said to have placed representative institutions on their trial, and unless something were done by the House to put a stop to bribery they almost ran the risk of becoming the scorn and contempt of Europe. He believed that the most effectual means of effecting that object would be to attach a degrading punishment to the offence, and he thought the punishment proposed in his measure, while sufficient for the purpose of deterring persons from giving or taking bribes, was not so severe as to render juries unwilling to convict. One of his correspondents thought that he let off offenders much too easily, and that four years' penal servitude should be assigned for the second offence, and with a much heavier punishment for the third. The offence of bribery, however, whether in giving or taking, like that of manslaughter, involved many degrees of guilt. In some cases the person who accepted a bribe was worse than the one who paid it. Therefore he had left it to the discretion of the Judge to fix the punishment according to the particular circumstances of each case. The Bill also contained a clause, the object of which was to prevent a witness from refusing to give evidence on the ground that it would criminate himself. For the necessity of this provision he might refer to an attempt at bribery of a common councilman at Norwich by the offer of £300 to vote in favour of certain aldermen. The case was heard before the magistrates at Norwich, and one magistrate, a banker, refused to give evidence, on the ground that it would criminate himself. In the present state of the law, he could not be compelled to give evidence, although his conduct deserved censure, and he hoped it would be taken notice of by the Government. Some of the magistrates implicated in the transaction actually voted on the adjournment of the case, and the end of it was that the proceedings were rendered abortive. But he thought that such cases ought not to be allowed to pass with perfect impunity. He proposed the Bill as a provisional measure, until the House should have time and opportunity completely to revise the whole system. He regarded the Corrupt Practices Prevention Act, which the present Bill proposed to amend, as founded on sound and good principles, but it had failed because its provisions could only be enforced by costly proceedings to recover money penalties. Gentlemen had gone down to elections with the predetermination to treat the Act, for which they had voted, as a dead letter, and both the Wakefield and Gloucester reports disclosed gross falsifications of accounts. Large sums were paid away by the candidates in bribery, and those sums, of course, did not appear in the accounts of the election auditor. At Gloucester, the expenses of Sir Robert Carden were returned at £1,021 10s. 11d., but the Commissioners reported that the actual sum spent must have amounted to at least £2,600. The total expenditure of Messrs. Price and Monk, according to the return of the election auditor, was £929 2s., but the actual expenditure was at least £2,300. The case of Wakefield afforded even a more striking instance of this falsification of accounts. Mr. Leatham's expenditure was returned as under £500, but the Commissioners reported that it had been nearly £4,000; and Mr. Charlesworth's, which was returned at £652, was found by the Commissioners to have been £4,150. Mr. Leatham expended no less than £1,900 in direct bribery, and Mr. Charlesworth £1,600, in addition to a large sum for the employment of bands of prizefighters to intimidate the electors. At Wakefield ninety-eight persons committed acts of bribery, by bribing other people, eighty-six in respect of their own votes, and twelve were bribed on both sides. He had received statements from various parts of the kingdom, which showed that although there was a general feeling in favour of proceedings to put down bribery there was a wonderful disinclination even among religious and respectable persons to regard bribery as a serious offence. He had received singular statements as to this from various places, each showing a singular deadness of principle in this respect. In one place there was a gentleman, who, while he employed a chaplain to read prayers every morning and contributed largely to every benevolent object, gave also large sums for Parliamentary and municipal corruption. This gentleman salved his conscience by supposing he could preserve his religion and morality by not inquiring how the money was spent. In other places there were gentlemen professing religion of a high character who gave their money to similar objects. Now, in his opinion, if a man employed money to sap the self-respect of his fellow-men, though he gave all his goods to feed the poor and his body to be burnt, yet was his religion nothing more than sounding brass and a tinkling cymbal. He proposed that no person should be at liberty to pay any, save personal expenses except through the election agent and auditor. He did not approve of election auditors. He believed that the election auditor was a mere machine for publishing the accounts, and was of no other use whatever. At the same time he wished to give some utility to the existing law, and he should regret if another election occurred without further provisions being made to put a stop to corrupt and illegal practices. By the provisions of this Bill he endeavoured, by making the punishment of bribery degrading through the addition of hard labour to the sentence, to give the public a belief that they were in earnest when they talked of it as a degrading offence. He endeavoured also to avoid the objection to answer which the rules of evidence permitted, by providing that no one should be at liberty to refuse to answer questions, which might criminate or degrade, but at the same time enacting that those answers should not be used against him in evidence in any other proceedings except proceedings for perjury. He prohibited the employment of voters in capacities which were found to be the general means resorted to in colourable bribery, such as those of canvassers, clerks, and messengers. He further provided against the colourable employment of voters by requiring that within a fortnight of the election a list should be sent to the auditor of every person engaged in the election for fee or reward, and he trusted that the Bill which he proposed would induce a feeling of insecurity between the briber and his agents, which would prevent persons who were usually the instruments of bribery being taken into the confidence of candidates. There was another provision which he should endeavour to introduce in Committee—namely, to prohibit altogether the payment of canvassers. It was not a complete measure, but it struck at the root of many evils, and he hoped the Session would not pass without something being done to prevent the recurrence of those evils should another general election take place.

Motion made and Question proposed, that the Bill be now read a second time.

MR. HUNT said, he gave his cordial support to the Bill. It contained several very valuable provisions. He approved all payments being made through the election auditor, and the increase in the punishment for offending against the law. But there were several provisions which he hoped would be amended in Committee. He could not agree that they ought to prohibit candidates employing paid canvassers. It would be quite sufficient to enact that all paid canvassers should be incapacitated from voting. In small boroughs it might be possible to do without paid canvassers, but where the constituency was large, and the area extensive, no candidate was physically capable of going through the enormous labour of a contested election without paid assistants. He agreed that the office of election auditor as at present constituted was a mere farce; but he believed that officer might be made a very valuable functionary if the onus of refusing to pay doubtful claims were thrown upon him, instead of being left to the candidate, at a time when he was almost incapacitated for resisting improper charges. In the case of one of his own elections he had made an application to the election auditor to know whether he was justified in refusing certain claims, but the reply the auditor made was—"I have only to pass the cheques and publish the accounts." The election auditor should be a person of position and character, and he ought to be able to protect the candidate from the exorbitant claims made upon him. While he intended to support this Bill, he did not pretend to say that this or any other Act would prevent bribery and corruption at elections. As long as there were persons willing to pay money for a seat in Parliament means would be found to evade the law and to convey the money to the voters. Corrupt practices had been to a certain extent checked, and he believed that if this Bill were carried the evil would be further mitigated, but something further was needed. He did not think the country would believe that the House were in earnest in wishing to put down bribery, while in their individual capacities they were found using money in a manner which in their collective capacity they stigmatized. It was often said that they were the victims of others—that they found themselves in the end implicated in practices which they wished to avoid. But a very pertinent fact came out at all these investigations, which was, that in nine cases out of ten, the money employed in corrupting voters could be traced to the banker of the candidate or of his immediate relations or connections. What was the case at Wakefield? He drew no distinction between Conservatives and Liberals. The one side of the House was as bad as the other. The Conservative candidate at Wakefield went through the farce of opening an account in the name of his cousin, and deposited security for the money which was to meet his cousin's cheques. The money was spent either in pouring beer down the throats of the electors or filling the pockets of their wives. The Liberal candidate, who was not so used to electioneering, went to work in a more straightforward manner, and drew the money himself. At Gloucester, the Conservative candidate, like the Liberal candidate at Wakefield, callous and indifferent as to the purposes for which it was to be used, drew the money himself. The Liberal candidate had a friend who had stood many contests, and he advised the candidate to know nothing about money transactions until after the election. The same friend drew a cheque on the candidate's father-in-law, and that cheque was duly honoured. A Gentleman high in position in this House, although he had a private residence, found it necessary to have an election-office in Ryder Street. A parliamentary agent was instructed to open all his letters, and to act according to the best of his judgment. The money of the father-in-law found its way to the office, and was transferred through the medium of a notorious bribing agent to the pockets of the electors of Gloucester. While upon this subject he wished to say a few words on the Reports of the Wakefield and Gloucester Commissioners. He admired the manliness and honesty of the Wakefield Report. The Commissioners had not flinched from their duty of including in the list gentlemen high in position, as well as the occupiers of low-rented houses in Wakefield. It presented a very favourable contrast to the Report of the Gloucester Commissioners, who gave a very amusing and able narrative, but seemed unable to make up their minds, or, at all events, to state the impression of their minds that Sir W. Carden, Sir W. Hayter, and Mr. Moffatt might have been guilty of bribery.

But if the Commissioners had been too sensitive to implicate those gentlemen, their own consciences had moved them to apply for certificates of indemnity. It seemed inconsistent that while three paragraphs of the Gloucester Report should be devoted to whitewashing these three gentlemen, they should have felt compelled—and he thought they were well advised—to apply for certificates of indemnity. Until there was a better state of public opinion, it was comparatively useless to pass stringent measures against bribery. It frequently happened that Members were unseated for bribery; but when they returned to the House did they meet with the cold shoulder, or at all lose caste among their friends because of the stigma attaching to them by Reports of Commissioners or Committee? Were they not welcomed with as much cordiality as if such Reports had never been made? If the four gentlemen who had been proved to have been guilty of bribery in the Gloucester and Wakefield elections were present, they would no doubt walk into the lobby to swell the majority for the second reading of this Bill, and if either of them had a taste for oratory he would get on his legs to enforce the doctrines of purity with as grave a face as the hon. and learned Gentleman himself. While that was the case, how could they expect persons in a humble position to believe in the indignation against such practices which was generally professed? He hoped the hon. and learned Gentleman would not consent to the Bill being sent to a Select Committee, because if there was one subject more than another upon which all hon. Members were well informed it was this, and therefore a reference to a Select Committee was wholly unnecessary. He wished well to that or any other measure which might have the effect of putting an end to the most notorious of the corrupt practices prevailing at elections. He was by no means sanguine in his anticipations of the good which was to be expected from the present Bill, but he would give every assistance in his power to the desirable object with which it had been introduced.

SIR FRANCIS GOLDSMID said, he was of opinion that some of the clauses contained in the Bill might prove valuable, but to others he entertained such strong objections, that he wished to urge them before the measure reached the stage of committal. Many of its provisions, by which severer penalties were directed against the offence of bribery, were founded on a principle of antiquated legislation, which he hoped the country had outgrown. About half a century ago it was regarded as a rule that all offences highly detrimental to public or private interests, which the existing penalties had failed to check, should be visited with severer punishment; and the easier the offence was to commit, and the more difficult it was to detect, the greater was the necessity which was felt of counterbalancing the temptation by additional threats of severity—the result being that eventually the punishment of death was denounced against crimes with which one could now hardly associate the idea of such an extreme penalty. In this way capital punishment had come to be inflicted for horse stealing, sheep stealing, and other offences of that kind. But theoretic severity produced, in most instances, practical impunity; and for the last forty years this system had gradually been abandoned, and sounder views of criminal legislation, which were largely indebted for their diffusion to the writings and speeches of such men as Bentham, Romilly, Montagu, and Mackintosh, were established. The new plan for the repression of offences proceeded on the two principles of making punishment certain, and diminishing the temptation to commit the offence; and wherever it had been applied, it had always been found to work for the public welfare. Bank-note forgery and smuggling, formerly crimes of alarming frequency, against which penal statutes had in vain been directed, were put an end to in one case by an improved system of manufacture, and by removing from circulation the one pound bank-note, and in the other by a reduction in the rate of duty. Why should they not apply to the offence of bribery, which was frequently designated a crime, the same principle which had been attended with beneficial effects in the instances he had mentioned? The second and third clauses of the Bill proposed, at the discretion of the Judge, to add in cases of bribery at Parliamentary and Municipal elections the penalty of hard labour to that of fine and imprisonment already pronounced by the statutes. This he held to be wholly inconsistent with the spirit of modern legislation; and how, he would ask, was it possible for public opinion to approve the infliction of a degrading punishment—what the French termed peine infamante—when a feeling existed that many Members of that House were tainted with this very offence of bribery? The penalties imposed by the existing law were not enforced. At every general election hundreds of cases of bribery occurred, and yet nothing was more rare in the history of our criminal courts than punishment of that offence either by fine or imprisonment. If, without making trial of the checks already existing, they were to set about framing others, they would be imitating the physician, who, on learning that the remedies which he had prescribed had not been administered, sat down to write a fresh prescription, consisting of more violent medicines. The only effectual remedies, in his opinion, were the loss of the seat and the loss of the vote; but to legalize the sentence of hard labour in cases of bribery, would only be to add to what had proved in practice an idle threat, a fresh denunciation, which was still more certain, from its severity, to prove inefficacious. As to the 4th clause,—the difficulty of procuring evidence was not to be ascribed to any fear on the part of witnesses that their testimony might lead to their own subsequent conviction, but to the fact that the parties engaged in the traffic—the subordinate agent who bought, and the electors who sold—liked the trade, and were unwilling to do anything that might interfere with it, and likewise to the feeling of mutual fidelity—he would not call it honour—which bound most persons engaged together in enterprises, even of an unlawful character. The 5th clause afforded an indemnity to witnesses who had been guilty of the offence of bribery; but he put it to the House whether it was worth while, for an additional chance of putting a stop to the practice complained of, to interfere with the rule of law to which English lawyers and the English people attached so much importance. The 9th clause would, he believed, be found impracticable in populous places; but, with these exceptions, the Bill, after diligent consideration in Committee, might, he thought, be passed with advantage. He now came to the remedy which he himself was desirous should be adopted—namely, that when a defeated candidate petitioned on the ground of bribery or treating, and made out his case without any recriminatory case being established against himself, he should be entitled to the seat. In the majority of elections which took place under the present system in corrupt political constituencies, it usually happened that there were three parties, of whom two were opposed in politics, one being somewhat stronger than the other, and the third party, which held no political opinions whatever—except it were recognized as a political principle that electors were to make as much as possible out of their votes—were able to give the victory to the weaker side by throwing their force in that direction. A candidate was invited down by the stronger side, and was correctly assured that if no corrupt practices were resorted to he was sure of his seat; but a few days before the election it was ascertained by some of those appearances so well understood by persons familiar with such matters that the weaker side had made arrangements for buying the votes of the corrupt section; under such circumstances what course would the most strenuous opponent of bribery recommend the candidate to pursue? If, persevering in his original intention not to bribe, he withdrew from the contest, it was true that he avoided both the expense and contamination to which he would otherwise be exposed. But so far as the constituency was concerned, bribery was not checked, but, on the contrary, encouraged; for the weaker side, simply by unscrupulous determination, succeeded in gaining the election. If, as he feared was most frequently the case, the candidate who started with pure intentions found that unless he resorted to the same practices as his opponent his election would be lost, and thereon placed a sum of money in the hands of his agent without inquiring how it was to be spent, such a proceeding was not, of course, to be defended; but the unwillingness of men to succumb in any contest in which they had once engaged, the extreme importance which was attached to a seat in that House, and the improbability of succeeding on petition, made it, he thought, not to be wondered at that the temptation was often yielded to, and resulted in the occurrence of events

been a party to the personation of a voter. Then a correspondence ensued between Mr. Balfe and the present Lord Chancellor, in which the latter got the worst of it, both in law and logic. Mr. Balfe demanded that the charges against him should be brought forward in the light of day. He disapproved of the Commission, but said he would come before it. He did appear accordingly, and was entirely acquitted. The inference which he (Mr. Osborne) drew from all this was that the present mode of governing Ireland was unsatisfactory; that backstairs influence was predominant there; that men's characters might be whispered away; and that if they did not happen to be on the list of high sheriffs they would never know the reason why. The people of Ireland were in favour of the Lord-Lieutenancy, and he should not attempt to disturb their decision; but at the same time he thought there might be a great reform in the system. At present it was a grotesque burlesque; but if it was to be a pageant, at least it should be a solemn pageant, and not one brought into play merely for such things as the inauguration of baths and washhouses. If such a case had happened under the Earl of Eglintoun, every Irishman would have started up to denounce it. As it was, wishing to deal impartially with such questions, and looking upon the present Lord Lieutenant as a man well formed to adorn private life, he thanked his hon. and gallant Friend for bringing the subject under notice. The accusation against Mr. Balfe was preferred in quite a Venetian manner, though to say that the letter was dropped into the lion's mouth would be to cast a slur upon that noble animal. This discussion would lead men to question the expediency of continuing the government of Ireland by means of a Lord Lieutenancy, or, at any rate, it would show that the Lord Lieutenant's powers should be scrutinized more severely than at present. He hoped the result would be to give a blow to the backstairs influence which in this case had been directed against a gentleman who bore as high a character as any hon. Member of this House.

MR. LONGFIELD said that, though differing from that gentleman in politics, he felt bound to defend Mr. Demoleyns, the Commissioner, from the unjust attack which he thought had been made against him during the discussion. No hole-and-corner meeting had been held, but the inquiry was entered upon after full notice, and was fully and fairly attended. Mr. O'Donnell and Mr. Balfe, who were the parties on either side, both assented when asked whether the evidence should be given on oath, and the Commissioner had not acted illegally in taking it. He (Mr. Longfield) deprecated these Commissions, which were unconstitutional, and followed precedents set in bad times. But as those precedents had been followed in the present case, no person could have been selected from the bar who was more likely to do justice than Mr. Demoleyns; and before his decision was given all the parties expressed their satisfaction with the strict impartiality and ability evinced by him throughout the proceedings.

MR. GEORGE said, there was no more distinguished lawyer at the Irish bar than Mr. Demoleyns; but the House should not suffer its attention to be distracted from the real question at issue here by the character of the individual selected as Commissioner. He was not aware of any general law which in such an inquiry allowed a Commissioner to take evidence on oath, and so doubtful was Mr. Demoleyns as to the extent of his authority, that he had at first declined to examine on oath at all, and only did so when the parties concurred. But was it fair, on such an inquisitorial, if not illegal, inquiry, to call on any man to be sworn? If Mr. Balfe had refused, it would have appeared as though he was afraid to meet the charge. It was only proper that the House should know that Mr. O'Donnell, who appeared as the accuser, was the acting Parliamentary agent of the candidate favoured by the Castle, but opposed by Mr. Balfe, at the Roscommon election. As to the conduct of the Government in striking off Mr. Balfe's name from the list of sheriffs, he admitted that it was in the power of the Executive to displace a gentleman from the list, but they ought, when called upon, to show satisfactory reasons for so doing. If the course pursued in Mr. Balfe's case were followed, no man's character in the land would be safe. He trusted that they would never hear of such Commissions again. Upon a charge of aiding and abetting the personation of a voter, it was the duty of the Government to have instituted a criminal prosecution. As it was, Mr. Demoleyn's acquittal was not so full and fair as it should have been. He ought not to have alluded to complicated evidence, which afforded some reason

Bill of last year. The result was that the penalties were small, but certain. The remedy proposed by the hon. Baronet was that the defeated candidate, if successful in his petition, should be entitled to the seat, if he were able to show a majority of legal votes. He knew not whether the House would be willing to maintain that principle. The greatest temptation to resort to bribery arose when parties were evenly balanced. Now, in the event of bribery being committed, the defeated candidate had already a remedy, but one certainly not without expense. There were, however, ways and means by which a remedy could be given without such expense. Why should not the party who successfully prosecuted an election petition as well as an action at law be entitled to his costs? It had been suggested, too, that the borough itself should pay the expenses, and that suggestion might in some cases be a very fair one, but the chief attention of the House ought to be directed to making it certain that inquiry would take place in every case where it was necessary, and in relieving the person who had suffered an injury from the expense. With regard to paid canvassers, there were very few boroughs in the kingdom where such persons were employed, and if in any case such a mode of influencing votes were resorted to an Election Committee would be almost certain to look upon it as prima facie grounds for concluding that corruption had been resorted to. But the clause in the Bill relating to this subject he was afraid would be found utterly unworkable. It was of little use to say that no voter should be employed as messenger, paid canvasser, or the like, for where it was wished to influence votes in this way, it would be easy to evade the prohibition by employing the voter's son, or any other near relative. It would be perfectly possible to carry out the intentions of the clause in another way. It might be left, for instance, to the election auditor to say how many messengers would be required on each side. Considering the subject generally, however, he would give his cordial support to the second reading.

MR. COLLIER said, that if the Bill had proposed that every one guilty of bribery should be hanged or transported for life, the remarks of the hon. Member for Reading (Sir F. Goldsmid) might be apposite, but he seemed to overlook the fact that the penalties inflicted by the Act varied from a minimum of one day's imprisonment to a maximum of six months' with hard labour. To the coupling of hard labour with imprisonment he attached some importance, for, though hon. Gentlemen did not scruple in that House to talk about bribery as an odious and degrading offence, yet, if the public remarked that there was a great disinclination to give the Judges power to inflict a degrading punishment, there would be a great disposition to reproach them with not being in earnest in suppressing this abuse. He should certainly support that particular clause in the Bill, and it would be a test to the public of the sincerity of the House. Pecuniary penalties bore hard upon the poor, but allowed the rich to escape. The spectacle of an hon. or right hon. Gentleman doing useful work on Dartmouth Farm or on the Portland Breakwater would have a great effect, and convince the public that bribery was not so gentlemanly a fault after all. The Bill, in his opinion, was good as far as it went, but was somewhat incomplete. The provisions in the present Act, with regard to the election auditor, had been entirely nugatory, because no machinery had been established for the enforcement of them. On this part of the subject he should be very much inclined to borrow that part of the Bill of the hon. and learned Member for East Suffolk, which provided that every Member should be required to declare that he had paid nothing and would pay nothing except through the election auditor. With regard to oaths and declarations, he did not attach much weight to them, thinking, with Burke, that they were spiders' webs, which great and dangerous animals easily broke through, and which served only to endanger the fluttering wings of tender consciences. Sir F. Slade, for instance, a highly honourable and conscientious gentleman, would have found not the slightest difficulty in making a declaration against bribery, though it was afterwards decided that in paying the travelling expenses of a voter he had committed an act which amounted to bribery. He would insert a clause enacting that any persons making such payments should lose their seats. If a man knew what acts were prohibited, and yet did them, it was no hardship to enforce a penalty. The clause that made it a misdemeanour to employ a voter as messenger or agent was a valuable one. And as a further means of reducing the cost of elections, he did not see why the election auditor should not decide on what expenses should be incurred. He

Bill for regulating the weights carried by racehorses. The ridiculously light weights now carried in some cases led to gambling practices on the turf, and were, he believed, exceedingly prejudicial to the breed of horses. At one time Parliament imposed restrictions on the weights allowed to be run at races; and although that Act had been repealed, the evil now prevailed to such an extent, that, although it might not be possible to remedy it altogether, something ought to be done. Every one, he thought, would admit that if a horse could not carry seven stone he could be of no use except to swell the crowd of horses in a race, and could not answer any legitimate purpose of racing. He proposed to enact by his Bill, that after the 1st January, 1861, no horse should start for any racing prize carrying less than seven stone, under penalty of forfeiture of the horse and £200. The penalty was made recoverable by any person whatever in the superior courts, and the person suing should be entitled to one moiety of the penalty, the other moiety being applicable to a weight for age race over the same course on which the illegal race had been run. The offender was also to pay double costs. He would not at present name a day for the second reading, in order that persons interested might have sufficient time for considering the matter.

MOTION FOR A PAPER. OBSERVATIONS.

LORD EBURY said, he wished to make a statement with respect to a matter which was discussed by their Lordships on Monday last. On that evening he moved for the Return of a copy of the Memorial presented to the Archbishop of Canterbury in the year 1851, from certain clergymen of the English Church, praying for alterations in the burial service, and for his Grace's reply thereto. He was told in answer by his noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack that it was not within the competence of their Lordships' House to order such a Return, the Memorial in question being a private document. He (Lord Ebury) then stated that he believed there were precedents for the Motion he had made, but could not at the moment remember them, and consented to withdraw his Motion. He was better acquainted with the proceedings of the other House of Parliament than with those of their Lordships, and he found that there the precedents were altogether in his favour. In 1854, for example, Mr. Heywood moved for an Address to the Crown for a copy of the alterations in the Book of Common Prayer, proposed by the Commissioners appointed in 1789, which was in the hands of the Archbishop of Canterbury. On that occasion the Motion was resisted by Mr. Goulburn; but the House of Commons overruled the objections, and the Return asked for by Mr. Heywood was ordered by the House. Again, so recently as yesterday, a Motion was made in the other House for a copy of the correspondence which had taken place between the Bishop of London and the rector of St. George's-in-the-East, and though an objection was taken to the Motion, it was nevertheless agreed to by the House. According to the precedents in "another place," therefore, he was perfectly justified in making the Motion he did. His object was to make the paper for which he moved the foundation of a Motion before their Lordships, and he still thought it was competent for them to order the production of the paper.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR had no doubt that his noble Friend was animated by the most laudable intentions in the Motion he made the other night, and that he believed he was following a regular course in doing so. He (the Lord Chancellor) had, nevertheless, felt it to be his duty to draw their Lordships' attention to the subject, and to submit whether it would not be an anomalous thing for them to order that the Paper moved for should be produced. It was the unanimous opinion of all present that it was not competent for their Lordships to do so, and the noble Earl (the Earl of Derby) pointed out in forcible language the difficulties and inconveniences of such a course. There were two modes by which his noble Friend could have moved for the production of the Papers in question. He could have done so by moving a direct Order of the House; but it was evident that their Lordships could not have enforced such an Order, or he might have proposed an Address to the Crown to order the Paper to be laid on the table; but neither would the Crown have had any power to enforce its production. There was no power either with their lordships or the Crown to compel the Archbishop of Canterbury to produce a particular book or memorial from his library. His doubtful question; but he should be sorry to affirm, without further consideration, the principle of an enactment that took away from a witness the power of refusing to give an answer that might criminate himself. As to the working of the Corrupt Practices Act and the appointment of election auditors, it had proved nugatory or worse than nugatory, inasmuch as it had been used as a screen for corruption. It must, therefore, be repealed or very extensively altered. But he did not think it safe to adopt all the alterations proposed by the present Bill without a full inquiry by a competent Committee. As to the prohibition of paying voters as messengers, the principle was good, but it could be evaded with the greatest ease. The prohibition only applied to persons actually on the register; but their friends or relatives, not on the register, could be employed. Nor did he think they should go the length of saying that no person on the register should be employed during an election. The prohibition would defeat itself. The law now disqualified any election agents from voting; yet it was well known that they did vote on each side. What he would suggest to the hon. and learned Member was, that instead of asking the House to affirm the principle of his Bill by the second reading, he should consent to the appointment of a Committee to inquire into the operation of the Corrupt Practices Act; the Committee would have all the Bills on the subject before it, and after such an inquiry, the House would be better prepared to deal with it. Such a course need not involve any needless delay, for, as both Bills now stood, they must be separately discussed, whereas a Committee would consider the provisions of both measures, without further delay. As to the suggestion of the hon. Member for Reading (Sir F. Goldsmid) that the defeated candidate, if he had the majority of unbought votes, should take the seat, this was no more than an Election Committee had now the power of deciding. It could, in that case, give the seat declared void for bribery to the candidate who had not bribed.

SIR FRANCIS GOLDSMID explained, that when he made the suggestion he was quite aware of the state of the law on this point.

MR. MACAULAY observed, that the House did not sufficiently bear in mind one fact. In every election acts were done which must be known to many people were acts of bribery. Yet the public did not think fit to call for any prosecutions for this offence. How it could enter the mind of any one that visiting it with imprisonment and hard labour would stimulate unwilling prosecutors, he could not conceive. He had heard with great surprise the emphatic denunciation of the Corrupt Practices Act by the right hon. Baronet opposite (Sir George Grey). He, as a Minister of the Crown, followed the suit of the Gloucester and Wakefield Commissioners, and assented to the evidence given by three gentlemen who stood in the position of having flagrantly, he might say, impudently, violated the enactments of that Bill, which were very easily carried out, and very effective where carried out. What was the plain principle of the Act? That all disbursements of money should be through the candidate's agent for election expenses, and should undergo the supervision of the election auditors. That injunction was plainly to be obeyed, it was easy to be obeyed, and if obeyed it would lead necessarily to this result—that no money of the candidate could be disbursed except publicly, for the auditors' accounts were published in the newspapers; and, inasmuch as 9-10ths, if not 99-100ths of the money corruptly expended came directly or indirectly from the pocket of the candidates, this provision, duly complied with, would dry up the whole of that source of corrupt expenditure. It was in evidence before the auditors, however, that the money paid at those elections was not paid in the manner prescribed, but was obtained from quarters with which that evidence had made them all familiar. How, then, such a provision could be said to be wholly and entirely nugatory and required to be replaced by others of a different character, he could not understand. But he was aware that the institution of the election auditor might be materially improved. He would, therefore, suggest that the statement laid before the auditor should be open to the inspection, attack, and criticism of the agent for the other side, who should be allowed to go into all the items. This he thought would be a great protection. The hon. and learned Member for Plymouth (Mr. Collier) had not only asserted the nugatory character of the provision in regard to the election auditor, but accompanied his statement by a reference to Sir F. Slade which he thought rather unfortunate for his argument. The hon. Gentleman had stated that Sir F.

tended, though the provision was nominally binding upon both Powers, that there was much reciprocity in this stipulation. Nor in the course of the Correspondence respecting the Treaty could he find the remotest allusion to such an engagement on the part either of the French or the English Government. In that correspondence the subject of the coal trade was twice adverted to. In Lord Cowley's despatch to Lord John Russell, dated the 23rd of December, 1859, he stated that Count Walewski had informed him on the 22nd of December that he had had a conversation with Mr. Cobden which might lead to very important results; that, among other arrangements, the French Government might be disposed to admit British coal imported overland "at the same rate of duties as Belgian coal—seaborne coal to be subjected to the present duty for five years, when they would be assimilated to coal introduced overland." Lord John Russell, in his reply, dated the 17th of January, 1860, speaking of his desire that some of the commodities not now prohibited by the French tariff should be selected for early reduction, went on to say:—

"An allusion is, indeed, made by Count Walewski to British coal; but such is the market for that commodity, both in this country and abroad, that no public interest would be excited upon the question whether the duty charged on it in France is to be high or low, or whether the remission is to be immediate or postponed. Indeed, there still remains more or less of a disposition, which formerly was strong, to view the export of coal with jealousy, or even to subject it to fiscal restriction."

Lord John Russell then proceeded to state what reductions in the tariff Her Majesty's Government was prepared to make in favour of French goods, and to intimate what relaxations in the French Tariff he expected in return. On the 31st of January the Treaty was received at the Foreign Office, and Lord John Russell wrote on the same day to Lord Cowley and Mr. Cobden, to convey to them Her Majesty's approval of the able and judicious manner in which the negotiations had been carried to a successful issue, and to intimate that the ratification of the Treaty would be sent to Lord Cowley as soon as it was ready. But not once in the correspondence—neither in the original proposal of Count Walewski, nor in the more fully developed proposal of Lord John Russell—nor in the despatch conveying Her Majesty's approval—was the engagement contained in the 11th Article of the

Treaty even hinted at. It would really seem as if no equivalent whatever had been asked for in return for this concession on the part of England—as if it had been contemptuously thrown into the bargain as something too insignificant to be thought worth mentioning. Now, no one would plead that this was a matter of reciprocity; for though it was true that the engagement was equally binding on both countries, no one could expect that England would ever import coal from France. He did not wish to lay much stress upon the circumstance that so long as this Treaty should continue in force we should be cut off from one source of revenue of which we might otherwise have availed ourselves, though there were high authorities in political economy who were in favour of an export duty on coal. The question had another and, as it seemed to him, a much more serious aspect. No one, he thought, would deny that the matter had strong political bearings. He took for granted, what he believed was now universally admitted, that the issue of the next struggle which might take place upon the seas would be decided by steam. We in England, at least, were so satisfied of this that we had ceased to build any other vessels than steamships for purposes of war, and we had, at great expense, converted many of our sailing vessels into steamers. All other maritime nations were, he believed, imitating our example more or less rapidly. But from this state of things, it would follow, as a matter of course, that, other things being equal, that nation would have a great advantage in naval warfare, which, having itself coal in great abundance, and of good quality, was able to cut off supplies of coal suitable for steamers from countries with whom it might be at war. Now, we were at present in this position. It so happened that we had not only more extensive coal-fields than any other nation in Europe, but that there was to be found in great abundance within these islands a kind of coal, commonly known by the name of steam-coal, better adapted for steam navigation than that which was possessed by any other European nation. Owing to its greater density, its bulk in proportion to its weight was very small, compared with the other kinds of coal, so that a much greater number of tons could be stowed away in the hold of a ship. At the same time a given weight of this description of coal would generate a much greater quan-

should not have been incurred. He would recommend the hon. and learned Gentleman to accede to the suggestion of the right hon. Baronet.

MR. MELLOR said, that of himself he felt disposed to accede to the proposal of the right hon. Baronet the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (Sir George Grey), although he still retained strong opinions of the necessity of the two clauses, depriving witnesses of the privilege of not answering questions put to them, and increasing the punishment which should be awarded under the Act. For both of these he was prepared to adduce strong reasons, but he would not now detain the House. He gave his consent to the proposal of the right hon. Baronet.

MR. EDWIN JAMES said, he would then, as a matter of form, move the Amendment of which he had given notice.

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. and learned Member has given notice, "After the second reading of the Corrupt Practices Prevention Act (1854) Amendment Bill, to move that the Bill be committed to a Select Committee." The question now is that the Motion for the Second Reading be withdrawn.

CORRUPT PRACTICES PREVENTION ACT (1854).

MR. EDWIN JAMES said, that with the permission of the House he would move that a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the operation and effect of the Corrupt Practices Prevention Act (1854), and whether any further measures are necessary for the prevention of corrupt practices at elections. He would trouble the House with a very few observations, because he understood the House had practically agreed to the reference. It was desirable, however, that a system should be adopted by which something like honesty and purity of election might be secured. The hon. Baronet the Member for Reading had suggested that the petitioning candidate, after bringing home a charge of bribery, should have the seat even without a majority of legal votes. This would entirely overturn the lex et consuetudo Parliamenti. In fact, a proposition more monstrous and unconstitutional as a specific against bribery he was at a loss to conceive. As the hon. and learned Member for Nottingham had withdrawn his Bill he would not now revive the discussion; but there were great difficulties in the question, and the main reason why he had given notice of this Motion was, that being now early in the Session, they might, by the appointment of a Committee of Members thoroughly conversant with the subject, if the House were sincere, proceed to the enactment of some real measure to put a stop to bribery. The Corrupt Practices Prevention Act of 1854 was the emanation of a Parliamentary Committee; to a certain extent it had worked well; but he must say what little experience he had entirely corroborated what had been stated by the right hon. Baronet (Sir G. Grey), that in practice the provision in respect to the election auditor had become perfectly nugatory. He could not give a stronger evidence of this than the fact that after the last election there were twenty-six or twenty-seven Election Committees, and in no single instance had the return been made by the election auditor in time to come before the Committee. The election auditor's returns almost invariably came in after the petition had been tried. He did not mean to say that, with additional safeguards, the institution might not be made a valuable one; but, practically, at present it was utterly illusory. He trusted the result of the Committee would be the production of some rational measure calculated to do away with the serious evils now complained of; for, as the great historian who had just passed away from us truly observed, the history of Parliamentary corruption remained yet to be written. He trusted that blot, which sullied and disgraced our institutions, would, as the result of the investigation of this Committee, be speedily swept away, leaving pure, as it ought to be, the noblest institution which a free people was ever permitted to enjoy.

MR. SERJEANT KINGLAKE said, he rose to second the Motion, as he thought that the right hon. Baronet had taken the right course in recommending that the subject should be left to the consideration of a Select Committee. He (Mr. Serjeant Kinglake) felt that this question was one not only of serious importance, but of great difficulty. It was quite clear that hitherto the Legislature had failed in accomplishing its great object in the suppression of corrupt practices at elections. It was very easy to introduce a speculative remedy; what was required was a clear, distinct, and practical remedy. The Corrupt Practices Prevention Act would have better deserved its name if it had been called the Corrupt Practices Protection Act. That measure might have been good enough in the intention of its framers; but it had woefully failed in practice. The Gloucester Election Committee stated in their Report that the office of election auditor existed only to delude the Legislature and the public—that instead of aiding in the detection of electoral abuses it acted as a screen to prevent their exposure. What was wanted to put down corruption was not so much severe penalties and more stringent laws as increased means of detection. If there had been a strong feeling out of doors against bribery the law would have been put in force and found effective, but then there was a freemasonry carried on on both sides in the boroughs where bribery was practised, which rendered the discovery of delinquents most difficult. Of late years the Election Committees of that House had, happily, been more earnest and more honest in the discharge of their duties; and in exact proportion as Members petitioned against found that their seats were really in peril candidates became more scrupulous as to the practices they sanctioned at the time of an election. By facilitating inquiry and improving the tribunal to which election petitions were referred, more would be done towards eradicating this evil than by sentencing hundreds of men to hard labour, or by making Members of that House take oaths at the table, and enter, as it were, into recognizances for their future conduct. He begged to second the Motion.

MR. PHILIPPS remarked, that notwithstanding all that had been said to the contrary the Corrupt Practices Act had been attended with good results. It was true that much remained to be done to extirpate electoral corruption, but the tendency of things was towards improvement. The disclosures at Gloucester showed that while thousands had been spent there at recent elections, tens of thousands used to be spent in the same manner in former times. The mode of appointing the election auditor might be improved if his nomination were in the hands of some authority unconnected with the locality. The power of scrutinizing election accounts or of appointing the officer who was to scrutinize them, might be safely intrusted to the revising barrister. If the House were to inflict excessive penalties on persons guilty of bribery, a revulsion of feeling might be excited in favour of the offenders, it would be much better to make such persons the objects of public ridicule and contempt than to elevate them into the position of martyrs. The worst kind of manufacture was that of martyrs.

MR. PULLER observed, it was the wisest course to refer this and the other Bills on the same subject to the Select Committee. A remark had been made with respect to the Hull Election Committee to the effect that there was a failure of justice, because while one man was condemned another escaped. That was a defect incidental to every mode of administering justice, because unless a man, whatever his guilt, were accused and sufficient evidence was brought against him he could not be punished. The way to prevent colourable employment at elections would be to disqualify voters engaged by either candidate from voting at elections.

MR. WYKEHAM MARTIN said, that one cause of the non-appearance of prosecutors for bribery, was the general repugnance of the English people to qui tam actions, the only remedy which the law provided for the offence. He did not think the appointment of a public prosecutor would remedy the evil. The other day the House ordered the prosecution of two persons for bribery at the Beverley election; and what was the result? Anybody who referred to The Times of the day preceding, would find that at a public meeting of the inhabitants of Beverley, not consisting exclusively of one party, but even comprising some opponents of the two convicted bribers, strong resolutions were passed condemnatory of the course taken by that House, and pledging the meeting to resist such “an attack on the liberties of Beverley.” It appeared from this that, in one borough at least, it was thought perfectly legitimate to bribe. When bribery was the subject of jests in the periodical literature of the day, it was plain that the tone of the public mind required elevating. He had had the good fortune to be engaged in three election contests in which the solicitors on both sides thought they would have been disgraced by taking a fee for their services. He had had some difficulty in prevailing on one professional gentleman to accept a fee for acting as election agent. It was no less bribery for a solicitor to take a retainer of twenty-five guineas than for a poor voter to take five shillings for loitering about a committee-room as a messenger.

Mr. Serjeant Kinglake

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said that one source of corruption hitherto overlooked took the form of loans from candidates to their constituents. Applications were sometimes made to a Member for loans after his return; and though these transactions might not appear to either party concerned to be at variance with law or morals, there was no doubt that the money being given in consideration of political support they were essentially corrupt. Such loans would naturally influence future votes, without any further money being necessarily passed to the recipients about the time of another election. The Committee to whom this question was to be referred, while endeavouring to stop up all the other channels of corruption, ought not to neglect the one which he had indicated.

MR. ANGERSTEIN hoped that the Committee would inquire into the whole question of election expenses, particularly into the system of employing paid canvassers. The masses of the people, he believed, desired to have the expenses of elections diminished. A very great source of expense, however, was the machinery created by Parliament itself.

MR. CAVE said, he did not believe that bribery was to be put down by severity alone. Certainty of detection and punishment would, in his opinion, be more efficacious. With reference to the payment of the travelling expenses of voters, he would suggest that it could hardly be made illegal without, in some counties, rendering necessary the erection of a polling place for only a dozen or so of voters.

MR. W. VANSITTART said, he wished to call attention to the influence which might be exercised by collectors of rates and taxes, and to express a hope that they would be placed in the same position as election auditors, and forbidden to take any part, direct or indirect, in elections.

Motion agreed to.

Select Committee appointed—

"To inquire into the operation and effect of the Corrupt Practices Prevention Act (1854), and whether any and what further measures are necessary for the prevention of Corrupt Practices at Elections."

ELECTION PETITIONS ACT (1848) AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING DEFERRED.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, he hoped the Second Reading of this measure would not be pressed to-day, as it formed a portion of a much larger measure which was at present in course of preparation by the Secretary of State for the Home Department.

Second Reading deferred till Wednesday next.

SECOND READING.

MR. SCHOLEFIELD said, that in moving the Second Reading of this Bill, he wished to explain that the principal provisions of the measure were to impose penalties upon persons who sold impure articles as warranted pure, to enable Corporations to appoint analysts, to authorize persons buying goods to take them to such analysts to be examined, and to make their certificates evidence in case no testimony was produced to contradict them. It was almost identical with the Bill which he introduced last Session. There were some slight changes, and if any other improvements could be introduced, he should be glad to adopt them. The Bill was one of importance, especially to the working classes, and he hoped the second reading would be allowed to pass.

MR. EDWIN JAMES would not oppose the second reading; but it contained several points with regard to the appointment of analysts, and other matters, which required to be considered with care in Committee.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, that as the Bill was very similar to the Bill of last Session, the principle of which had been affirmed by a large majority, he should not oppose the second reading. But it was not to be understood that he pledged himself to all the details, some of which required to be considered with care and attention.

Bill read 2^o and Committed for Wednesday 29th February.

CASE OF MR. BALFE.

COLONEL DUNNE said, he rose to move for a copy of the Commission for an Inquiry into the conduct of Mr. Balfe, a magistrate of the County of Roscommon, accused of having committed a criminal offence; together with the Report of the Commissioners appointed to make the inquiry, and correspondence connected therewith. He believed, upon high legal authority, that all such Commissions as that referred to in his notice were illegal, and that the Commissioners had no right whatever to administer an oath to any witnesses whom they examined. Mr. Balfe took part in the election for Roscommon, and he was charged with subornation of perjury and attempted personation. The charge was not made at the time of the election, but upon a subsequent occasion, at the period for appointing sheriffs for the counties. His name stood first on the list of three gentlemen recommended by the Judges to the Lord Lieutenant; but, nevertheless, he was passed over, and one of the other two was appointed sheriff for Roscommon. Mr. Balfe requested an explanation. The Chief Secretary replied, that it was not the practice for the Lord Lieutenant to state the reasons of his choice; but, on applying to the Lord Chancellor, Mr. Balfe was informed that he had been passed over because a charge had been made against him in connection with the Roscommon election. The Lord Chancellor proposed to issue a Commission to inquire into the charge. Mr. Balfe protested against such an inquiry, but his protest was unavailing; for Mr. Demoleyns, a gentleman at the bar, of high character and reputation, was appointed to investigate the charge. Mr. Balfe protested against being placed on his trial before such a tribunal; but not wishing to shrink from vindicating his character under any circumstances, he consented to appear before that gentleman. Mr. Demoleyns went into evidence, and made a Report which completely exculpated Mr. Balfe from the guilt of perjury and personation. Within the last few days he had received a letter from the Lord Lieutenant stating that the report entirely absolved him. So the matter stood. Mr. Balfe had been exculpated, but he had been subjected to an impolitic and unconstitutional inquiry. Now he (Colonel Dunne) wished to point out the difficulty into which the Government must get by issuing these illegal Commissions; especially in cases involving political motives. The legal way of trying a man charged with such an offence, was to take him before a magistrate, or to prefer an indictment in the Court of Queen's Bench against him; and Mr. Balfe complained that neither of those courses had been adopted. The practice of appointing these Commissions was inconvenient, illegal, and fraught with all kinds of mischief. It had never been followed in England; and, if it were to be continued in Ireland, they might as well have another Star

Colonel Dunne

Chamber in that country. There was nothing whatever to justify the accusation against Mr. Balfe. No doubt the Lord Lieutenant was not bound to give any reason why the Crown passed him over; but the Lord Chancellor had imprudently made known the reason, and thus rendered it necessary for him to vindicate his character against a charge which had not been proved. He hoped the Government would give an assurance that the practice he had condemned would now cease.

Mr. CARDWELL said, the hon. and gallant Member had brought forward the Motion in the fairest manner, and had stated the case with accuracy. He had admitted that the course pursued was the same as that adopted in former cases of the same kind, though he had not mentioned, as he might have done, that it was prescribed by statute in regard to magistrates appointed under the Constabulary Act: the Commission to inquire into the charge preferred against Mr. Balfe was issued, therefore, in accordance with both law and practice. He (Mr. Cardwell) was happy to say that he would agree to the Motion for the production of all the papers on the subject. It was desirable that the House should be in possession of these documents before it entered into a discussion of the case; but he was anxious now to state what actually happened. The law cast upon the Lord Lieutenant the duty of selecting sheriffs for the several counties. Three names were submitted to him by the Judges, and it was usual to select the first on the list. It was, however, not his duty to take that first name; and in the very same county, not long ago, that usage was departed from. The gentleman first on the list, who was then passed over, wrote to inquire the reason, and he received an answer that the Lord Lieutenant had appointed one gentleman whose name was on the list to the office of High Sheriff, and that he could not recognize on the part of any other gentleman, whatever position he might occupy on the list, a right to raise a question why he was not himself the object of choice. It was quite clear that such a right was not recognized either by law or practice; but then it might be said that by refusing to give a reason they would pain the feelings of the gentleman concerned, and injure his character and position. Mr. Balfe was invited to return an answer to the charge, and he distinctly denied its truth. There being this absolute contradiction of fact, a gentleman of the highest respectability at the bar was appointed to investigate the matter. Both parties appeared before him, and were heard by counsel. The hon. and gallant Member asked why there had not been a criminal trial, but a greater hardship could scarcely have been practised upon Mr. Balfe than by the Government instituting criminal proceedings in such a case. The evidence was conflicting, but Mr. Balfe distinctly denied that he was guilty of any attempt to personate a voter. Mr. Demoleyns reported that he was of opinion that the charge against Mr. Balfe, and contained in a letter written by Mr. O'Donnell, had not been sustained; but he added that though he had, satisfactorily to himself, arrived at that conclusion, he was of opinion that the circumstances proved before him justified Mr. O'Donnell in demanding the inquiry and in subsequently pressing for it. The Lord Lieutenant then communicated to Mr. Balfe the result of the Commission, and stated that in his estimation Mr. Balfe's character was entirely unaffected by the charge. The general question as to issuing these Commissions was a separate matter, but with regard to the present case he trusted the House would suspend its judgment until all the papers were on the table.

MR. WHITESIDE said, he wished to ask where the right hon. Gentleman found his authority for instituting such an inquiry. He had stated—adroitly, but not candidly—that under the Constabulary Act the Crown had power to investigate by Commission the conduct of its own officers. The very fact, however, that there was an Act providing a particular mode of investigation for the case of stipendiary magistrates might have suggested to the clear mind of the right hon. Gentleman that there was no power under that statute to try any other class of the Queen's subjects. It was, unquestionably, illegal to issue a Commission to inquire whether Mr. Balfe, who was not a stipendiary magistrate, had stood by while somebody voted who ought not to have done so; and the gentleman who administered an oath to Mr. Balfe had rendered himself liable to be indicted. The inquiry, in short, was illegal alike in its inception and in its conduct. In the case of another similar Commission, a newspaper which had innocently published the proceedings was prosecuted for so doing, and did not get its costs. Such inquiries were illegal, and the administration of oaths by those who conducted them was forbidden by positive law. Again, he would ask how the cost of these proceedings was defrayed. He supposed that it came out of the Consolidated Fund in some shape or other; but, however this might be, it would be better to let the common law of England prevail in Ireland. The principle involved in the appointment of such a Commission was a most improper, and it might prove a most dangerous one.

MR. BERNAL OSBORNE said, that he was delighted that the Secretary for Ireland was not mixed up in these proceedings, for if he were, he should have lost all confidence in the Government of Ireland. If this case, which appeared to excite so little interest, had occurred in England, every country gentleman in the commission of the peace would have come down and protested against so unheard-of and despotic exercise of power on the part of the Executive. He knew nothing of Mr. Balfe, except that he was a Roman Catholic gentleman of liberal opinions and of large property. At the last election for Roscommon, Mr. Balfe opposed the Castle interest, and since that time he seemed to have been a marked man. What would have happened if the late Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Whiteside) had acted in the way complained of? Would not hon. Members on the Ministerial side have denounced his conduct in words as strong as the English language could supply? The House was equally bound to watch the system of government, or rather no government, which at present existed in Ireland. Had the Chief Secretary been there, this Commission would never have been issued, for the right hon. Gentleman was far too prudent to give reasons for striking a sheriff's name off the list. The fact was that all this was done by the backstairs influence at Dublin Castle. His right hon. Friend (Mr. Cardwell) had endeavoured to take the House off the scent by referring to what the Government were empowered to do in the case of the paid magistracy; but Mr. Balfe was no paid magistrate, and could not be dealt with in any such way. He had been struck off the list of sheriffs, and, upon demanding an explanation, the Lord Lieutenant very imprudently furnished him with one. "Oh that mine enemy would give a reason!" Mr. Balfe might have said; and the Lord Lieutenant did give a reason, declaring that during the election Mr. Balfe had been a party to the personation of a voter. Then a correspondence ensued between Mr. Balfe and the present Lord Chancellor, in which the latter got the worst of it, both in law and logic. Mr. Balfe demanded that the charges against him should be brought forward in the light of day. He disapproved of the Commission, but said he would come before it. He did appear accordingly, and was entirely acquitted. The inference which he (Mr. Osborne) drew from all this was that the present mode of governing Ireland was unsatisfactory; that backstairs influence was predominant there; that men's characters might be whispered away; and that if they did not happen to be on the list of high sheriffs they would never know the reason why. The people of Ireland were in favour of the Lord-Lieutenancy, and he should not attempt to disturb their decision; but at the same time he thought there might be a great reform in the system. At present it was a grotesque burlesque; but if it was to be a pageant, at least it should be a solemn pageant, and not one brought into play merely for such things as the inauguration of baths and washhouses. If such a case had happened under the Earl of Eglintoun, every Irishman would have started up to denounce it. As it was, wishing to deal impartially with such questions, and looking upon the present Lord Lieutenant as a man well formed to adorn private life, he thanked his hon. and gallant Friend for bringing the subject under notice. The accusation against Mr. Balfe was preferred in quite a Venetian manner, though to say that the letter was dropped into the lion's mouth would be to cast a slur upon that noble animal. This discussion would lead men to question the expediency of continuing the government of Ireland by means of a Lord Lieutenancy, or, at any rate, it would show that the Lord Lieutenant's powers should be scrutinized more severely than at present. He hoped the result would be to give a blow to the backstairs influence which in this case had been directed against a gentleman who bore as high a character as any hon. Member of this House.

MR. LONGFIELD said that, though differing from that gentleman in politics, he felt bound to defend Mr. Demoleyns, the Commissioner, from the unjust attack which he thought had been made against him during the discussion. No hole-and-corner meeting had been held, but the inquiry was entered upon after full notice, and was fully and fairly attended. Mr. O'Donnell and Mr. Balfe, who were the parties on either side, both assented when asked whether the evidence should be given on oath, and the Commissioner had not acted illegally in taking it. He (Mr. Longfield) deprecated these Commissions, which were unconstitutional, and followed precedents set in bad times. But as those precedents had been followed in the present case, no person could have been selected from the bar who was more likely to do justice than Mr. Demoleyns; and before his decision was given all the parties expressed their satisfaction with the strict impartiality and ability evinced by him throughout the proceedings.

MR. GEORGE said, there was no more distinguished lawyer at the Irish bar than Mr. Demoleyns; but the House should not suffer its attention to be distracted from the real question at issue here by the character of the individual selected as Commissioner. He was not aware of any general law which in such an inquiry allowed a Commissioner to take evidence on oath, and so doubtful was Mr. Demoleyns as to the extent of his authority, that he had at first declined to examine on oath at all, and only did so when the parties concurred. But was it fair, on such an inquisitorial, if not illegal, inquiry, to call on any man to be sworn? If Mr. Balfe had refused, it would have appeared as though he was afraid to meet the charge. It was only proper that the House should know that Mr. O'Donnell, who appeared as the accuser, was the acting Parliamentary agent of the candidate favoured by the Castle, but opposed by Mr. Balfe, at the Roscommon election. As to the conduct of the Government in striking off Mr. Balfe's name from the list of sheriffs, he admitted that it was in the power of the Executive to displace a gentleman from the list, but they ought, when called upon, to show satisfactory reasons for so doing. If the course pursued in Mr. Balfe's case were followed, no man's character in the land would be safe. He trusted that they would never hear of such Commissions again. Upon a charge of aiding and abetting the personation of a voter, it was the duty of the Government to have instituted a criminal prosecution. As it was, Mr. Demoleyn's acquittal was not so full and fair as it should have been. He ought not to have alluded to complicated evidence, which afforded some reason for the belief that his Report was intended to cover a rather shabby retreat on the part of the Government, or, at all events, to excuse their inadvertence in having been betrayed into such proceedings. The Government were wrong in condemning Mr. Balfe in the first instance, and then in inquiring into a charge that ought never to have been made. When these documents were produced, he (Mr. George) hoped that as a matter of public policy, and with a view to the proper administration of justice in future, the subject would receive full and searching inquiry.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, he could not help expressing his regret that as the papers were to be produced, the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. George) had entered into this case, and, besides his charges against the Executive, had directly impugned the judicial impartiality of the Commissioner, insinuating that his Report was biassed by political feelings. Being unacquainted with the facts of the case, he (Sir G. Grey) had no opinion to express respecting them; but there was, he admitted, considerable force in the objection made to inquiries conducted in this way. It should, however, be remembered that the practice was not now adopted for the first time, but had been sanctioned by precedents under former Governments. In England, although Commissions had frequently been appointed to inquire into the conduct of magistrates and of persons employed in public offices under the Crown, he did not remember that upon charges preferred against an individual magistrate merely by letter any such steps had been directed as those which appeared to be sanctioned by precedent in Ireland. The course here would be to communicate to the magistrate a copy of the statement impugning his conduct (which appeared to have been done in this case), and if his answer was unsatisfactory, or was at variance with the facts submitted to the authorities, the Lord Chancellor would employ the means at his disposal in order to satisfy himself whether the charge rested on any good foundation. As a matter of principle he (Sir G. Grey) thought that the sooner the present practice in Ireland was discontinued the better; but meanwhile it was unfair to attack the Lord Lieutenant and the Lord Chancellor for following the precedents set them, when they had selected as Commissioner a gentleman who, by common consent, was above all suspicion of partiality—at any rate until the remarks made, perhaps rather inconsiderately, by the hon. and learned Member. With respect to the administration of an oath, Mr. Demoleyns, he believed, had expressed in court an opinion that he was empowered to do so upon the consent of the parties, and it must not therefore be assumed that the Commissioner entertained any doubt on the subject.

COLONEL DUNNE said, he wished to disclaim all intention of charging Mr. Demoleyns with partiality. He had only protested against the Commissioner's administration of an oath to the witnesses, which competent authorities believed he was not warranted in doing.

Motion agreed to.

Copy ordered—

"Of the Commission for an inquiry into the conduct of Mr. Balfe, a Magistrate of the county of Roscommon, accused of having committed a criminal offence; together with the Report of the Commissioners appointed to make the inquiry, and Correspondence connected therewith."

ST. GEORGE'S-IN-THE-EAST.

CORRESPONDENCE MOVED FOR.

MR. BUTLER said, he rose to move for a copy of all correspondence that had taken place between the Rev. Bryan King, the vestry of St. George's-in-the-East, and the Bishop of London, relative to the disturbances in the parish church.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, that unless the correspondence was in possession of a Government department, the House had no power to order its production.

Mr. BUTLER said, that both the Bishop of London and the Home Office had agreed to the return being made.

Motion agreed to.

House adjourned at a quarter after Five o'clock.

LIGHT WEIGHT RACING BILL.

BILL PRESENTED. FIRST READING.

LORD REDESDALE said, he had to ask their Lordships to give a first reading to a

Bill for regulating the weights carried by racehorses. The ridiculously light weights now carried in some cases led to gambling practices on the turf, and were, he believed, exceedingly prejudicial to the breed of horses. At one time Parliament imposed restrictions on the weights allowed to be run at races; and although that Act had been repealed, the evil now prevailed to such an extent, that, although it might not be possible to remedy it altogether, something ought to be done. Every one, he thought, would admit that if a horse could not carry seven stone he could be of no use except to swell the crowd of horses in a race, and could not answer any legitimate purpose of racing. He proposed to enact by his Bill, that after the 1st January, 1861, no horse should start for any racing prize carrying less than seven stone, under penalty of forfeiture of the horse and £200. The penalty was made recoverable by any person whatever in the superior courts, and the person suing should be entitled to one moiety of the penalty, the other moiety being applicable to a weight for age race over the same course on which the illegal race had been run. The offender was also to pay double costs. He would not at present name a day for the second reading, in order that persons interested might have sufficient time for considering the matter.

Bill to prevent the entering or running Horses carrying very light weights for any Plate or Money, presented, and read 1^a.

ALTERATIONS IN THE PRAYER BOOK.

MOTION FOR A PAPER. OBSERVATIONS.

LORD EBURY said, he wished to make a statement with respect to a matter which was discussed by their Lordships on Monday last. On that evening he moved for the Return of a copy of the Memorial presented to the Archbishop of Canterbury in the year 1851, from certain clergymen of the English Church, praying for alterations in the burial service, and for his Grace's reply thereto. He was told in answer by his noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack that it was not within the competence of their Lordships' House to order such a Return, the Memorial in question being a private document. He (Lord Ebury) then stated that he believed there were precedents for the Motion he had made, but could not at the moment remember them, and consented to withdraw his Motion. He was better acquainted with the proceedings of the other House of Parliament than with those of their Lordships, and he found that there the precedents were altogether in his favour. In 1854, for example, Mr. Heywood moved for an Address to the Crown for a copy of the alterations in the Book of Common Prayer, proposed by the Commissioners appointed in 1789, which was in the hands of the Archbishop of Canterbury. On that occasion the Motion was resisted by Mr. Goulburn; but the House of Commons overruled the objections, and the Return asked for by Mr. Heywood was ordered by the House. Again, so recently as yesterday, a Motion was made in the other House for a copy of the correspondence which had taken place between the Bishop of London and the rector of St. George's-in-the-East, and though an objection was taken to the Motion, it was nevertheless agreed to by the House. According to the precedents in "another place," therefore, he was perfectly justified in making the Motion he did. His object was to make the paper for which he moved the foundation of a Motion before their Lordships, and he still thought it was competent for them to order the production of the paper.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR had no doubt that his noble Friend was animated by the most laudable intentions in the Motion he made the other night, and that he believed he was following a regular course in doing so. He (the Lord Chancellor) had, nevertheless, felt it to be his duty to draw their Lordships' attention to the subject, and to submit whether it would not be an anomalous thing for them to order that the Paper moved for should be produced. It was the unanimous opinion of all present that it was not competent for their Lordships to do so, and the noble Earl (the Earl of Derby) pointed out in forcible language the difficulties and inconveniences of such a course. There were two modes by which his noble Friend could have moved for the production of the Papers in question. He could have done so by moving a direct Order of the House; but it was evident that their Lordships could not have enforced such an Order, or he might have proposed an Address to the Crown to order the Paper to be laid on the table; but neither would the Crown have had any power to enforce its production. There was no power either with their lordships or the Crown to compel the Archbishop of Canterbury to produce a particular book or memorial from his library. His noble Friend pointed to precedents in the other House of Parliament for such a proceeding. But precedents were not law. It was possible that such things might have been done per incuriam, but he could not believe that they were warranted by the rules of the House, and were certainly not safe models for imitation. If that was so, a Member of the other House of Parliament might obtain an order to compel his noble Friend to produce any book in his library which he might wish to lay on the table of the House. There was not the slightest necessity for the Memorial which his noble Friend moved for being laid on their Lordships' table, as a reference to it would have equally answered his purpose. Nobody, he presumed, doubted the existence of such a document.

LORD BROUGHAM said, he could not consent that their Lordships should follow the example which his noble Friend (Lord Ebury) told them had been set in "another place." He considered that by doing so they would lower themselves, not only in their own estimation, but in the eyes of the world, to a level to which that House had never yet sunk. His noble Friend said that the other House of Parliament had agreed to an Address to the Crown to cause the Archbishop of Canterbury to produce a book that was in his library. But the Crown could no more order the production of such a document than could the Houses of Parliament. No doubt as the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack had said, such was the course which had been taken; and there was another which might have been taken—namely, to proceed without an Address to the Crown, and send the Serjeant-at-Arms to the Archbishop of Canterbury to call on him to deliver up the book. Then, if the book was not given up, the Serjeant-at-Arms might follow a course resembling that taken by certain persons, not clothed with high authority, but possessed of physical force, who, meeting a man on the highway, produced, not a mace, but another instrument, probably more effectual than the sight of the awful mace, and ordered him to deliver up his purse, with an intimation that if the order was not complied with that instrument, and not entreaty, would be used for the purpose of enforcing it. He would not believe that the House of Commons could be so forgetful of the first principles of justice as to resort to that course; nor could he believe that they would address the Crown to do what was an illegal act; for the Crown had no more power than the Serjeant-at-Arms to call on the Archbishop of Canterbury to bring a book out of his library. Were it to be so far forgetful of its duty as to attempt to compel him to do so, the officers of the Crown who put this order in force would be subjected to the heaviest penalties.

LORD EBURY replied, that if their Lordships thought the precedent of the House of Commons in this respect was a bad one, he had not another word to say; but he had thought it right to direct their attention to it.

TREATY OF COMMERCE WITH FRANCE.

MOTION FOR CORRESPONDENCE.

THE EARL OF AIRLIE, pursuant to notice, moved for copies of any correspondence, in addition to that already presented to Parliament, that might have taken place between Her Majesty's Government and the British Plenipotentiaries in Paris as to the negotiation of the Treaty of Commerce with France. The noble Lord said that it was not his intention on the present occasion to provoke a discussion of the general merits of the Commercial Treaty with France which had recently been signed at Paris, nor to enter upon the question of its bearings on our financial and commercial policy. These were matters which would, no doubt, be fully discussed next week in that other assembly on whose decision the fate of commercial treaties and financial projects might be said to depend, and he had no desire to anticipate their deliberations. The object which he had now in view was, simply to endeavour to obtain from the Government some explanation of that which appeared to him a very important provision of the treaty, to which, however, he could find no reference in the correspondence respecting the negotiations which had been laid before Parliament, and to which, if his memory served him right, the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer made no allusion in the course of his speech on Friday last, though with respect to many other matters he entered into very detailed explanations. The provision to which he referred was to be found in the 11th Article of the Treaty, which ran as follows:—

It would hardly, he thought be contended, though the provision was nominally binding upon both Powers, that there was much reciprocity in this stipulation. Nor in the course of the Correspondence respecting the Treaty could he find the remotest allusion to such an engagement on the part either of the French or the English Government. In that correspondence the subject of the coal trade was twice adverted to. In Lord Cowley's despatch to Lord John Russell, dated the 23rd of December, 1859, he stated that Count Walewski had informed him on the 22nd of December that he had had a conversation with Mr. Cobden which might lead to very important results; that, among other arrangements, the French Government might be disposed to admit British coal imported overland "at the same rate of duties as Belgian coal—seaborne coal to be subjected to the present duty for five years, when they would be assimilated to coal introduced overland." Lord John Russell, in his reply, dated the 17th of January, 1860, speaking of his desire that some of the commodities not now prohibited by the French tariff should be selected for early reduction, went on to say:—

"An allusion is, indeed, made by Count Walewski to British coal; but such is the market for that commodity, both in this country and abroad, that no public interest would be excited upon the question whether the duty charged on it in France is to be high or low, or whether the remission is to be immediate or postponed. Indeed, there still remains more or less of a disposition, which formerly was strong, to view the export of coal with jealousy, or even to subject it to fiscal restriction."

Lord John Russell then proceeded to state what reductions in the tariff Her Majesty's Government was prepared to make in favour of French goods, and to intimate what relaxations in the French Tariff he expected in return. On the 31st of January the Treaty was received at the Foreign Office, and Lord John Russell wrote on the same day to Lord Cowley and Mr. Cobden, to convey to them Her Majesty's approval of the able and judicious manner in which the negotiations had been carried to a successful issue, and to intimate that the ratification of the Treaty would be sent to Lord Cowley as soon as it was ready. But not once in the correspondence—neither in the original proposal of Count Walewski, nor in the more fully developed proposal of Lord John Russell—nor in the despatch conveying Her Majesty's approval—was the engagement contained in the 11th Article of the

Treaty even hinted at. It would really seem as if no equivalent whatever had been asked for in return for this concession on the part of England—as if it had been contemptuously thrown into the bargain as something too insignificant to be thought worth mentioning. Now, no one would plead that this was a matter of reciprocity; for though it was true that the engagement was equally binding on both countries, no one could expect that England would ever import coal from France. He did not wish to lay much stress upon the circumstance that so long as this Treaty should continue in force we should be cut off from one source of revenue of which we might otherwise have availed ourselves, though there were high authorities in political economy who were in favour of an export duty on coal. The question had another and, as it seemed to him, a much more serious aspect. No one, he thought, would deny that the matter had strong political bearings. He took for granted, what he believed was now universally admitted, that the issue of the next struggle which might take place upon the seas would be decided by steam. We in England, at least, were so satisfied of this that we had ceased to build any other vessels than steamships for purposes of war, and we had, at great expense, converted many of our sailing vessels into steamers. All other maritime nations were, he believed, imitating our example more or less rapidly. But from this state of things, it would follow, as a matter of course, that, other things being equal, that nation would have a great advantage in naval warfare, which, having itself coal in great abundance, and of good quality, was able to cut off supplies of coal suitable for steamers from countries with whom it might be at war. Now, we were at present in this position. It so happened that we had not only more extensive coal-fields than any other nation in Europe, but that there was to be found in great abundance within these islands a kind of coal, commonly known by the name of steam-coal, better adapted for steam navigation than that which was possessed by any other European nation. Owing to its greater density, its bulk in proportion to its weight was very small, compared with the other kinds of coal, so that a much greater number of tons could be stowed away in the hold of a ship. At the same time a given weight of this description of coal would generate a much greater quantity of heat than other descriptions of coal. It was asserted that the advantage in this respect was as much as 44 per cent in favour of steam-coal. In a word, it was the most highly concentrated kind of fuel which had yet been discovered. Its admirable qualities were now, he believed, fully recognized by all those who were connected with the administration of the British Navy. It had been carefully tested by experiments conducted on board the ships of war of the French Navy; and the result of those experiments had been clearly to establish the superiority of the steam-coal of South Wales over any coal which had yet been discovered in France. And neither in Belgium nor in Germany was there any ground for supposing that any considerable quantity of steam-coal was to be found; while the small quantity of steam-coal extracted from the mines of those countries was not equal in quality to the produce of the English coal-fields. Under present conditions we had it in our power, if so minded, to cut off, or, at all events, greatly to restrict the supply to foreign countries of a material which might be said to be indispensable for purposes of maritime warfare. That could be done without in any way raising unpleasant questions as to matters of international law. Our right to prohibit the export of coal, was not and could not be a matter of dispute: it was a mere question of internal regulation, with which foreign Powers had nothing to do. We had the control in our hands. That control, if this provision of the Treaty took effect, we were about to abandon. He thought the inconveniences which might follow were too obvious to make it necessary for him to dwell on them at much length; but he would cite one or two instances by way of illustration. He would suppose during the ten years that this Treaty was to be in force, that France should come into collision with some other Power, England remaining neutral. He would suppose that, so far as France was concerned, England disapproved entirely of the war; that her sympathies were enlisted on the other side, though she did not think it necessary to take on herself the part of a belligerent. He would suppose, further, that the operations in which the French forces were engaged, depended, to a great degree, on the equipment of their steamers; and that a material element of success was the capability of those steamers to remain at sea under steam for a considerable time without being obliged to return to port to coal. That, it was obvious, must depend to a great degree on the quality of the coal with which they were supplied. That would be a case in which, by this provision, we should be bound to furnish to France any quantity of that warlike material which was most required for the success of her operations against a friendly Power with whom we sympathized. Suppose, again, that this country were engaged in war with some maritime Power, or with a combination of maritime Powers, France preserving her neutrality. Under the provisions of this Treaty we were bound to allow French traders to export our coals, whatever might be their ultimate destination. Coals might be freely exported to the ports of the Power with which we were at war, or to the nearest convenient neutral port, if the enemy's ports were too strictly blockaded. He would cite only one instance more. With most of the European Powers we had commercial treaties; and in almost all those Treaties there was inserted what was called a "most favoured nation" clause. Under those Treaties we were bound to afford to other nations the same commercial advantages as we gave to France. Suppose circumstances should arise which should lead to serious misunderstandings between England, on the one side, and several of the great European Powers on the other, and that there was reason to apprehend a coalition on the part of those Powers against England. Such coalitions there had been, such coalitions there might be again. But under this provision we should be bound, up to the very moment when war should be declared, to allow every one of those States to export from this country, and to accumulate in their own dockyards, coal to be supplied to steamers which were to be employed, it might be, in endeavouring to effect a descent upon our own shores. It might be that, under such circumstances, and in consequence of the difficulty in which this provision had placed them, the Government of the day might be compelled to take upon itself, as the Governments of this country had sometimes done in days gone by, the tremendous responsibility of precipitating the conflict, and of striking the first blow before the preparations of the combined Powers should be completed. But in that case the responsibility would in reality rest, not upon those who might be compelled to take it, but upon the head of that Government which, by assenting to this inconsiderate and ill-advised concession, would have rendered such a step necessary. The people of England, if he knew anything of their temper, were above all things jealous, and justly jealous, of proceedings on the part of their Government which might tend in any manner to impair the maritime superiority of their country over other nations. And how could they be otherwise? It was not long since the Prime Minister told them,—for, though the words were spoken to a deputation, yet the words of a Prime Minister of England went forth throughout the land, and not through this land only, but through Europe and to the ends of the earth,—that the very existence of this country depended upon the maintenance of her superiority at sea. If we gave effect to this treaty, and to this provision, let them beware that there arose not ere long a cry in England that this treaty must be torn up and scattered to the winds, because its provisions were incompatible with the security of the country. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in that great speech the other night, in which he unfolded his commercial policy, and surpassed even all his former efforts, had expressed a hope that this Treaty might tend to knit together in bonds of amity those two great and high-spirited nations whose conflicts had often shaken the world. So far, at least, as this provision was concerned, he (the Earl of Airlie) could see in it nothing but the fruitful source of mutual jealousies, of distrust, of dissensions, it might be of enmity and war; and it was in the interest of peace, as much as for any other cause, and because he wished from his heart to see a good understanding between France and England established and maintained—because he wished to see an alliance, not of the Government only, but of the nations, that he deprecated this provision. He did entreat the Government that they would use their influence with the Government of France to induce them to allow this article to be revised. Surely, it could be no part of the design of the French Government, under the guise of a Commercial Treaty, to introduce—to smuggle in as it were—a provision which at no distant period might preclude the Government of England from taking steps which they might consider necessary for the security of the country; and, if such a project really had entered into the mind of the Government of France, it was not possible that

Her Majesty's Government could desire to assist them in carrying it into effect. But if it should appear that difficulties were likely to arise which would render it impossible for the two Governments to agree to revise this provision of the Treaty, then he hoped that Parliament would take that step which was expressly recognized by the terms of the Treaty itself, and that it would, at all events, postpone the consideration of the Treaty until a satisfactory arrangement had been arrived at with regard to this provision. It was probably quite unnecessary for him to state that in the step he had taken and in the observations he had made to-night he had not been prompted by any spirit of hostility towards the Government. On the contrary, he thought he had acted a very friendly part towards them in taking an early opportunity of pointing out to them that the provision which he had been discussing was open, not only in his opinion, but in the opinion of many of their habitual supporters, to the very gravest objections, and in affording them an opportunity of giving explanations and of producing papers which might throw a light upon the subject. He was anxious to know, and, no doubt, the House and the country were also anxious to know, when this proposal was first made and by whom it was broached, when the Foreign Secretary was informed of it, whether it was submitted to the Cabinet, whether any instructions on the subject were transmitted to Lord Cowley and Mr. Cobden, whether any communications were received from them on this subject by Lord John Russell, what was the nature of those communications, and whether Lord Cowley and Mr. Cobden were entirely agreed upon this point. Lord Cowley did not seem to have been much consulted respecting this Treaty. In his first despatch to Lord John Russell his Lordship said—

“If Her Majesty's Government decide upon pursuing this negotiation, it cannot be intrusted to better hands than those of Mr. Cobden. The merit of whatever may be effected will rest solely with him, and it is but fair that he should have the satisfaction of putting his name to the final arrangement.”

Again, in his letter of January 23, he said—

“The way had been so completely cleared by Mr. Cobden's previous active exertions, that the task which I have had to perform has been comparatively light.”

That task must certainly have been very light indeed, and the negotiation even seemed to have proceeded a considerable length before Lord Cowley had any official information on the subject. The noble Earl concluded by moving—

“That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, for Copies or Extracts of any Correspondence (in addition to that already presented to Parliament) which may have taken place between Her Majesty's Government and Her Majesty's Plenipotentiaries in Paris respecting the Negotiation of the Treaty of Commerce with France.”

LORD WODEHOUSE had no objection to furnish copies of or extracts from the correspondence referred to, though he did not know that they would afford the information which the noble Earl seemed to desire. His noble Friend said that Lord Cowley had apparently been very little consulted, and that the Treaty had really been negotiated by Mr. Cobden. Now, nobody had the slightest desire to conceal that. The Treaty was negotiated principally by Mr. Cobden, and he (Lord Wodehouse) did not think that public confidence in it would be diminished by a knowledge of this fact. With respect to the 11th Article of the Treaty, he did not understand his noble Friend to object to the engagement that no export duty should be levied on coal; but to the stipulation that Her Majesty's Government should not prohibit the exportation of coal from Great Britain. Now, on this point his noble Friend had failed to take into consideration the 19th Article, or “favoured nation clause,” in which the two high contracting Powers engaged “not to enforce one against the other any prohibition of importation or exportation which shall not at the same time be applicable to all other nations.” This stipulation would prevent Her Majesty from prohibiting the export to France of any article which was not also prohibited from being exported to any other country. That was a provision, therefore, which any Government would be very loth to adopt, because prohibition, if made at all, must be general. The stipulation was one which it was very important to bear in mind when considering the operation of the special provision contained in the 11th Article, and it seemed to him to afford an answer to one portion of the noble Earl's speech. The noble Earl's principal objection to this provision arose from the inconvenience or the danger which might be incurred if the English Government were unable to prohibit the export of coal to France in case of war or intended war. Such a prohibition, he said, would entail a heavy responsibility upon the Government, and would be regarded as a first step towards hostilities. But the prohibition would be just as serious whether any such article were contained in the treaty or not. If war were apprehended with France, and it was necessary to forbid the exportation of coal, it would matter very little whether such a treaty had been concluded or not; the angry feelings which would be aroused by any such prohibition would be the same in either case; and the breaking of a commercial treaty would not add to the inconveniences of war. The noble Earl argued as though we ought to reserve all our steam-coal for our own navy; but this we could only do as regarded all other nations as well as France. He (Lord Wodehouse) thought, therefore, that exaggerated apprehensions had been expressed as to the effect of a provision which merely recorded the intentions of Her Majesty's Government not to prohibit the exportation of an article of the greatest importance to the manufacturers and to the trade of France.

THE EARL OF HARDWICKE said, that the present conversation raised, in fact, the question of the whole Treaty, which he considered a very one-sided affair—wholly on the side of France. As far as regarded political considerations and the future, he would not deny that when the time arrived that the export duties and the import duties of the two countries should be placed on the footing on which they would probably be placed some years hence, very great advantages might be derived from the Treaty; but when we gave away by Treaty—by solemn Treaty—to a neighbouring country, and bound ourselves hand and foot not to retract the engagement, whether we liked it or not, until a very critical moment should arrive—important resources of the State, the Government ought not to be surprised if the jealousy of the people was excited. He looked on coals as the great power which this country possessed for aggression or defence, and he protested against that portion of the Treaty which, in words so specific and remarkable, withdrew from us the power of retracting at any time the exportation of that most important element in warfare. To say that the engagement was reciprocal was to place silk against coals—an utter absurdity. There was no equality in this, at all events. This very power of prohibition on both sides operating in this unequal manner, was an evidence of what is stated at the outset, that the Treaty was altogether a one-sided one. Supposing that some unfortunate circumstance should arise, and that with regard to the "most favoured nation" clause, we quarrelled with Russia, and stopped our trade in coal with her, our trade in that article would still be continued with France; and supposing that France should be a neutral Power, the trade in coal between France and Russia would offer so important a source of revenue to France that she would be anxious to pursue it to any extent, and we should be obliged, at the risk of grievous offence to France, to continue the coal trade virtually to our enemy, owing to being pledged not to prohibit the exportation under any circumstances. To tie ourselves to such an engagement in such a manner that we could never retract, was a mode of proceeding he could not understand.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET said, he thought the noble Earl had very much exaggerated the importance of this matter, for he did not believe that any country in Europe would be prevented from going to war by the want of English coal. Did their Lordships believe that if France wished to go to war with England want of coal would prevent her? Certainly he did not. In the expenses of a war, the additional amount to be paid for coal would be insignificant. The advantage to France of the free exportation of English coals consisted in its lessening the expense of French manufactures, by keeping down the price at her own mines. If the French were to set up manufactures, it would be only on the guarantee of getting coals at a reasonable price. If they found the price of coals suddenly raised against them, they could not compete with our manufacturers; they could not do this without cheap steam power. Supplying the French with coal was putting them on a level, and enabling them to compete with our manufacturers; if they had not coal they could not compete. But the question of coal was only one of the points which made the noble Earl object to the Treaty. He objected to it from beginning to end. He said, "We give everything to France, and we get nothing in return." He (the Duke of Somerset) considered this Treaty a measure valuable as the commencement of a new era for trade. It was the foundation of a new system of intercourse between England and France and all the countries of Europe, and he believed that hereafter it would produce amicable relations in place of the warlike preparations which were now, unfortunately, so visible throughout Europe. He believed that this Treaty would be found, if carried out for a year or two, most advantageous to this country. To withdraw from the Treaty the provision against retracting the prohibition of the importation of coal would excite the jealousy of the manufacturers of France, and induce them to suspect that we were actuated, not by a desire for mutual prosperity, but for our own selfish ends. Supposing a French manufactory started, and the English, acting under a presumed commercial policy, checked the exportation of British coals, what would be the result? The French must carry on their works with high-priced French coals, or give them up. It was not a question of war and peace. Let war arise; and, as between belligerents, all treaties ceased to operate. If we wanted to tell the French they might compete with us in manufacturing skill, one thing was requisite, and that was an assurance that they should be secure of getting coal at a certain price. What was the argument of the French on this subject? They said the prosperity of France really required that they should exclude English coals, and for this reason: English coal had done them mischief; it had come in and prevented the French from developing their own mineral resources; if this coal had not come in, the French would have opened up the coal fields of France. Coal was now brought in cheap, and they did not sufficiently develop their own resources, and if war came suddenly upon them they would be unable to compete with England. It would take them some time, they maintained, before they could open their own coal pits, so as to replace the quantity that would be withdrawn by the stoppage of the English supply. Now, this was the French mode of arguing this point. But it appeared to him (the Duke of Somerset) that the view taken in that House to-night by the noble Earl relative to retaining the power to stop the exportation of coals, would be in every respect a great mistake. If we did prohibit the exportation of coals, it would necessarily excite so strong a feeling as to be almost tantamount to a declaration of war.

EARL GREY agreed with the noble Duke that the objection taken by the noble Earl really involved an objection to the whole treaty, and on that very ground he concurred with the noble Earl. He did not wish to impose any restriction on the export of coal. The county with which he was connected was deeply interested in that export, and when in the other House he took an active part in the opposition to the duty on the export of coal proposed by Sir Robert Peel, which though it did not succeed at the time, succeeded shortly after, for the duty lasted only a year or two. He also trusted that circumstances might never arise to make it the interest of this country to prohibit the export of coal; but still they could not say what might be the state of things in future years, and therefore he objected to deprive the Government and Parliament of the power, should circumstances require it, of putting a stop to the export of coal. He agreed, however, with the noble Duke that the objection extended much further—it extended to the whole system of making commercial regulations, which ought to be settled according to our own domestic interests, a matter of stipulation with foreign countries. He did not object in themselves to most of the changes provided for by the commercial treaty. He had no wish to continue any protection in favour of the British silk manufacturer, of the colonial wine-grower, of the home watch-maker, or of any one trade affected by the treaty. All those protections were bad, and should be got rid of as soon as possible. He might doubt, indeed, whether, looking at the present state of the country and the condition of our finances, the duty upon wine was one which ought to have been selected for reduction. He was confirmed in that doubt by a very high authority, because he found, in his instructions to Mr. Cobden and Lord Cowley, Lord John Russell himself expressly stating that there were other duties which would have a prior claim upon the attention of our Government, were it not for what we were to get in return. In a subsequent part of the same despatch, Lord John stated that, looking at the different nature and the much higher value of French as compared with British brandy, and having regard to the interests of the Exchequer, the Government thought that 10s. would be a proper duty for French brandy. But the duty now proposed was one of 8s. 2d. only. A duty which was nominally equal might not be really so, and when articles differed much in intrinsic value, the same duty would bear upon them with an unequal pressure. British brandy was much cheaper and less valuable than French brandy, and to put the same duty upon both might, in point of fact, be tantamount to imposing a differential duty against our own producer. Such, so lately as the 17th of January, was the opinion of the Government. He was inclined to adhere to it still. We should, perhaps, learn from the correspondence which had been moved for, what were the reasons which had induced the Government to alter their opinion. But that was not his main objection to the treaty. He objected to making commercial questions a matter of stipulation with foreign countries. A commercial treaty debarred Parliament from dealing with financial questions as it ought to do, according to its own unbiassed judgment, unfettered by any foregone conclusion between this country and France, but with reference only to our own domestic interests. It was, he thought, an infringement of the power and rights of Parliament. It was, moreover, a return to the old vicious principle of making commercial regulations a matter of bargain with foreign countries, which we knew from experience led to the adoption of a narrow and restrictive commercial policy. We knew that so long as we made our own admissions of foreign produce contingent upon the mode in which foreign countries dealt with our produce, no progress was made in relieving Europe from the evils of a restrictive system. We knew, on the other hand, that when we ceased to trouble ourselves with the conduct of foreign nations and regulated our import duties simply according to our own interests, commercial freedom made great progress, not only in this country, but throughout the whole of Europe. Yet now we were returning to the old pernicious system. We were going to reduce certain duties upon French produce, not for the sake of the advantage which we might derive directly from their reduction, but for the sake of certain other concessions which France was to make with regard to British produce. What would be the effect of such a policy? The immediate tendency would be to confirm the French people in all those prejudices which now held firm possession of their minds; to make them believe that the impending change in the system of protection which had so long existed among them was to take place for the benefit, not of French, but of British industry; to lead them to look to the gain they might obtain from the admission of their produce to our markets, instead of to the direct advantage of relaxing their own commercial law. That was extremely dangerous. If the opinion of France became really in favour of commercial freedom, no doubt a sound system would speedily be established; but if it remained as at present, then he feared there was very little chance of an effectual reform. Their Lordships would observe that the advance which France made on the road of commercial freedom, as far as the Treaty was concerned, was most inconsiderable. She retained her whole system of navigation laws, and she bound herself to no duties upon our manufactured goods lower than 30 per cent in the first instance, and 25 per cent afterwards. The only articles upon which she made any material reduction were coal and iron, which she wanted in order to stimulate her manufactures. That was a very partial advance, and for the sake of such a small advantage to be gained from France we were sacrificing a great principle, and at the same time confirming all those mischievous prejudices which prevented the people of France from adopting a wiser commercial system. He could not doubt that if we had abstained from the Treaty, if we had left matters to the operation of the good sense of the French people, and of their experience of the effects of our own changes in our commercial policy, we should very soon have witnessed much larger results. Indeed, if he were not misinformed, the French Emperor had already had it represented to him by a high authority that France could no longer bear the double burden of the enormous expenditure necessary to maintain her large establishments, and of the evils arising from a multitude of restrictions upon her industry. If, instead of teaching the French people to believe that their interests were sacrificed to ours, and that the proposed changes were to be made for the benefit of England, we had allowed matters to proceed as they were, remitting all those duties with which the Government intended to deal,—always providing that such a step could be taken with advantage to our own interests and with no injury to the Exchequer—but avoiding any stipulation upon the subject, he was persuaded that we should have done far more than we were now likely to do for that commercial freedom and that intercourse between the two nations which, in common with the noble Duke, he believed to be of inestimable value. He regretted that we had not taken that course for another reason. A great part of the reductions which were to take place in the French tariff were not to come into operation for a very considerable period. Now, we knew from our own experience that in changing from a narrow to a more liberal system of commercial policy the period of greatest danger was at that moment when the new system had been determined upon, but not yet brought into operation. At that time we had all the apprehension and exaggerated alarm which was created by the change, and we had not experience to correct it, nor had we the corresponding benefits to neutralize those partial inconveniences which must always, in the first instance, result from a large change of commercial policy. His fear, therefore, was that till some time after 1861, when the change was to come into operation in France, there would be great pressure and distress among those interests which were going to be deprived of part of the protection which they had hitherto enjoyed; and during the whole of that interval the blame of that distress would be thrown upon this country, an angry feeling against England would be created in the minds of the French people; and he was afraid among large classes of them it might even go so far as to lead to a desire to interrupt the operation of the Treaty by a quarrel with us. He doubted much whether the effect of this Treaty during the next year and a-half might not be to drive into the ranks of the war party, which he was afraid already existed in France, some of those who were now the advocates of peace with this country. This was a serious political inconvenience, and one which ought to be well considered before any treaty was finally concluded. He was, however, told that the reason for concluding this Treaty was, that the general opinion of France was hostile to free trade, and that even the Emperor, powerful as he was, could not carry a law for the abolition of the existing protection even through such a Legislature as that of France. To his mind this was the strongest argument which could be urged against the Treaty. Much as he valued freedom of commerce, he valued political freedom still more; and desirable as he thought it that France should have the benefits of free trade, he could not think it for her advantage that those benefits should be forced upon her against her deliberate opinion. Nay, further, if it was true that the opinion of France was so hostile to this step, that even in such a Legislature as now existed there, the enormous power of the Emperor would be insufficient to carry a law for the relaxation of prohibitions, what were we to think of the conduct of a foreign country which assisted the Emperor in overbearing so strong and deliberate an opinion on the part of the country, and in order to do so departed from the principles upon which it had for many years acted, and abandoned the policy which had at last been adopted by statesmen of all parties,—that of making its financial measures independent of those of foreign countries? Could we take such a course without giving just offence to every man in France who desired that his country should remain in possession of the smallest fragment of political liberty? Did he think that this treaty would cement the alliance between the two countries, none would hail it with more delight than himself; but, while admitting that such would be the effect of free trade, he denied that that would be the result of this Treaty. On the contrary, it seemed to him that its direct tendency would be to excite in France a state of irritation against this country, to postpone the period at which real freedom of trade might be established between the two nations, and to bring it to pass that for at least a year and a half, the state of things should be full of political danger.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, he rose to call attention to the circumstance that, while the noble Earl who opened the discussion had confined his objection to one article of the Treaty only, the noble Earl who had just addressed the House had raised the general question of the soundness of the principles upon which the Treaty was founded. That was, he thought, hardly a convenient occasion for the discussion of so wide a question; but he could not avoid pointing out to their Lordships that those who took objection to the Article as to coal were generally influenced by a general dislike to the abstract principle upon which the Treaty was founded. The noble Earl (Earl Grey) who had just sat down was very fond of abstract principles, and when he got upon one, he generally rode it to death. He did not complain of his doing so with the principle of free trade; but he thought the noble Earl had entirely misapprehended the principle on which this Treaty was founded. It was not founded upon the old and exploded theory of reciprocity treaties. It was not an exclusive Treaty between England and France as regarded the articles on which it operated. There was no mention with regard to articles from other countries; but it was understood by the French Government that our operations were not to be confined to French articles, but to all articles of the same kind from whatever country they came. That was the essential difference between the old reciprocity treaties and the present. The noble Earl had not defended the abstract principle of free trade, as it had hitherto been contended for in Parliament, correctly. He (the Duke of Argyll) did not believe it had ever been laid down as an abstract principle that never, under any circumstances, ought fiscal changes to be made the subject of commercial treaties. What was contended in both Houses, and by the advocates of free trade, was that when certain changes for our own fiscal purposes were desirable, you should not wait until you could persuade other countries to give you additional benefit before you adopted such a measure; but he never heard it contended—and it would be contrary to common sense to contend—that they were not to take the one advantage in addition to the other. It was a fair principle not to withhold from our own people the advantages remission gave them, until they obtained advantages from other countries; but it was a violation of common sense to say that when they secured both they were not to do so on the abstract principles of free trade. In this instance the matter arose in the course of communications between the Governments of France and England. The French Government said:—"If you are going to make certain changes, and will do it in a certain way, we shall be able to give you a double advantage by a remission of some of our duties." To adopt the course recommended by the noble Earl, and to reject this offer from admiration of the principles of free trade, or in deference to the constitutional forms of France, would have been a great mistake in policy, and a course against the interests of England. The noble Earl said that under this Treaty the French interests affected would suffer from exaggerated alarm, and that injury would accrue from the introduction of the change. This, however, was an objection that did not really aim at the form of the Treaty, but would apply equally if the Emperor made the proposed changes in any other form. Despite of these apprehensions, I thought the noble Earl would admit that in the end the operation of the Treaty would be favourable to the French people, and that speedily. That the view which he took was the correct one was shown by a reference to the Resolution moved by Mr. Ricardo in the House of Commons on the 25th of April, 1843, and supported by the noble Earl, which declared—

“ That it is inexpedient that any contemplated remission of import duties should be postponed with the view of making such remission the basis of commercial negotiations with foreign countries;” the whole stress of the Motion being that you should not delay remissions until other countries gave you a corresponding advantage.

EARL GREY: The whole speech was against making it a matter of negotiation at all.

EARL GREY: And Mr. Ricardo's.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL: The speeches must be read with reference to the particular transaction which was attacked, and with reference to the Motion which was made. He did not deny in the abstract that it might be better, if it were possible, to operate in the direction of free trade, and not to delay making remissions until other countries offered you a return; but years had elapsed and there had been no sign of any relaxation of the French tariff. Would their Lordships believe that our whole export trade with France was less than that to our single colony of Victoria? Was not that a state of things which any Government would desire to remedy? His noble Friend had not drawn a fair inference from the speech of Lord John Russell, who had said that the productions to which allusion had been made were not such articles of primary necessity as to entitle them “on those grounds” to the interference of the Government. There were, however, other grounds which called for that interference. It should be remembered that every one of those duties which were to be remitted must have been abandoned under that reform of our fiscal system which was proposed by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The great object which Her Majesty's Government had had in view was to simplify our tariff and make a general reform of Customs' duties, and he maintained that every duty dealt with had fallen naturally in their way. He was surprised to hear his noble Friend quote British brandy as something that ought to be protected. Why, British brandy was a counterfeit article, and his noble Friend, who was a Protectionist one moment and a Free-trader the next, contended that we ought to maintain a high duty upon French brandy as a protection against British brandy. In reference to another portion of his noble Friend's argument, he should observe that his noble Friend himself did not deny that the Emperor of the French had acted in that matter in conformity with the principles of his own constitution; and it seemed to him (the Duke of Argyll) that it would be something more than a Puritanical superstition on the part of the British Government if they were to refuse to accept that great boon to the two nations immediately interested because it was not granted in the form most suited to what his noble Friend called the political liberties of France. That was a matter which Her Majesty's Government must have left entirely to the discretion of the French Government, and it was not a point on which they were called upon directly or indirectly to express any opinion whatever. Before he sat down he wished to offer a few remarks on the subject of coal, to which a reference had been made by his noble Friend (the Earl of Airlie) who had commenced that discussion. He was bound to acknowledge that he had found, both from private conversation and from other sources, considerable fear and jealousy entertained of that portion of the Treaty by persons who looked favourably upon its general provisions. That showed the great sensitiveness—he readily admitted the just and natural sensitiveness—of the public mind in this country in reference to every question which in any way affected the maintenance of our naval power. But he trusted that the clear and able explanation which had been given by his noble Friend the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs (Lord Wodehouse) would remove the misapprehensions which appeared to prevail upon that point. No one, he believed, could doubt the perfect harmlessness to this country of that article of the treaty by which we engaged to place no duty on the exportation of coal for revenue purposes. The experiment of imposing such a tax was made by Sir Robert Peel in the year 1842; but it had been found a disastrous—he might almost say discreditable—failure, and it had been abandoned by the same great Minister in the year 1845. His noble Friend (Earl Grey) was always a most strenuous opponent of that duty. He showed that it was wrong in principle, that it imposed restrictions upon trade, and that, from its vexatious interference it was a duty that could not be maintained by a British Parliament. In 1845 this export duty upon coal was repealed by Sir Robert Peel, who said:—

“We do think it will be an important principle to establish, that with respect to exports there shall be no duty leviable. I am unwilling to make any exception to this principle, that with respect to exports no duty shall henceforth survive.”—[See 3 Hansard, lxxvii., 478.]

No one would contend that this engagement not to impose an export duty on coals for purposes of revenue was not perfectly harmless. Then, as far as that was a political question, it had already been explained by his noble Friend the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs that, in truth the only effect of that clause was to put France in precisely the same position to us with regard to the export of coal in which all other nations were placed, because under existing treaties we could not prohibit the export of that article to any one nation, unless we were to extend the prohibition to other nations. He apprehended that if that clause were expunged from the treaty the same effect would be produced as far as regarded the power of prohibition by the provision that extended to France the “most favoured nation” clause, which was an essential part of all commercial treaties. With regard to the case of a contemplated war, he should say he thought that discussion had shown that noble Lords were not aware of the enormous interest connected in this country with the export of coal. The fact was that the prohibition of that export would destroy one of the great branches of our trade. In the year 1842, when Sir Robert Peel imposed the export duty upon coal, the quantity which we sent abroad fell short of 1,500,000 tons; but since that duty had been abolished our export of coal amounted to little less than 7,000,000 tons, valued at £3,000,000. That was a trade with which no Government would interfere except under the pressure of some extreme political emergency and danger. It was not merely the coalowner who was interested, but an enormous amount of British shipping was engaged in the trade, so that under no circumstances short of life or death could the Government interfere with this great export trade. In case of war no doubt we could do anything, and we should be justified in breaking through this article of the Treaty. But unless we prohibited the export of coals to all other countries, how could we prevent the Americans, Swedes, or Danes from exporting coals from England and taking them to France? He hoped that the House and the public would see that, except so far as this article of the treaty was open to all the abstract objections that might be taken to other portions of it, there need be no public alarm or anxiety whatever about this clause. He should say, for his part, that he looked upon it as one which was calculated to produce a very important effect, of an entirely pacific character. Coal was valuable for war, but it was much more valuable for commercial and manufacturing purposes; and he thought nothing could be more desirable than that a great interest should rise up in France, depending wholly for its prosperity on the constant supply of English coal. We should, then, establish between ourselves and the people of France, in reference to that article, relations similar to those which existed between us and the people of the United States of America with respect to cotton. He felt persuaded that the nature of our relations with the American people in regard to the supply of cotton had contributed more than any other circumstance to prevent the causes of petty irritation between the two nations from expanding into a war. He believed that if the same relations existed between us and France, the same effect would be produced; and he looked to the export of coal to France, and the introduction of French produce to this country on advantageous terms, as the grounds on which we might hope to lay the foundation of a better feeling than had hitherto existed between the people of the two countries.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY said, that every one must be glad to witness an extension of the commercial intercourse between this country and France; but there might, nevertheless, be special reasons why he might doubt whether a Treaty such as this was the most desirable means of accomplishing that end. It was not from any doubt he entertained as to the value of the abstract doctrines of political economy that he saw objections to this Commercial Treaty, but because he was opposed to those doctrines being in any way bound up with Commercial Treaties. He objected to Commercial Treaties for the same reason that Sir Robert Peel did—because they unnecessarily and often mischievously tied up our hands in the regulation of our own fiscal system. By the Treaty now under consideration we entered into engagements, not with France only, but with the whole world, for a period of ten years, and during that time our hands would be completely bound. The arrangement proceeded upon the principle that duties should be abolished on all articles of foreign produce, except on a few great articles of consumption, which were retained for the sake of revenue; and then to make good the deficiency we were to have recourse to an income tax, a tax specially obnoxious to the people of this country; and which all Chancellors of the Exchequer had hitherto deemed it impossible to retain in its present shape, if it was to become a permanent impost. There were two articles in the Treaty involving matters of great importance to which he would briefly refer. The first article was that in which France declared that, over and above certain duties which were named, she maintained her right to levy such differential duties as she pleased on foreign shipping entering into French ports. He should like to see the entire correspondence that had taken place, in order that the course pursued by the negotiators on this point might be ascertained; for he could not but believe that great exertions must have been made by them to obtain something for us in regard to this matter, seeing that we ourselves had surrendered everything. The other article to which he referred was, that by which we bound ourselves not to impose an export duty on coal conveyed to the ports of France, or under any circumstances to prohibit its exportation. Now, what was coal? It was a great element, no doubt, in manufacturing industry; but in time of war it was a munition of war quite as much as any other article universally acknowledged to be such, and which was contraband of war. Some doubt might have existed on this subject previously to the Russian war; but since that time it had become an evident fact that the whole naval marine of any country must depend on the article of coal. The noble Duke (the Duke of Argyll) had spoken of the importance of creating a manufacturing interest in France, which should be absolutely dependent upon England for a supply of coal. But the people of France were under no necessity of coming to this country to obtain coal for manufacturing purposes. The coal of Belgium was equal to our own for manufactures, and they could obtain it there, as well as in their own country; but for the purposes of war, English coal was superior to that of Belgium, or any other country. By this Treaty we should secure to France the right of obtaining coal from this country, whenever she might contemplate any hostile movement, either against ourselves or others; for their Lordships would observe that France had reserved to herself the right to resort to our shores at all time and under all circumstances for coals. He would suppose that we were likely to go to war with Russia, a country which had no coal of her own, and which, therefore, had to depend for her supplies on foreign countries. We might, in such a case, wish to prohibit the exportation of coal, and say that we would allow no coal to be taken from our shores to the Baltic; but France might step in and say she had a right under this Treaty to take our coal where she pleased; and so we might have French ships coming to Swansea, and taking away cargoes of our best Welsh coal for the use of Russia, which by the engagements of this Treaty we should be unable to prevent. Persons of the highest authority, and in whose opinions he had great confidence, agreed with him in thinking that in the article of coal, at least, there should be an exception to the rule adopted in this Treaty, and this was a matter which he would take the liberty of pressing upon the serious attention of the Government. The Treaty was not to be considered as finally concluded till it received the sanction of Parliament. He hoped, therefore, Her Majesty's Government would lose no time in re-opening the negotiations with the Emperor of the French, who was himself the real negotiator, and that they would endeavour to obtain the omission of this article of the Treaty before it was further proceeded with in Parliament.

EARL GRANVILLE said, it was clear that within the next ten years no Government would attempt to impose a restrictive duty on coals, which, while it would bring in a very small revenue indeed, would have a disastrous effect in restricting an enormous trade which was now carried on, besides giving rise to attempts to evade the Custom-house regulations. The noble Lord who had just sat down and all who went before him, had carefully avoided the arguments used by his noble Friend the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs and the noble Duke at the head of the Admiralty. His noble Friend the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs clearly pointed out that, whereas there were "favoured nation clauses" in our treaties with most countries, that we should not impose prohibitions on any article going into those countries unless we extended the same prohibitions to all other countries in the world, we could not therefore prohibit coal going to France unless we did so to all the world besides. His noble Friend (Lord Stanley of Alderley) said under this Treaty we could not prevent France carrying the coal she got from this country to Russia. He was surprised that it had not occurred to his noble Friend, who was so much mixed up in the late war with Russia, that we never issued any proclamation at all during the war with regard to coal itself, but that with regard to other articles contraband of war we did issue a proclamation to all countries north of Dantzic; and those countries would doubtless have complained of that if they had not felt that the belligerent rights of nations overrode all the stipulations of commercial treaties. Even if his noble Friend (the Earl of Airlie) was right in putting the immense value he did on English coal, did he believe that a rich country like France would ever be found at the beginning of a war without an adequate supply of coal? The instant peace was broken between two nations, all the obligations of a treaty of commerce were thrown to the winds. Besides, the noble Earl was under a misapprehension when he supposed France had no coal of her own. France obtained coal from Belgium; and, in addition to that, a commission of scientific men in France, who had been directed to institute inquiries on the subject, had reported that if France chose to make the necessary efforts she might obtain a supply of coal, both of the richer and poorer qualities, sufficient for her consumption within her own territories. He was convinced the more the question was considered the more clear it would be, and the more of a bug-bear would the opposition appear which was now made to that part of the Treaty, which was intended to facilitate the export of coal to France. He did not think it necessary to trouble the House with any remarks on the general policy of the Treaty; but he might read an extract from a speech made by Sir Robert Peel, in the House of Commons on the 11th March, 1842. Sir Robert Peel said:—

"We have opened communications with Spain for the purpose of forming a commercial treaty with that country, strongly urging on that country the policy of encouraging international commerce. As to this treaty, I can say nothing more at present than that the proposition was favourably received by the Spanish Government. We have, further, negotiations pending with Sardinia and with Naples; we have commercial treaties arranging with some of the South American States; we have, moreover, intimated to France our earnest desire to resume negotiations for the completion of a commercial treaty, founded on principles, as I believe, of reciprocal benefit, and having a tendency to strengthen the ties of amity and friendly feeling between the countries."—[3 Hansard, lxi., 452.]

When he (Earl Granville) found that commercial treaties with France, though they had been sometimes negotiated on false principles, had been concluded by Pitt, Huskisson, and Peel, and that the latest attempt had been made by Richard Cobden, he did feel some confidence that even to err with them was, in some respects, more satisfactory than to be right with his noble Friend (the Earl of Airlie).

THE EARL OF AIRLIE, in reply, contended that the Treaty did not put France on the same footing as the other European Powers were before it was concluded. The engagement with regard to France was absolute. There was nothing said in it about our not prohibiting the export of coal to France without our prohibiting it to all the world besides. He denied that he had ever said that as a matter of general policy it was desirable to prohibit the exportation of coal. What he had said was that it was not desirable to enter into engagements which, in cases of emergency might be found extremely inconvenient. He apprehended that we had as good a right to impose export duties as other countries had to impose prohibitions on imports. The noble Duke the First Lord of the Admiralty said we could not prevent war by prohibiting the export of coals. What he (the Earl of Airlie) had said was, that the coal found in this country, being in great part so superior to all other kinds for purposes of steam navigation, if we could restrict its importation into France, we should, in the event of hostilities becoming probable, be able to place ourselves in a better position than we should be under the Treaty. He should wait with great anxiety for the papers on this subject, and he hoped they would have a greater effect in removing his objections than the speeches he had heard on the part of the Government.

THE AMERICAN COASTING TRADE.

QUESTION.

MR. LIDDELL said, he rose to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown has been taken upon the American Law of 1848, which confers exclusive privileges upon American vessels engaged in the trade between New York and California, either by Panama or by Cape Horn, and defines such to be a coasting voyage? Whether the exclusion of British and Foreign Ships from any participation in a coasting trade, so defined, is or is not a violation of the Treaties in force between this country and America, which stipulate for a reciprocal liberty of commerce; and, whether there is any objection to produce Copies of all Correspondence that has taken place between the British and American Governments upon this subject?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown was taken generally whether the trade carried on between New York and California could properly be called a coasting trade, and their opinion was that they considered it was a coasting trade. With regard to the question whether the exclusion of British ships from that trade was a violation of the Treaties between this country and America, the American Government said they were prohibited from admitting our ships by the articles of their Constitution. They admitted the Treaties for equality of trade, but they said that by their Constitution, in the way they understood it, they could not grant the coasting trade to Great Britain. The hon. Gentleman would see that it was hardly possible to dispute with them as to the construction they gave to their own Constitution, but Her Majesty's Government had several times applied to the American Government to give Great Britain the same privileges which were granted to them, and especially that trade in which the cargo was unloaded, carried across the Isthmus of Panama, and shipped on board another vessel. It did not appear to the British Government that in any sense of the word that could be properly called a coasting trade. Lord Lyons had very recently brought the subject under the notice of the American Minister for Foreign Affairs, who replied that he would take the opinion of the Treasury about it. The hon. Gentleman would see that, as the correspondence was going on, it was impossible to give it at present. He had carefully considered the question as to whether it was a violation of treaties, and although it might not be a violation of treaties, at the same time it was a great disappointment after what the hon. Gentleman would recollect were the professions of the American Minister in this country in 1849, when we proposed to repeal the Navigation laws. Mr. Bancroft, who was then the American Minister, stated to Mr. Labouchere, the President of the Board of Trade, "If you are liberal, we shall be liberal; if you give much, we shall give much; if you give all, we shall give all." It was only just to say that the American Government did give equivalent advantages on passing the Navigation Act; but, although in 1854 we threw open the coasting trade, what had been done by them in that respect was still very unsatisfactory.

DRILLING IN SCHOOLS.—QUESTION.

MR. W. EWART said he wished to ask the Vice-President of the Committee of Council on Education, Whether the Committee can authorize or encourage a system of military drilling in the Schools which have participated in the Education Grant?

MR. LOWE said, the hon. Gentleman was doubtless aware that the management of the Schools was not in the Committee of Council. There were Local Committees of management, and therefore it was impossible for the Committee of Council to take any direct step to authorize or encourage a system of military drilling in the schools. The question, then, was, could they take any indirect step? The hon. Gentleman must also be aware that what the Committee of Council did was to make grants in aid of schools on certain conditions, not strictly educational. He must confess that, in his opinion, however desirable it might be to extend drilling, it was not desirable to attempt to exercise authority upon a new subject, and to impose fresh conditions different from those on which the Committee of Council had hitherto dealt with the Committees of management. The business of the Council was education. In his opinion, they should confine themselves to that, and not be led aside in the promotion of any other object, however desirable it might be.

RUSSIA COMPANY'S DUES.—QUESTION.

MR. HUBBARD said, he would beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade, Whether he has received any, and, if any, what communication from the Governor of the Russia Company, touching the levy of Dues by that Company?

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, a communication had been received through the Board of Trade from the Governor of the Russia Company, to the effect that they would no longer levy dues on the import of goods into the United Kingdom.

THE ANNEXATION OF SAVOY WITH FRANCE.—QUESTION.

SIR ROBERT PEEL: I wish, Sir, to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether Her Majesty's Government have any objection to state the nature of the communications which have passed between the Sardinian and British Governments with respect to the Cession of a portion of the Sardinian Territory to France; and, also, whether Her Majesty's Government have had occasion to communicate to the French Government the opinion entertained by other Powers on this subject; and whether, in the event of the annexation of Savoy to France being effected, Her Majesty's Government are prepared to abandon the neutrality of Switzerland, as guaranteed by Great Britain, in common with other European Powers?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: Sir, with regard to the nature of the communications which have passed between the Sardinian and British Governments, we have inquired of the Sardinian Government whether there was any engagement or any intention to yield Savoy to France, and the answer has been generally that there was no engagement on the subject, and that Sardinia had no intention to cede Savoy to France. That is the general nature of the answer which has been given. We have not communicated to the French Government the opinion entertained by other Powers, because we have had no communications with other Powers to ascertain what their opinions may be. With regard to the last question of the hon. Baronet, "whether, in the event of the annexation of Savoy to France being effected, Her Majesty's Government are prepared to abandon the neutrality of Switzerland, as guaranteed by Great Britain, in common with other European Powers," I have to say that the Swiss Government have asked us whether, in case of such annexation, we are prepared to maintain the neutrality of Switzerland, and to provide in such a manner that the neutrality should in no way be injured, and we have always replied that we had determined to do so. It appears that the districts of Chablais and Faucigny more especially are guaranteed by the Treaty of Vienna in the same manner as Switzerland; that they are, in fact, part of the general arrangement for the guarantee of Switzerland. But it is stated, and with great truth, by the Sardinian Government, that it would hardly be an equivalent guarantee if those districts were to belong to France, instead of belonging to Sardinia, and accordingly their view is that in case of annexation those districts at least, if not further districts, should belong to Switzerland, and be guaranteed in the general guarantee of Switzerland. That appears to be a very fair proposal on the part of Sardinia. I was only afraid that with the prospect of aggrandizement Switzerland would favour annexation; at least, I was uneasy; but yesterday I received assurances from Berne that the Swiss Government wish things to remain as they are, and Savoy to remain part of the territory of Sardinia. As far as Switzerland and Sardinia are concerned, there is, I apprehend, no wish or intention that this annexation should take place.

MR. SEYMOUR FITZGERALD: Sir, as the noble Lord has replied to the question of the hon. Baronet, he will, perhaps, permit me to ask him a further question on the same important subject, without which the information possessed by the House will be very incomplete. The noble Lord has informed the House that he is assured from Turin that the cession of Savoy was not contemplated by the Government of Piedmont, and would not be assented to. So far the information given by the noble Lord is satisfactory. The further question I wish to ask is, whether the noble Lord has been informed from Turin that a communication has been addressed to the Government of Piedmont on the part of the Emperor of the French, to the effect that if Central Italy is annexed to the Sardinian Kingdom, France cannot permit the French slopes of the Alps to remain in the possession of a Power whose position in Europe will be so materially altered by such an extension of territory.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: Sir, I have received no information in the terms stated by the hon. Gentleman; but it has certainly, to my knowledge, been communicated to the Government of Turin that if the Kingdom of Sardinia were aggrandized to any very considerable extent by the annexation of Central Italy, France would think that her frontier was not secure without the annexation of at least some part of Savoy.

SARDINIA AND NAPLES.—QUESTION.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether Her Majesty's Government have received any communication from the Government of the Two Sicilies, complaining that agents of the Government of Sardinia have been trying to excite a mutiny in the Troops of the King of Naples?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: Sir, we have received no information of the kind referred to by the noble Lord, nor has the Government of the Two Sicilies made any complaint of the sort. At the same time, I should tell the noble Lord that that Government is not disinclined to make complaints. Not long ago I received a complaint that an English officer of marines, in paying a visit to a lady at Naples on her birthday, called in at a pastry-cook's and bought a cake for her, which cake was said to have had on it three flags of different colours. The Government of the Two Sicilies complained of this as an attempt to excite an insurrection.

HERTFORDSHIRE MAGISTRATES.

QUESTION.

MR. FREELAND said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether the attention of Her Majesty's Government has been called to the case of an agricultural labourer in Hertfordshire, who, having been previously convicted for stealing rabbits, was said to have been sentenced by the Magistrates of that county to three years' penal servitude for stealing a few sticks from a fagot-stack; whether there is any truth in the statement; and whether, if it be true, the Home Office will consider it a proper case for interference?

Mr. Seymour Fitz Gerald

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, the attention of the Home Office had been drawn to the matter, and a Report had been asked for from the Chairman of Quarter Sessions, which had not yet been received.

LORD ELGIN'S MISSION TO CHINA.

QUESTION.

MR. BERNAL OSBORNE said, he rose to ask, Whether there is any truth in the Report that Lord Elgin is again to go out as a Plenipotentiary to China?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, he could not answer the question then. He had stated on Monday evening that when the next mail came in the Government would consider what course they should pursue, and he would take an early opportunity of stating their decision to the House.

THE FRENCH DIFFERENTIAL DUTIES.

QUESTION.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, he wished to ask the President of the Board of Trade, Whether, although from the multifarious character of the Differential Duties in the French Tariff it was impossible he could lay them all on the table of the House, it is not in his power to lay a short statement of the Differential Duties referred to in the Third Article of the Treaty of Commerce before them?

MR. MILNER GIBSON in reply said, that the Differential Duties referred to in the Third Article of the French Treaty were part of the Navigation Laws of France, which were not intended to be touched by either of the contracting parties. There seemed to be some misunderstanding with respect to the Differential Duties. English ships entering French ports, and carrying the productions of the United Kingdom to France, would be subjected to no Differential Duties, which affected only the indirect trade that might hereafter spring up. In point of fact, the Differential Duties would be a protection to British trade, as it would secure it from competition on the part of American and other foreign shipping. He apprehended that he could give a satisfactory reply to the question by saying that a letter was written in 1855 by the Board of Trade to the Foreign Office, requesting the Foreign Office to make application to the Consuls in all the French ports to furnish the Government with the exact status quo as to those Differential Duties which differed in various ports, and the answers had since been received from the Consuls. If the noble Lord wished it, Government were prepared to lay the letters of the Board of Trade, with the answers received from the Consuls, on the Table of the House, which would then be in possession of exact information of the Differential Duties affecting British shipping in all the ports of France.

MANNING THE NAVY.

RESOLUTION.

SIR CHARLES NAPIER said, he rose to move,

“That, in the opinion of this House, the recommendations of the Commissioners on Manning the Navy ought to be taken into consideration by Her Majesty’s Government, with a view to carry out the principles of such recommendations.”

The noble Lord the Secretary to the Admiralty had publicly declared that France had the same number of ships that we had, and had extra means of manning them by having recourse to her reserves; but the English fleet could not be manned in that way. Such a declaration by a member of the Government was one of the most extraordinary declarations he had ever heard, and a great responsibility rested on the Government and on Parliament if they allowed things to remain as they were. He had often called the attention of the House to this subject, and he was glad to find that he had at last been so far listened to that we had a respectable and well-manned fleet at the present moment; but we lived in very odd times. France appeared to him, more particularly after what had passed that night, to occupy a very uncertain position with regard to Great Britain and other nations. All this might end peaceably; but as we were not sure that it would, the Government ought to take steps, let it cost what it would, to secure that we should be able to bring forward as great a naval force as France. Every man in the House, soldier, sailor, or civilian, knew perfectly well that things had taken a very different turn of late years from what they had done in former ones. No man could tell what would be the effect of the first naval action fought between France and England. We had great reliance on our sailors and officers, but the changes in other respects were so perfectly extraordinary, and had never yet been tried, that it was impossible for any one to tell what would be the effect of the first collision. In former days, when a British man-of-war fell in with a French man-of-war, the doom of the latter was fixed; and the same when a British fleet fell upon a French fleet. In the late war the action fought on the 1st of June by Lord Howe was a very severe action; it was fought well both by the French and ourselves. We were conquerors; but that action was fought after the French Revolution, when the most distinguished officers had left the service, and the French ships were not manned so well as ours. That battle was gained; but no human being could tell what would be the result of the next naval action. At the first broadside a hole as large as a wheelbarrow would be made in a ship’s side, and everybody knew that to prolong a contest under such circumstances would be utterly impossible. It had been repeatedly proved that nothing could resist molten iron, and that the ship so struck would be burnt. It was probable that in the first naval action which was fought, both fleets would be almost annihilated; and if, in that case, the French were able to bring forward another fleet, what would be the position of this country? It would be almost annihilated. Now the Government had stated by the mouth of one of their own officers that in the event of a reverse we were not in a position to send a second fleet to sea. It was plain from this that England did not put forward all the strength which she ought to do. A certain reserve, it was true, existed in the different ports of England; there were the Coast-guard, which they had been recommended to increase to 12,000, but which had only been raised to 8,100, and the Coast Volunteers, the amount to be voted for which, but not the number of men, appeared in the Estimates. But he had heard that since 1857 or 1858 the same attention had not been paid to the drill of these volunteers as previously. Over and over again he had implored the Government to replace the block-ships by newly constructed men-of-war, and to take pains to increase the efficiency of this branch of the national defences. Last year he had brought the matter to a vote, and his Resolution was supported by the noble Lord at the head of the Government. Some allowance was to be made at that time, for the Admiralty were then directing all their energies to the establishment of an efficient Channel fleet. Now, however, we had actually forty-eight sail of the line in the water, of which only twenty-seven were actually in commission. What was to hinder the Government from sending out a sufficient number of these, on board of which the Coast Volunteers could be draughted and in a short time trained into a high state of efficiency? No expense would be entailed by the step, for the ships were all ready in the different ports; and why the Admiralty should refuse to carry out the suggestion—unless they were actuated by the stubbornness which generally manifested itself when proposals were made by anybody else—he was at a loss to understand. Whatever was the cause, they were just in the same position as they were last year when he brought forward his Motion. The noble Lord the Secretary to the Admiralty admitted that seamen entertained great suspicion of the Board. He quite agreed with the seamen in their view. How could sailors place any confidence in that Board, when they saw the way in which affairs were administered? Some time ago the Admiralty found it necessary to call out what were called the long-pension men for temporary service; and those who had been petty officers were promised that they were to have the same ratings which they formerly held. But they were greatly disappointed to find that such was not the case, and they accordingly addressed an humble petition to the Admiralty. Sailors had exactly the same feelings as officers, and he would like to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty, if he had retired from active service as a captain, how he would like to be sent back to do duty as a lieutenant. This was only one of many causes of dissatisfaction which he had known to exist. Another constant source of discontent was the regulations with regard to leave. Would it be believed that persons of sound sense could have issued an order, directing that whenever ships belonging to the Channel or any other squadrons came into port, and leave was given to the men, they were not to quit the port on pain of having their pay stopped as stragglers, and being otherwise punished? What were the men to do if their wives and families happened to live outside the port. This only came to his knowledge yesterday, and when he heard it he scarce believed it possible, after the dissatisfaction which had been manifested on board various ships, that such an order could have been issued by any Board. But he now came to the recommendations of the Manning Commission. It suggested that the number of seamen gunners should be increased; he had not heard that any such increase had taken place. The recommendation as to the improvement of the food, clothes, and bedding, had been carried out, and the reserve ships were in such a state that they were ready for the men to go into the moment they were commissioned. The allotments of pay, too, had been carried into effect; but what had the Admiralty been about that it had not been done sooner? He came now to the question of bounty, which was most important. He believed he had as much to do in getting the bounty for the seamen as any other man, and it was most successful in manning the fleet. The fleet was now manned; but was it prudent to reduce the bounty to £4? £10 might be too high a bounty after the fleet was manned, but certainly much more than £4 ought to be given. He now came to the important point of the reserves, and in regard to it he did not think that the Government had taken the proper steps to obtain success. They were now obliged to keep up a very large fleet. He did not mean to say that ten sail of the line was too large a force on the home station, but such a large fleet would not be necessary if they had a proper reserve. If they had a reserve of 5,000 men, giving £10 a piece to men who had served ten years, which was called the short pension, they would always have a body of men who would be as ready to be called on as if they were on board the fleet. But if they were obliged to raise 5,000 additional men on the moment for service on board the fleet, they would cost at a low estimate £250,000; whereas the reserve force of 5,000 men would not cost above £50,000. If £10 was not sufficient to get the men, they ought to increase it to £12, or to a still higher sum, so important was the object to be gained. The Commissioners recommend an increase of 5,000 marines, but that had only been carried out to the extent of 1,000. But he wished to ask of what use was it appointing a Commission if they did not carry out its recommendations? They also propose a body of 5,000 marines on short pensions; but where were they? With regard to the Royal Volunteers, the Commission put them down at 30,000; but it would be difficult to find out where they were, or the 10,000 Naval Coast Volunteers. That was the reserve force pointed out by the Commission, but that reserve force they had not got, and never would. He had pointed out before that it was not necessary to press men into the service, but it was necessary to get them out of the service as fast as they could. If men who had served their country ten years, or even five years, got a pension of £10 or £5, according to the length of their service, and were encouraged to go into the Reserve, allowing three years' time there to count for two of effective service, it would contribute to the formation of an effective reserve. The Commission had decided that the Coast Volunteers should be entitled to all the advantages of Greenwich Hospital; but when the House read the Report of the Greenwich Hospital Commissioners, they would be astonished to see what "advantages" that hospital held out to seamen, and when they had seen the manner in which, from year to year, sailors' wives and children had been treated at Greenwich Hospital, they would be induced to come to the conclusion that that institution, instead of being a blessing, was almost a curse. He had laboured for years to have that Commission appointed, and he never read such horrible details as the evidence given before it exhibited in the whole course of his existence. He trusted, therefore, that the Government had some better regulation of that establishment in view, and now that he had succeeded in getting its management overhauled, it was his intention to do everything in his power to procure that reform of the Board of Admiralty itself which appeared to him to be so necessary. As an instance of the expediency of such reform, he might mention that in 1857 it had been decided by the Government of the day that seven ships of the line should be paid off—a decision which the First Lord of the Admiralty had carried into effect. The House, however, would scarcely believe that in 1859 another Board of Admiralty had found it to be its duty to entail on the country a large expenditure for the purpose of restoring to a state of efficiency those very ships in 1857 which had been paid off, and paid off too, he believed, in opposition to the opinions of—with the exception of the First Lord—nearly all the Lords of the Admiralty, who, he regretted to say, had not in consequence resigned their offices; but, on the contrary, had stuck to them like leeches. He had also to complain of the position in which Sir Baldwin Walker, as Surveyor of the Navy, had been placed, the fact being that he could not have given a single order in the dockyards the execution of which he could enforce. He was happy to find, however, that the Admiralty, after fifteen years' consideration, had at length effected a change in that respect, and that Sir Baldwin Walker, as Controller of the Navy, would be enabled to exercise an authority which had hitherto been denied him. He should simply say, in conclusion, that, after all that the House had heard from the noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs in reference to the Cession of Savoy, it was impossible to tell what consequences to the peace of Europe might six months hence ensue. We should, therefore, take care that we had a sufficient reserve of seamen to man our fleet in case any emergency should arise, and the noble Lord and the Government would, in his opinion, deserve—he would not say to be brought to the block—but, at all events, the general censure in case they neglected to render our navy as efficient as it could possibly be made.

SIR MICHAEL SEYMOUR seconded the Motion.

MR. HENLEY said, he should not follow the gallant Admiral who had just addressed the House through the various topics on which he had dwelt in the course of his speech. There was, however, one point to which he had alluded with respect to which he wished to make a few remarks. It was impossible to read the valuable evidence which had been given before the Commission on manning the Navy, without coming to the conclusion that great difficulty would be found in obtaining, on the breaking out of war, the number of seamen which would be required. He thought, indeed, it was manifest from that evidence, that the service of the Queen was not popular among our merchant-seamen. It had, moreover, been remarked, by more than one naval officer, that they entertained a distrust of the Admiralty. How far that opinion was warranted by the fact, it was not for him to say; but it had been so distinctly stated that it in all probability was based upon some good foundation; although he must confess he was not very strongly impressed by the idea that many of those who had given evidence before the Commission had themselves any very great knowledge of the feelings by which our merchant-seamen were animated in the matter. But, however that might be, some measures had been taken of late which bore not a little upon the point. The right hon. Baronet opposite (Sir J. Graham) had some years ago set up what he termed a great crimping machine, with the view of procuring men for the navy; but it had turned out that sailors did not like to be ticketed any more than did the Nonconformists. The system had gone on for a long time, to the unmitigated disgust, he believed, of every seaman connected with the merchant service, and it had ultimately fallen into abeyance. It had since, however, been employed for the purpose of getting up a naval reserve; and he should, under the circumstances, and looking to the legislation of last year, and the existing state of feeling in the merchant service, have supposed that if one thing more than another were insisted upon in connection with the subject, it would have been that the terms held out to our seamen under the system, and the conditions upon which they were to serve, should be so plainly, and in so simple a manner set forth, that any one might understand them at a glance, and that every apprehension as to a desire existing on the part of the Admiralty to entrap men into the service should be removed. He himself had in private, during the course of last Session, urged upon the noble Lord opposite (Lord Clarence Paget) the expediency of taking that course. The noble Lord, however, appeared to have fallen into the error of attempting to cook before catching the hare, he had not got the men to come forward. So indefinite were the terms offered, that if a seaman were to ask the precise nature of the engagement he was expected to enter into, no one would venture to give him an answer. They were to be called out by proclamation on an emergency; but what was the exact interpretation of an emergency? The Act of Parliament said when Her Majesty saw fit; that made them liable to be called out at any time. That could be understood. But such was not the condition stated. What was the emergency contemplated? Was it war, invasion, or the imminent danger of it? Seamen did not know what was the meaning of the term used; how, then, could they be expected to enter into the engagement? A great deal of their legislation about seamen appeared to go on the idea that these men were fools. They were no such thing; they were a most suspicious class, for they generally found on shore those who tried to impose on them. But how could they expect men to bind themselves to their service, if they did not understand the nature of the contract? Then, as to time, the engagement was to be for five years, "unless otherwise provided." That "otherwise provided" might carry it on within a few days of ten years. The men naturally wanted to know whether they were going to bind themselves for five or ten years. A plain man would say at once, "I will make a bargain with you for five years." Undoubtedly it was a much greater advantage to get men for ten years than for five years. They must recollect, however, that they wanted A.B. seamen. There was not a very great number of them. The returns produced before the Manning Commission, showed that the whole number was only 67,000; and when they took those over age they would strike off one-fifth or sixth. They must, therefore, hold out great advantages to the men, and, first of all, they must make the terms more definite. The men must know on what terms they were engaging, and for what length of time. Take the case of married men, engaged, perhaps, in the coasting trade. They held out to them that they should be drilled at home, and that was a great inducement to such that during their month's drill they should be enabled to return at night to their wives and families. But that was not promised; it was only said if the service permitted; and seamen would, therefore, be inclined to conclude that the service would not admit of it, and they would not get home of nights. There was another question on which he could not pretend to give an opinion. When a man entered he was to have a certificate that he was A.B., and that he had served as such for so long. The shipping-office people had no authority to enter him, but they were to do all the talking. Who could tell what a recruiting sergeant said? When the seaman had been talked up to a certain point he was to be handed over to another party, who did not know what had been said before, or what bargain had been made, and then he was entered. Under such a system the seaman naturally felt there was no security that he would have the same rating as in the merchant service. It was unwise, he thought, not to take all the men they could get to enter. They might easily have framed their resolutions so as to get rid of much of their cumbrous machinery. Seamen, above all things, hated to be confined. The whole of the rules, the noble Lord would excuse him for saying, had been framed in a spirit of mistrust of the seamen. He believed the more they trusted these men the more trustworthy they would be found to be. This not only applied to seamen but to every class. While the measure was passing through Parliament he had felt great interest in it. If it had succeeded it would have been of great importance to the country by breaking down the sort of feeling which was said to exist between the two services. With that view everything ought to be done to make the terms so clear and simple that he who runs might read, and then he hoped the men would more generally come into them. They must remember that the Queen's service held out no hope of promotion, or scarcely any hope of promotion, to men before the mast. The number of warrant officers was extremely small; that was their only hope of promotion. On the other hand, if they looked to the number of able seamen in the merchant service and the number of certificated masters and mates, they must see that the chance of promotion there for good men was not only large but certain. The apprentices and boys in the merchant service were about 23,000; the uncertificated petty officers and able seamen were not 100,000; so that there being 40,000 certified masters and mates, it was perfectly clear that every A.B. of good conduct was not only certain of promotion but sought for. They could not, therefore, expect such men to enter the Queen's service unless they not only held out sufficient inducements of a pecuniary nature, but made the terms of service short, and at all events as clear and definite as possible. The Secretary for Ireland had great merit due to him for what he had done in this matter, and if the scheme had not succeeded it was owing to the want of a proper conciliatory spirit in the terms which had been promulgated.

MR. LIDDELL said, he thought the hon. Gentleman who had ascribed the failure of the naval scheme for establishing a volunteer reserve to the terms of enrolment not being sufficiently simple had hit the right nail on the head. There was too much red tape in the proposition as originally framed. The men were at first to enter for five years, and at the end of that period they were required to present themselves before the shipping master to be again enrolled. Now, the great object of the seaman was to get his pension, and by the process just named his pension was in danger. Before it could really operate as an incentive to him, he must see that his prospect of gaining it was a certain one. Again, the regulation binding the men not to take long voyages ought not to be stringently enforced; because the young and active sailor, whom it was most desirable to secure, was of an enterprising disposition, and naturally wished to see remote parts of the world. Even if allowed, after joining the reserve, to go on a distant voyage, his services might be made available in foreign waters in the event of an emergency. It was to be regretted that naval officers were not very popular with merchant seamen, many of whom refused to enter the reserve because they had to be approved by those officers. It was to be regretted likewise that a widespread feeling of distrust in the Government had been created among the seafaring classes by the treatment of the continuous-service men at the close of the Crimean war. Moreover, the shipping masters did not receive adequate compensation for the duties imposed on them in connection with this scheme, and it would be well to fix definitely the scale of that remuneration. One of those persons had recently told him that he would not for £500 a year undertake to go through all the talking and encounter all the sneering that he had experienced from the men while trying to get them to enlist during the last three months. Nothing could be more important than the projected establishment of training ships in our great ports, and this was the point he rose partly to insist upon. Twelve hundred lads annually were proposed to be admitted to these ships for a twelve months' training, and the best conducted and most proficient of their number would be then selected for the navy. Nothing could be more calculated to render the Queen's service as popular as it used to be than this mode of making admission to it the reward of the better class of youths passing through the ordinary schools of the country, and thence transported to these training ships. The system would tend to assimilate the merchant service and the Royal Navy, which had remained too long insulated, and it would also serve to raise the character of both. The cost of the experiment would not exceed £24 for each youth, and no motives of false economy should prevent the House from supporting a plan which would furnish the country yearly with 1,200 young seamen, who would form such a reserve as would enable us to pursue our ordinary avocations in peace and security. In proof of the value of the northern ports as naval nurseries, he might mention that in 1858, 875 seamen were entered at North Shields, and 918 at South Shields, while in the previous year as many as 1,113 were entered at the former and 1,331 at the latter. He was confident there would be no lack of efficient seamen for the Royal Navy if the Admiralty only gave them good pay, treated them with greater trust and better faith, and relieved them, as much as possible, from troublesome and unnecessary restrictions.

MR. LINDSAY said, that he found it impossible to support the Motion. It was with the deepest regret that he heard from the noble Lord the Secretary to the Admiralty the other evening that the number of men who had joined the naval reserve had fallen so far short of the number required. Everything had been done to give the scheme a fair chance; a forcible appeal had been made to the country, a liberal bounty had been offered, and yet it had turned out a complete failure. The merchant seamen would not enter into the Queen's service. As a Member of the Commission he had dissented from the report of his colleagues, and had foretold the failure of the scheme. He could not, therefore, join in the recommendation of what he had formerly condemned, but he sincerely regretted the fulfilment of his predictions. One fact brought out by the evidence laid before the Commission—and it was an essential one for the House to consider—was that, while the merchant service had been making great progress in the employment of mechanical appliances to reduce manual labour on board ship, not one step had been taken in that direction by the Admiralty for the last fifty years. He had suggested to the Admiralty, for instance, that patent trusses should be employed; but the answer he received was, that they would twist off the mast heads, an objection which he had never heard made in the American service, where trusses were largely used. By adopting mechanical appliances 800 men might be enabled to do the work of 1,000, and thus fewer men would be required for each ship, and a saving effected in the cost of the crew. Another thing which he thought might be done with advantage would be to decrease the number of seamen and increase that of marines. The evidence before the Commission proved that that might be done without interfering with the efficient working of the vessel; and, as a marine cost only some £32 a year, while a sailor cost £44, the sum of £12 per man might thus be saved every year. He proposed that the whole of the seaport towns should be garrisoned by marines, and that the men should be trained part of the week afloat at the great gun exercise, and part of the week ashore in military duties. They might also be exercised in the bay in boats, and they would thus be made more efficient, if required, to go to sea. In the event of hostilities the marines would be embarked on board the fleet, the line regiments would garrison the seaports, and the militia would take care of the inland towns. He believed that if this plan were adopted, it would considerably reduce the expense of the army. The noble Lord the Secretary to the Admiralty said the other night that sailors were suspicious, and would not enter the reserve for fear of being entrapped. Why had they such fears? Because for years there had been an impassable barrier between the merchant service and the Royal Navy, and it was his wish to break down that barrier. With that object in view, he had brought forward the propositions recorded in the blue-book. Commencing with the boys, he would have school or training ships common to both services. The Government should have the power of nominating one portion and the merchant shipowners the other portion of the boys to be trained in those ships, from which, according to their good conduct or their efficient training, they should be drafted into either the one or the other service. Then he would have a common seamen's fund, to which the officers in both services should contribute, and which should be distributable among the seamen of both services. He further proposed that Greenwich Hospital should be opened, not merely to seamen of the Royal Navy, but to all who had joined the reserve. Sailors in both services would then be brought up together in youth, associated together in manhood, and succoured in the same asylum in old age. There was another point upon which he was sorry to say he differed in toto from all his colleagues. He advocated an appeal to the officers of the merchant service to enter the proposed reserve, as well as to the men. There was a great scarcity in the Royal Navy of officers physically efficient, and he believed there was a scarcity even now of active young lieutenants. Supposing the emergency arose, which he hoped never would arise, and they had to call upon the reserve of men, what would be the use of 30,000 men, if they had them, without experienced officers? In his opinion they would be nothing more or less than a rabble. If education and social position, officers of the merchant service were the equals of naval officers, and he thought it a great oversight not to appeal to them. He was glad to find that there was a change with respect to flogging in the navy, and he believed the service would be more popular if what sailors called the black articles were expunged from the Articles of War.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, he did not rise for the purpose of opposing the Motion of his gallant Friend. Far from it, and he was exceedingly glad that his gallant Friend had called the attention of the House to the question of Manning the Navy, but he hoped to be able to convince him before he sat down, that the Government were carrying out, one by one, the recommendations of the Royal Commissioners. But he would first make one or two remarks upon what had been said by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley) and the hon. Member for Northumberland (Mr. Liddell) in reference to the volunteer force. It was not surprising that in all these matters there should be a great difference of opinion. The right hon. Gentleman said they tied them up too tightly, for they enrolled them for five years, and then if a war broke out, they insisted upon the men remaining another five years. Now all he could state was, that if there was not some guarantee of that sort, and if there should be a war towards the end of the term, the greater part of the men enrolled might say that they would not go to sea. His hon. Friend the member for Northumberland opposite said, why not enter the men for life? So that it would be seen that on the one hand they would be asked to enter them for life, and on the other for only five years, and then let them go perfectly free. He would admit that this measure was fraught with considerable difficulty, and the observations which hon. Gentlemen made were extremely valuable. It should be recollected, however, that it was a new measure, and if the Admiralty found that it did not work well, they would be the first to tell the House so, and say that it required amendment. Some hon. Gentlemen condemned the measure, but it had only been in operation for six weeks, and it was rather too early to assume that it had failed. On the contrary, the last accounts from the north were that men were beginning to get over the extraordinary delusion that they were to be entrapped into the service and sent off to China, and he had reason to believe, from letters he had received from shipping masters, that the few words he had addressed to the House the other night had already produced a good effect. It was, therefore, to be hoped that in course of time, when the misapprehension he had alluded to was cleared away, and the matter set in its proper light before the men, the reluctance which had lately seemingly prevailed on their part to enter the service would vanish, and that there would be no cause to be dissatisfied with the measure itself on that account. But it was certainly pressing too hardly upon the measure to condemn it really before sufficient time had elapsed to enable its efficiency to be tested. As regarded the remarks of his gallant Friend the Member for Southwark, he was glad to be in a position to assure him in reference to his suggestion to place efficient ships on the Coastguard, that the Admiralty were already doing all in their power for that purpose. The Majestic, a screw line-of-battle ship, was stationed at Liverpool on the Coastguard service; and the Dauntless, a frigate, on another station. As to the complaint of the pensioners that when sent on board they did not always get the same ratings as they had had when in the service before, the Admiralty had no knowledge of such a thing. It might occasionally happen that a pensioner going on board ship might be found not so capable of discharging the duties of a petty officer as when he was before in the service, and in such cases an officer would only be discharging his duty in removing an inefficient man from the post to make room for a better. Another complaint was that the men could not get leave to go into the country, but were kept prisoners in the neighbourhood of the ship. [SIR CHARLES NAPIER: At the ports.] His gallant Friend was wholly misinformed, for if the men wished to leave the port, and could show good reason for asking such indulgence, and were persons who could be depended on to return at the expiration of their leave, they had only to ask for a pass to enable them to go where they pleased. It was true they did not allow these men to leave the neighbourhood of the port unless they asked for a pass. Moreover, discretion was requisite as to whether the ship was or was not likely to be ordered to sea. It would be easily understood that it would be impossible to allow liberty-men to leave the neighbourhood of the port if the ship was under sailing orders.

SIR CHARLES NAPIER: Whom are they to ask?

LORD CLARENCE PAGET: The captain of the ship.

SIR CHARLES NAPIER: Suppose he should change his mind?

LORD CLARENCE PAGET: His gallant Friend next said, "Why not man the seaports with marines;" but no one knew better than he that if marines did not get their turn of sea duty, they became nothing more nor less than landmen. He agreed entirely in the expediency of gradually increasing the number of marines, and the Admiralty were taking steps to carry out the recommendations of the Commission on that point. The late Government had taken a Vote for 2,000 extra marines, and the present Government had also added 1,000 men to the force. With regard to the training ships recommended by the Royal Commission there were two distinct schemes, one being for the education of 2,000 boys for the navy at the public expense, and another that a large number of boys should be educated on board of training ships at the mercantile ports, partly at the public, and partly at their own parents' expense, of whom a portion should be taken into the navy; the former and more important scheme would, if the House approved of the Estimates, be now carried out, and with regard to the second part of the scheme—namely, the education of the merchant boys, the Government had by no means given up that part of the scheme; but the arrangements connected with the volunteer force were really running away with so much money that they thought it better to proceed cautiously, and see how the scheme was likely to succeed on the whole. Many other recommendations of the commission, not adverted to by the gallant Admiral, the Admiralty were endeavouring to carry out. For instance, they were giving additional pay to gunnery lieutenants, and they were also giving a 1*d.* a day additional to what were called trained men—men who had passed an examination in gunnery. The Admiralty had by no means set their faces against the suggestion of the hon. Member for Sunderland (Mr. Lindsay) with regard to the officers of merchant vessels, but they did not wish to go on too fast. First let it be seen how the men dropped in, and if that result were satisfactory it would be open for consideration in what manner advantage could be taken of the services of merchant officers. Many improvements had taken place with the view of rendering the position of men in the navy more comfortable. They now received their cooking utensils free; continuous-service men had their clothes given to them; and various points of details, such as paying the men more frequently, improvement in the system of paying allotments, badge money, outfit to petty officers on promotion to warrant officers, pensions to warrant officers, were in process of carrying out by the Admiralty. Again, the Coastguard was proposed to be increased this year by 500 men, and other matters, with which he need not trouble the House, were under consideration with a view to effect still further improvements. He hoped he had said enough to show that it had been the consistent endeavour of the Board of Admiralty to take advantage of every recommendation contained in the Report of the Royal Commission, and as far as possible to carry them into effect.

MR. H. TAYLOR said, he wished to remind the House that the coasting trade, which had always been regarded as the nursery of the navy, was most injuriously affected by the increase of railways and screw steamers. Half of the coal which was annually brought to London now reached the metropolis through the instrumentality of steam, either by sea or on land, and one screw steamer of 800 tons, managed by a crew of eight able seamen, was capable of carrying as much coal as eight sailing ships, which would require 70 or 80 men and boys. He believed that in the course of a few years 80 or 90 screw steamers, employing from 600 to 800 men, would fulfil all the requirements of a trade which now found employment for 800 or 900 ships, with 8,000 or 9,000 men. The general trade was becoming narrowed in the same way, as shipowners found that it was for their interests to employ steam in place of sailing vessels; and the result would be, that in some short time to come great difficulty would be experienced in procuring sailors in sufficient numbers for the navy. He had given the subject very serious consideration, and, as a sailor himself, he believed the Government ought to consider the propriety of establishing school ships, in which lads should be trained for the naval service.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE observed that he had listened with great pleasure to the details given by the noble Lord respecting the extent to which the Government had carried out the recommendations of the Royal Naval Commission. But it could not be too strongly urged that the school system was the very basis and foundation of all their recommendations towards the formation of a reserve of 10,000 or 12,000 men, and that they ought not to hesitate at a trifling expenditure, when by its means they expected to procure the very best material for maintaining the future efficiency of the navy. In answer to the hon. Member for Sunderland (Mr. W. Lindsay), he would remind the House that in men-of-war the number of men was proportioned not to the machinery or steam power, but to the guns; and if patent trusses or improved machinery of the kind were placed in such vessels, the force applied would soon pull them to pieces. They had been tried on board two vessels, and but that the yards were fortunately slung in chains, they would have been down on the top of the men's heads. He believed that if the Government steadily refused to increase the bounty, and simply established school ships, taking every possible means of giving publicity to the advantages which were offered, after a little patience things would present a very different aspect from what they did at present. There were other matters, however, which had not been touched upon by the noble Lord the Secretary of the Admiralty, and one of the most important of those was the hulk accommodation. The Bellerophon, at Portsmouth, had been improved as much as was possible, but still not more than one-fifth of the ship's company could get into the galley; and, having no resource but either to go to bed or walk the decks like caged beasts, he did not think it was to be wondered at that the men seized every opportunity of getting away from such a wretched abode, and of getting their feet to a good public-house fire. Comfortable docks and barracks would go far to make the men behave more like Christians than they had sometimes done. In paying off a ship's company, likewise, he believed that some change might be effected with advantage. At present a ship when dismantled presented a most disheartening spectacle. The system and discipline which it had taken four or five years to build up was scattered to the winds, and he had heard captains say that the night before a crew was paid off was one of the most saddening and dispiriting possible. He believed that such a practice was unnecessary, that it was a remnant of barbarism which had clung to the service, and that its bad effects only required to be fully understood to lead to its being done away with. Some difference ought to be made, in paying off the crew, between the men who entered for continuous service and those who left probably with the intention of not returning again. The former might receive two-thirds of the pay which appeared from the paymaster's books to be due to them, and with this advance they might be permitted to visit their friends without any delay. On their return they would obtain the balance which was due to them; and if they had been unfortunate enough to fall among thieves they would have the means of regaining a respectable appearance. The Government would have a perfect right to retain a portion of the money, because no man had a right to return as a beggar to the service with which he had become connected. As to the other men who left them there need not be so much ceremony; but as to the continuous service men, he urged the Government to take his suggestion into their consideration. They were about to discuss a Motion on the subject of flogging in the navy; he believed for some of the crimes committed on board ship it would be impossible wholly to do away with flogging. But if the men were tried by court-martial, as in the army, it would tend to familiarize the officers with the rules of evidence, and give men an idea of security; they would be satisfied that justice was done. It would not reduce the amount of flogging; on the contrary, it would rather increase it, as if tried by court-martial every man who deserved flogging would get it; at present, many who deserved it did not get it; the Admiralty were so severe on captains in the matter of punishment on board their ships, that they often forbore it from apprehension of the consequences to themselves. As to the Articles of War, they were never acted on, and he did not see why they should be allowed to remain in their present obsolete form. Could not a Commission of naval officers be appointed to modify them, and bring them into accordance with the more humane notions of the present day?

SIR MICHAEL SEYMOUR said, he was glad to hear the assurance from the noble Secretary to the Admiralty that the Government was desirous of carrying into effect the recommendations of the Manning Commission. The inutility of the volunteer system had been proved, and this Commission, presided over by men of great experience and intelligence, had, in their Report, recommended a naval reserve as the best means of increasing their force. But he regretted that the attempts to form this reserve had not been successful. The question was no doubt one of the most pressing importance, but it was a mistake to suppose that the harshness with which they were treated was the cause which prevented sailors from entering the navy. He believed the gradual improvement in the treatment of the seamen in ships of war, and the greater attention to their comforts, had much broken down the aversion formerly entertained; and it was rather ignorance of the present condition of men in the service that caused the difficulty in obtaining them in sufficient numbers. He rejoiced that the Admiralty had conceded pensions to the widows of warrant officers; the concession had been too long delayed. The Report of the Commission often alluded to the compulsory system of manning the navy of France. That system gave France an advantage if any sudden increase in her naval force was required—a matter of great anxiety in the event of a disturbance of the peace between the two countries. Not possessing such a system, England could only depend on money rewards and other attractions to draw men into the naval service. Their Navy Estimates, therefore, must always stand at a high figure, and the only prospect of a reduction was in some plan of a reserve. The most reliable part of the present reserve were the coast-guard men, who made a fine body of sailors; their conduct on board the ships they served in during the Russian war was exceedingly creditable to them. The other parts of the present reserve were not so reliable. Even the Coast Volunteer system had been a failure, for no dependence could be placed on the men coming forward in large numbers in cases of emergency. As to the pensions for the reserve, he disapproved them for short service; it would be better to give an equal amount in the rate of pay after four or five years' service. It was of the highest importance that every effort should be made to augment the force of continuous-service men. He quite agreed with hon. Members who had spoken of the advantages which both the merchant service and the Royal Navy would derive from the establishment of school ships. They would, in all probability, take the place of the old apprentice system. He should hail with pleasure any scheme that would unite the mercantile service with the navy, being satisfied that the naval service would be greatly the gainer. With respect to the subject of punishment, he entirely concurred in the opinion that it would be inexpedient in a Government service, such as that of the navy, to abolish the system of flogging. As a body, naval officers were desirous to abate the severity of that system as far as possible, but the power of inflicting corporal punishment must, in order to secure discipline, be maintained. He recollected an instance in which three out of a brigade of 300 or 400 men had been guilty of committing a gross outrage on a woman, which had resulted in her death, and he felt assured that the instant punishment which had followed the commission of the act had not only had a duly deterrent effect upon the rest of the men, but had been regarded by them as just and right.

MR. BENTINCK said, it appeared to him to be impossible to overrate the importance of this question. There were very few men either in or out of the House who did not desire to keep up our naval defences. Something had been done already to put them in a better state, but in the contingency of a reverse at the beginning of a naval war—an event he would not anticipate—the whole of the £13,000,000 which the House was asked to vote for the navy would have been completely thrown away, unless a reserve of men had been formed at least equal to half those on board ships in commission. He was, therefore, glad to find that it was the intention of the Government to carry into effect the recommendations of the Manning Commission, as well as to hear from his noble Friend the Secretary to the Admiralty that two block-ships had been removed, and their places supplied by vessels of a better class. For his own part, he should like to see the same course pursued in the case of all our block-ships, which he regarded as perfectly useless, and he felt assured that in order to effect that or any similar object which would place our navy on a thoroughly efficient footing the House of Commons would not hesitate to vote the necessary supplies, so that the Government had only themselves to blame if they failed to state fully and plainly to the House what it was they required. A great mistake had been made in 1857 when so many ships were paid off, but for that the Government, and not the House of Commons, were responsible. He looked upon the appointment of a man conversant with the details of the naval profession, as his noble Friend opposite (Lord C. Paget) was, to the office of Secretary to the Admiralty as a step in the right direction, because he could not help thinking the system of selection for that office, as well as the higher offices of the Board, of men merely for oratorical ability, was one which was extremely vicious in principle. Before long he hoped to see a thorough reconstruction of that Board. He should merely observe, in conclusion, that the exclusion of boys from particular departments of the navy who did not happen to be possessed of that proficiency in reading and writing to which others had attained seemed to him to be impolitic, for the dunces among our youth, as some persons might be disposed to call them, had frequently arms as strong as their heads were thick, and, if they were but afforded the means of learning their profession, might furnish the country with most efficient seamen.

ADMIRAL WALCOTT:—I give my cordial support to the Motion now before the House, as it is of paramount importance to put forth every effort to accomplish the manning of the navy. I feel no apprehension that England will prove unequal to any emergency which may befall her. At the present moment there are in all 162,012 British, and 14,375 foreign seamen employed in the merchant service, and it would be of signal advantage to induce an adequate number of them to enter the Royal Navy. The first step in the right direction is to enlist year by year 2,000 to 4,000 boys; and I am glad to learn that measures are to be taken to provide school ships for the former number. If these vessels were despatched to the principal mercantile ports, some of the finest lads in the country—not boys from reformatories—could avail themselves of the opportunity. The greatest caution must be exercised in the selection of officers, they must be men like those of Her Majesty's ship Britannia, possessed of good temper, forbearance, and discretion. I had the pleasure of personally visiting Captain Harris now of that ship, when in command of Her Majesty's ship Illustrious, and after a most careful inspection of the system which he pursued, I give my most cheerful testimony to the admirable measures to a desirable end which were there amply exhibited. It is a melancholy truth much to be deplored by all right-thinking men who have the interest of the service at heart, that in it there is not sufficient encouragement held out to the A.B. The sailor is a roving creature, like the elements with which he has to battle, given to change and excitement, and he is especially averse to an engagement of five years. The case of Lieutenants, who rarely attain the promotion which they have a right to expect, is full of painful reflection. From the first hour when I entered the navy to the present time it has been impossible for me to be blind to a system of invidious patronage and baneful partiality. Let it once be an assured fact that there is only one direct and certain road to employment, promotion and honour, and that to be a thorough practical seaman every inch, to possess scientific knowledge, to devote heart and spirit to the duties of the profession, and you would exercise a magical influence and enthralling fascination. Instead of broken-hearted grey-haired men, you would inspire spirited youths to enter and continue a succession of men who uphold the honour of a service, never sinking into apathy and disgust at its injustice, but enthusiastically attached to it and exceedingly eager to earn distinction. The reward of merit is a glory to a country, to withhold it is its shame and discredit; to bestow it improperly is a cruel wrong to the deserving, a snare to those who are not so, and the betrayal of a national trust. Efficient as the navy is, secure as we are that it will ever win new lustre when put upon its trial, let only justice be shown in England to the officer and man and they will maintain her supremacy, her honour, and her existence, with the new vigour that springs from the certainty of her approval, and the affection that is quickened by its bestowal.

MR. DIGBY SEYMOUR remarked that there was some inconsistency in the answer given by the Secretary to the Admiralty, for while he had not offered any opposition to the Motion, he seemed to intimate that the Government would not pledge themselves at once to carry out the recommendations of the Manning Commission. He thought the Government ought at once to pledge themselves to bring in a Bill if necessary to carry out those recommendations with a view of meeting the present exigency, and of providing a constant supply for the navy in the future. One of the chief recommendations was relative to the establishment of school-ships, and Captain Engledue and Captain Vincent, among others, had both given the clearest testimony as to the importance of that recommendation, stating that the merchant service would hail the establishment of these training ships with delight, believing that the class of apprentices would thereby be improved. Only last night he had been present at a meeting at Southampton, called for the purpose of memorializing the Government to place one of these training schoolships in Southampton Water. There was a very general expression of opinion in favour of that proposal; and if Government grudged the expense, if they would only find the ship and half the cost, the other portion, he believed, would readily be subscribed at the port and throughout the county of Hampshire. Captain Sullivan estimated the expense of one of these ships for one year at £4,000, including extras, such as £100 for a chaplain; the Commission had recommended that there should be ten or twelve of them; the whole expense, therefore, of establishing these schoolships, and carrying out this great national experiment, would be £48,000. The plan which Captain Sullivan proposed, was to take boys of twelve or thirteen years of age for a year, then to apprentice them to the merchant service; at the end of their five years to let them serve for two years in a vessel of the Royal Navy, and then to bind themselves to enter at any time into the Royal Naval Volunteers, so as to be called on at any time when war menaced. There was one other recommendation he should like to refer to. Captain Sullivan pointed out the fact of about 10,000 situations at the command of the Treasury, and other public departments of the Government. Those situations were invariably given to those who had extraordinary political influence with the Government. There could be no doubt, however, that there were many of those situations, such as tide-waiters, land-writing, for which well deserving seamen were qualified, and which he (Mr. Digby Seymour) thought ought to be given in reference to a scale of merit, instead of being placed at the service of gentlemen who had given, or promised to give, their political support and influence to the Government for the time being. He protested against such a system. The new field of rewards after long years of valuable services thus opened would, with the other arrangements, go far to popularize the Royal Navy. Give that force the opportunity of an introduction not only to the Coastguard service, to Greenwich Hospital, to pensions from the State,—but add to those anticipated advantages those offices to which he had referred—offices that would best fulfil the purposes for which they existed if they were appropriated as the rewards of honest merit in the naval forces of the country.

SIR CHARLES NAPIER said, in reply, he assured the noble Lord that he had made no mistake. The order given at Portsmouth was clear and distinct, that if a man passed certain limits he was to be taken up as a straggler. Was the British sailor, he asked, to be reduced to that in the present day? Why, even in the war time, he was never obliged to go and point out to his officer beforehand the exact spot where he wanted to go, and then only at his peril stray a hair's breadth beyond it. For the life of him he could not tell how such a nefarious system could have ever been conceived by the Admiralty—a system which was now producing the greatest discontent at Portsmouth, and which could not be too quickly abolished. The practice of refitting a vessel when she arrived in port was an absurd waste of public money. When ships came home their crews should be at once discharged into other vessels ready to receive them, where they would be found to do their duty just as well. He concurred with his hon. Friend who had just spoken, in the propriety of distributing the offices within the patronage of the Government to such men as had served their country well, and who were fitted for those situations. He had been assured that it was not intended to “cushion” his present Motion. To test the sincerity of the Government, he begged to ask whether they intended to remove the “beastly” block-ships, and substitute efficient vessels for them? It would depend upon the answer he received to that question whether or not he should divide the House.

Resolved,—

FLOGGING (ARMY AND NAVY).

RETURNS MOVED FOR.

MR. W. WILLIAMS, in rising to call the attention of the House to flogging in the Army and Navy, said the system was most injurious to those services because it prevented respectable men from joining them. Upon their soldiers and sailors the country depended for fame, for honour and for security, and yet under the existing practice our soldiers and sailors were liable, for trivial offences, to receive worse treatment than that given to convicted criminals and felons. By the present law no culprit could be flogged in the public streets except one who had actually threatened the life of the Queen. Yet our soldiers and sailors were placed on the same degraded level as that execrable miscreant; and even one quarter of the cruelty to which they might be subjected with impunity would, if only inflicted on a horse or an ass bring the perpetrators of such brutality within the penalties of imprisonment and hard labour. It was said by many officers that the abolition of flogging would lead to a total subversion of discipline. But the hon. and gallant General (Sir De Lacy Evans), whose opinion on such a subject was most valuable, declared some years ago, when examined before a Commission, that he believed the system of flogging in the army to be totally useless, and most injurious in its effect, by preventing respectable persons from enlisting. The officers who opposed the abolition of this punishment were influenced just as the Judges and Recorders were influenced when it was proposed to humanize our criminal code. "If," they said, "you do away with the penalty of death for a vast number of offences, the country will be overwhelmed with crime." Yet the result had been a diminution instead of an increase of crime throughout the land. The same result in his opinion would follow, if flogging were abolished in the army and navy. Within his recollection the maximum number of lashes inflicted in the army was 1,000. This number was reduced to 300, and after a soldier had been flogged to death at Hounslow barracks the Duke of Wellington, much to his credit, reduced it still further to fifty lashes, without in the least impairing the discipline of the army. It was not often that descriptions of this punishment appeared in the newspapers, but whenever they did they excited the greatest disgust in the public mind. A short time ago two soldiers were flogged at Woolwich, and this was a description of the scene taken from the highest source:—

"The first man, named Green, bore his punishment, as stated by an eye-witness, 'like a true soldier;' but the second, named Davis, a young recruit, protested his innocence of the crime of desertion, bellowed and screamed for mercy, and supplicated Colonel Talbot and the medical officer, and others who were present, to have compassion on him, or he should die. His back was covered with a mass of large, red, inflamed boils, which bled profusely at every stroke, and reddened the ground under his feet, upon which the cat was ordered to be withheld for a few moments, when, finding that the punishment was not at an end, he gave vent to exclamations for mercy, and partly succeeded in delivering himself by force from the straps which bound him to the halyards. The punishment was again ordered to be continued, when, at every succeeding stroke, his cries and exclamations were most lamentable, inasmuch that officers and men swooned away at the sickening spectacle, and had to be carried into the open air. One officer and upwards of twenty non-commissioned officers and men long in the service closed their eyes, lest they too should become unnerved, and be subject to the reproach and ridicule of their comrades."

It was a disgrace to our Christianity and our civilization that such disgusting exhibitions should be allowed. Soldiers who were flogged suffered severely in constitution. Some years ago Mr. Wakley stated that, in his opinion, and that of the medical profession, when a man of nervous temperament was flogged, some fatal disease, probably consumption, was almost invariably produced. They were obliged to abolish flogging for the Sepoys, and yet they treated in this cruel and inhuman manner men who were equal to a dozen Sepoys. The Duke of Cambridge, much to his honour and credit, had recently issued regulations in restraint of flogging; but he (Mr. Williams) did not anticipate much effect from them, and he hoped his Royal Highness would abolish flogging altogether. If the system were now gradually falling into disuse, there might be some encouragement for those who opposed it; but a recent Return; seemed to show that it was extending. In 1847 only forty-two men were flogged in the whole army, the number of lashes being 2,200; in 1852 forty-five men were flogged, the number of lashes being 2,250;

but in 1858 the number of men flogged was 218, and of lashes inflicted 9,338. He now turned to the navy. The punishment in the army was mercy itself compared with that in the navy. The cat was heavier in the navy; it was wielded in a different manner, and it was admitted that fifty lashes in the navy were equivalent to 150 in the army. The maximum punishment was the flogging round the fleet, from which he believed a man rarely recovered; and it was a common saying that it would be far less cruel to string up the criminal at the yardarm at once. He (Mr. Williams) was sorry to say that flogging had also of late increased in the navy. In 1852 the number of men punished was 578, and they received 17,570 lashes; whereas in 1858, 997 men received 32,420 lashes. In the army the flogging was inflicted to a certain extent in an open manner, for, though in some cases the barracks might be closed, still the news spread to the whole neighbourhood around, and this circumstance operated as a check on the punishment in the army. In the navy, however, the flogging was kept quite close. If a stranger not belonging to the navy happened to be aboard ship when flogging was about to be inflicted he was ordered ashore, so that he could not be a witness to the punishment. In 1858 there were inflicted in the army 23,000 fewer lashes than in the navy. The present Admiralty had followed the example of the Duke of Cambridge with respect to regulations as to flogging, and he trusted that some effect would be experienced in the diminution of the punishment, if it was not, as he trusted it would be, abolished altogether. It appeared to him most extraordinary and unaccountable that the greatest number of punishments in the navy was inflicted for drunkenness. It seemed a marvel to him how men could get drunk on board ship, where there was no beershop or grogshop. He was told that this result was accomplished by one man selling his grog to another, and then the extra quantity got in the head and made the man drunk. It only required ordinary common sense either in the officers or the Admiralty to put a stop to that practice. If a man did not wish to drink his grog, let him be paid the full value of it instead; but let him be punished if he received it and then sold it to another. In the navy a certain number of sailors messed together, with a sort of head man over them—at least such used to be the case—and it would put an end to the system of drunkenness if that head man had authority to prevent the grog being drunk by any but the person to whom it was served. Then more than half of the flogging in the navy would cease. A dreadful case had occurred within the last three months. A sailor had been found guilty by a court-martial of insubordination approaching to mutiny, his offence consisting in having, when in a state of drunkenness, put his head out of the porthole of the ship to which he belonged, and called out, "Lads, do what they did on board the Liffey, and roll shot about." He had also done something to the boatswain. Such was his crime, and for it he was ordered to receive fifty lashes. Now, if he had been sober when he had made use of the words imputed to him, there could be no doubt that he would have deserved punishment; but it was clear that the poor creature was drunk at the time. The scene which occurred at the punishment was described in a local print of very moderate politics, the Plymouth Journal, which stated that when the boatswain, who had been insulted by the culprit, was seen preparing to give him the first dozen lashes, the excitement of the dockyard labourers was intense; and the affair ended in a fight between them and the authorities of the Cæsar, to which the man belonged. It had been stated that the first American frigate which took one of our frigates of larger force in the late war was manned almost entirely by English deserters, all of whom had been flogged; and that these men all the time loved their country as much as ever, but that they had been so disgusted by the barbarities of the service, that there were no lengths to which they were not prepared to go in order to show their hatred of the system. The principal offences for which sailors were flogged were drunkenness, absence without leave, insubordination, dirtiness, neglect of duty, telling untruths, theft, smoking at a man's post, fighting, &c. Was it right that a brave fellow should have his back flayed and his flesh torn from his bones for such offences? Why, it was one of the greatest qualities a seaman could possess to be always ready for a fight. Was it to be endured that men to whom the country owed so much of its greatness should be subjected to such treatment because old gentlemen with high naval titles had no ideas but such as were in vogue fifty years ago, when their ships were manned by means of the press-gang? He was persuaded that flogging was the cause why such difficulty was found in manning the navy, and that if it were abolished, they would have the choice of the best men in the merchant service. For several years past he had moved for a series of returns relating to this subject, and he now proposed to add to them a new feature, which was the name of the captain of each ship in which men were flogged. He would tell the House why he did this. For two years the noble and gallant Officer (Lord C. Paget) had commanded in the Princess Royal. Notwithstanding the high state of discipline and efficiency to which he brought the crew, he had never flogged a man. Well, he was succeeded by a captain who flogged 53 of his men, on whom he inflicted no fewer than 2,700 lashes. Having stated that fact in the House, he (Mr. Williams) received a letter from a gallant Admiral assuring him that he must have made some mistake, for no man had a higher character for humanity than Captain Baillie, who was then commanding the ship. Accordingly, he (Mr. Williams) made further inquiries, and at length he ascertained that the captain who had flogged 53 men was one who came between the noble Lord and Captain Baillie. To prevent mistakes of that kind, which might be very prejudicial to the characters of meritorious officers, he (Mr. Williams) should propose the addition he had named. Men were sometimes ordered to be flogged for drunkenness by officers who themselves were guilty of the same offence. This year more than £500,000 had been expended in bounties, and it was stated that the Government had obtained 10,000 men, it did not appear that more than 1,500 of them were able seamen. Let them only abolish flogging and he had no doubt that they would get without difficulty as many of the sort they wanted as they pleased. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving for the following Returns:—

“Return of the number of men flogged in the Army and Militia in the year 1859, specifying the offence, the regiments, the place of station, the time, the sentence, and the number of lashes inflicted on each man (in continuation of Parliamentary Paper, No. 519, of Session 1858); also, Return of the number of persons flogged in the Navy in the year 1859, specifying the name of the ships and of the commanding officers, the offence, the sentence, and the number of lashes inflicted on each person, stating whether by order of Court Martial or the Commanding

Mr. BRISTOW, in seconding the Motion, said, that both the War Office and the Admiralty had recently issued excellent regulations on the subject, but he wished to see flogging altogether abolished. It was a cruel punishment and formed one of the most prominent anomalies which existed between our civil and our military jurisprudence. The ordinary tribunals of the country inflicted the same penalty for the same offence, whoever the culprit might be; but in the army and navy there was one law for officers and another for men. If at a time like the present, when they were endeavouring to make the army and navy efficient, and, if possible, to popularize them—if at such a time the returns quoted by his hon. Friend be true, he would ask was that the means to obtain the increased number of men asked for, for both services? Another paradox in the system was this—What was there in the character of an Englishman so degraded that this punishment must be inflicted upon him, while there was no such thing as flogging in the French army? He remembered last year asking a French officer, who had held a distinguished position in the Crimea, if there was any flogging in the French army, and that officer's reply was, “Neither the French men nor the French soldiers are brutes.” The time was come when this punishment, degrading alike to the person who ordered it, the person who administered it, and the person who received it, should be entirely done away with.

COLONEL NORTH asked the hon. Member for Lambeth whether he had ascertained the truth of the statements he had made to the House? [Mr. W. WILLIAMS: Yes.] He recollected as far back as 1855 or 1856 the hon. Member made a most serious charge against the commanding officer and the officers of the 26th Regiment. But the hon. Member made the statement in so clumsy a manner that he (Colonel North) had no hesitation in getting up and denying it from beginning to end. The following day he (Colonel North) had received a letter from the commanding officer of the 26th, stating that every word of the statement was incorrect. On the present occasion the hon. Gentleman had made use of the name of Colonel Talbot, of the Artillery, who commanded the parade on the occasion referred to, and he (Colonel North) wished to ask the hon. Gentleman if he had taken the trouble to ascertain whether it was in the power of Colonel Talbot to remit a single one of the lashes? Why, possibly, he had no more power to do so than the hon. Member for Lambeth himself. Under these circumstances it was perfectly intolerable that a person should get up and brand an officer with cruelty and discreditable conduct without first ascertaining whether that officer had power to remit the sentence or not. The only person who had power, under ordinary circumstances, to remit the punishment in the absence of the officer who had confirmed the sentence was the surgeon of the regiment. A more painful duty could not devolve on any officer than to be obliged to superintend a punishment parade; but he should have a mean opinion of one who shirked the duty if it fell to his lot. The hon. Member had year after year complained of flogging in the army and navy. If the hon. Member, or any other civilian who joined in his complaints, could devise a punishment which, while it was severe, would keep the soldier only a short time away from his duty, he would be hailed with the greatest gratitude by the whole army and navy. What was wanted was a punishment that would not throw extra duty on the well-behaved soldier. He had known many men who did not care for being three months in confinement; and while they were there, who was doing their work? Why, the good soldier, who ought to be protected by the officers instead of having the duties of his disorderly comrades thrust upon him in addition to his own. The hon. Seconder of the Motion had stated that in the French army there was no flogging. Did he inquire how crimes were punished in that army? If he had done so he would have found that where we flog the French shoot. Would the English public like a man to be shot for knocking down a non-commissioned officer? Do not then talk about our treating men as brutes, when the French shot where we flogged. In Berlin soldiers were punished by being placed in a room six feet by four, with a series of re-entering angles, so that it was impossible for him to stand. The punishment was, in fact, so severe, that they were obliged to take the culprits into the guardhouse at night. But would that be tolerated in England? The officers of the army and navy had to curb the natural passions of men. A civilian might set as what would be the state of the navy and army if drunkenness were allowed in those services? Discipline must be maintained in the army, drunkenness checked, and orderly behaviour enforced; if it were not, the hon. Member for Lambeth would be one of the first to complain.

MR. ALDERMAN SALOMONS said, he could corroborate the statement of the hon. Member for Lambeth in regard to the flogging at Woolwich. He thought it was not enough to condemn military men for flogging men for slight offences, but this House ought also to bear its share of the blame for having given them authority to do so.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, he had no objection to the Returns desired by the hon. Member, provided he would leave out the names of the officers who were obliged to inflict corporal punishment. [Mr. W. WILLIAMS: Oh, no!] As his hon. and gallant Friend had stated, it was one of the most painful duties that officers could perform to superintend the infliction of that dreadful corporal punishment. But, as the service was at present constituted, it was one that, he was bound to say, could not be immediately and wholly abolished. During the past year the heads of the two services had endeavoured, by introducing a system of classification, to lessen gradually this disgraceful punishment, and it was a proof of the anxiety of the officers to prevent flogging as much as possible, that out of the whole Channel Fleet only three per cent of the men had been put into the second class—that is to say, the class which was liable to corporal punishment without the sentence of a court-martial. His hon. Friend the Member for Lambeth had of late been in the habit of quoting him as an officer who did not flog. He could assure his hon. Friend that he was not the man to shrink from flogging if he thought it absolutely necessary. He had had the good fortune to have very excellent officers with him, and likewise very good crews, and had consequently been able to get rid of much of it in his ships. But he must positively state that the hon. Member for Lambeth was very much mistaken if he supposed that he (Lord C. Paget) should not flog a man to-morrow if he thought it absolutely necessary. His hon. Friend had quoted returns of the entries of seamen into the navy. He said we could not get good seamen; that out of the recent entries there was only a very small proportion of men. He wished to correct his

hon. Friend. They had entered within the last year upwards of 10,000 seamen; and out of that number there were upwards of 4,000 able seamen, showing that more than a third were able-bodied. He could not give a better proof to him than this, that we had the pick of the best seamen of the country. And to show that the navy was not in so unfortunate a condition as had been represented, he might state that out of the whole fleet there was only three per cent of desertions. This was most satisfactory, and showed that the fleet was not so unpopular at this moment as was asserted. He had stated to the hon. Member for Lambeth last year that the present articles of war were not at all in accordance with the feelings of the age, and that it was the intention of the Government to bring in a Bill to improve the naval code and discipline; and if the hon. Member would have patience he would see a Bill shortly introduced to that end. It would deal with all the matters that had been referred to by the hon. Member; and he hoped would prove satisfactory to the House. He trusted the hon. Member would consent to leave out the names of the officers, whose misfortune, and not whose fault, it had been that they had been compelled to inflict corporal punishment on any of their men.

MR. ROEBUCK said, he thought the hon. and gallant Member (Colonel North) had spoken of the Motion in somewhat of an angry tone; but it appeared to him a wise and good thing to bring it forward. It was not directed in a spirit of animosity against the officers of the army and navy, who were acting under necessity. Those who, with himself and the hon. Member for Lambeth, held that the punishment of flogging should be done away with wished an inquiry into the matter. He was old enough to recollect when hanging was the universal punishment in England, and when nothing else could be done with a culprit. No classes of persons were so bent upon hanging as the Judges. And when they were told that certain philosophers and philanthropists were persuaded that men could be kept in the path of duty without hanging, they held up their hands and turned up their eyes at so preposterous an idea. But they had seen that those learned persons were utterly mistaken. In the same way the authorities of the army and navy might not be infallible. All that was asked was to inquire whether the certainty of other punishments would not have the same effect. It was not only the bad effect on the culprit, but the bad effect on those who stood round, and on the society in which it was perpetrated; and he, therefore, asked whether it was not the duty of persons in authority seriously to inquire whether they could not do away with this dire and degrading punishment? The noble Lord said he was about to bring in a Bill for a reform of the penal code of the navy, and he (Mr. Roebuck) trusted that in the reformed code there would be found a clause for the abolition of the lash. He was sorry to see the noble Lord shake his head in negation of that hope, but he would tell him that unless there was a diminution of these dreadful punishments, his reform would be no reform at all; because he was sure no man after being flogged was an equal man to what he was before, and he would never believe that a soldier or sailor was the same man in the defence of his country and the honour of his flag after being degraded before his fellows by this dire punishment. They were told that it was absolutely requisite to flog boys at school; and there were people now so obtuse as to believe that their children were improved by being flogged. He was quite sure that the infliction of flogging in our public and other schools was one of the most mischievous things which could be done to any body of children, and that, if it were abolished in schools, it would not continue in the army and navy. To tell him that they could not guide a child without flogging was like saying there were no other means of making a good soldier. The noble Lord said it had been his good fortune to command ships in which there were officers and crews among whom it was unnecessary to inflict this punishment. It was the officer, his conduct, and his manner of guiding the men which determined the conduct of the men, and wherever they found a ship or a regiment where flogging was rife they might be sure the colonel or captain was unworthy of command. A great soldier, who, unfortunately, had lately departed, told him that flogging in an army before the enemy in the field was a thing to leave in the hands of the commanding officer; but he added, "Depend upon it that a good commanding officer will seldom have to inflict that punishment." It was the irascible, ignorant, incapable man who resorted to flogging, and in his impotence to govern inflicted pain on the bodies of those over whose minds he could obtain no influence. He said that its infliction was not only a disgrace to the British army, but clearly pointed out the incompetency of the officers who encouraged it in practice.

MR. BUXTON said, that he heartily concurred in the observations of the hon. Member who had just addressed the House. Indeed, he had placed a notice on the Paper of his intention to move a Substantive Resolution, to the effect: "That the punishment of flogging in the Army and Navy is impolitic, and ought to be abolished." But it would hardly be convenient to have two debates in the same Session on the same subject, and therefore he trusted the division on the Motion of the hon. Member for Lambeth would be taken as an expression of the opinion of the House. Having given the subject great attention and thought, he was persuaded that it would be sound policy on the part of the authorities to altogether abolish the use of the lash. He only regretted that the question had not been mooted by some naval or military officer, which would have weighed more with the country. But there was no doubt that a large number of naval and military officers were anxious for the abolition of flogging; and, on the other hand, they need not be discouraged at meeting with a most determined opposition on the part of the military authorities; for it was impossible not to remember that scarcely one reform in the management of the army had sprung from the military authorities themselves, until it had been thrust upon them from without. To whom, for instance, did we owe a reduction in the number of lashes from 1,000 to 50? To whom did we owe the introduction of regimental libraries and reading-rooms? To whom did we owe the Enfield rifle itself? To whom did we owe the sanitary measures, which, however, had still to be carried out? To whom did we owe the abolition of the stock and the tight dresses of our soldiers? We owed all these reforms, whether already carried out, or about to be carried out, not to the military authorities, but to the press and public opinion of this country. He did not think, then, that civilians need be very much terrified by their own rashness, if they ventured to press still further reforms upon those who seemed to need so much spurring. When the new orders were issued from the Horse Guards and the Admiralty last autumn, he thought the matter was put upon a perfectly satisfactory footing; but prolonged inquiry and investigation had made him feel that the reform adopted by the authorities, though an undoubted improvement, yet would be far, indeed, from abolishing this mode of punishment, or getting rid of the serious evils which it engendered. He saw that by those orders, there were still, as regarded the army, no less than ten offences, five of them being infractions of discipline, the first commission of which would degrade the offender into the second class; and, once there, he would be liable to corporal punishment for that or for any other of those ten offences. In the navy every man, whether in the first class or in the second, would still be liable to be flogged. The main difference made by the new orders would be this—that while the men in the first class could only be flogged after a trial by a court martial, those in the second could be flogged at the will and pleasure of the captain for any one of eight offences. The only wonder to him was, that these restrictions should not have been adopted long ago, without waiting for an outburst of public opinion. It seemed to him almost incredible that our countrymen should hitherto have been liable to this terrible punishment for a first offence, at the caprice of a naval captain; knowing, as they did, how natural it was for the tempers of seafaring men to be quickened by the excitement and vexation incident to their profession. While we maintained a naval and military force of little less than 300,000 men, there would inevitably be a large amount of theft, and frequent cases of intoxication on duty, and so forth; and for any second or subsequent offence, there would still be inflicted corporal punishment. If flogging was to be maintained, then undoubtedly the limits imposed by the new orders were most just and reasonable. But when it was alleged by the advocates of the lash that these just and reasonable restrictions would virtually put an end to flogging, he wished to know how, in that case, they defended the great excess of flogging which there had been in former years. If the moment they adopted a just and reasonable system flogging vanished, was not the inevitable inference that the flogging hitherto had been unjust and unreasonable? There could be no more severe condemnation of the use of the lash hitherto. However, as far as they went, every one must approve these restrictions; but he thought no more restrictions would suffice, and that not only common humanity, but common sense, demanded the total abolition of the cat-o'-nine tails. It was to the common sense rather than to the humanity of the House, that he wished to appeal that night. And now let the House note this—that the distinctions drawn by the new orders, excellent in themselves, would have no effect whatever in getting rid of the obvious and extreme impolicy of this punishment in this respect, that it degraded the army and navy in the eyes of the working class of this country. He could hardly believe that the military authorities were aware how strong the feeling was in the working class, that if a man goes for a soldier or a sailor, he may become liable to a flogging, and how powerfully that feeling operated in repelling the working men from the service of the Queen. They were for ever hearing of the difficulty of obtaining recruits. The right hon. Gentleman, the Secretary of War, told them last year it was no good to vote a larger number of men, because they might vote them, but the Government could not get them. An immense bounty was offered to any man who would enter our army or navy. We kept up the militia at immense and vast expense, mainly on the ground that it helped to feed the regular army with men. We had had a Commission during the last autumn to inquire into the best mode of manning the navy; but the noble Lord who had just spoken, had told them the other night that the result appeared to be that the navy cannot be manned. He had spoken of the difficulty of filling the naval reserve, and stated that the men were afraid of being kidnapped into the service. But there was not a shipowner who could not obtain hands to man his ship for any part of the world. There was not a scavenger, there was not a chimney-sweep in any town of the United Kingdom, who could not obtain all the help he needed. But there was one employment which the working men despised, there was one employer from whose service they shrunk, and that service was the service of the Queen. Now, to serve Her Majesty, to defend their country, to share in the pomp and glory of war, ought to be an honourable and a popular employment. On the contrary, it was regarded with aversion by the better portion of the working class. Any decent working man looked upon it as a calamity if his son went soldiering. No doubt there were other reasons, just because there were other stupidities in the treatment of the soldier; but the main reason was the consciousness that possibly some day he might become liable to have this degrading punishment inflicted upon him. And he must say that this feeling had been justified by the facts of the case, and especially as regards the navy. Why, in the last three years, on an average, no less than 1,160 men have undergone this punishment, and the average number of lashes had been 37,586. And, although the seaman might perhaps be under such a captain as that of the Agamemnon, who contrived to keep order among 807 men without a lash; or of the Royal George, who, out of 879 men, had flogged but one; on the other hand, he might be under the captain of the Lyra, who flogged sixteen men out of seventy-eight; or of the Swallow, who flogged eight men out of only forty-five. We might be sure of this, that the new orders would do absolutely nothing to dispel the feeling he had referred to, so long as flogging was allowed at all. Let the advocates of the lash distinctly prove that it was necessary—that without it order and discipline could not be preserved—and then he admitted that this incidental evil, serious though it be, must be put up with for the sake of the still greater good. But it did seem to him that the impolicy in this respect of the use of the lash was so great that nothing could justify its maintenance except such a clear and proved necessity. The same conclusion which was forced upon them by the impolicy of corporal punishment was forced upon them no less by its inhumanity. The plain truth was, that flogging was a punishment of so barbarous a character that ere long it must be inevitably sent by the feelings of a Christian and humane country to the same limbo to which had been consigned those ancient instruments of torture, and those horrid penalties for treason, which used to be defended upon the very same ground as the lash is now. He thought we ought to know what it was we were talking about. He might disgust, perhaps he would even horrify the feelings of the House, but if there was anything in the world that he despised, it was that squeamish humanity which shrunk from hearing of suffering, while it would not move a finger to remove it. He should, therefore, take the liberty to read a description of this mode of punishment, written by a sufferer himself. He might premise that not only did the cat-o'-nine-tails spread out and actually inflict nine separate blows, unless—to quote the words of one of his informants—unless they became clotted together by the blood—but each tail was two or three times the thickness of ordinary whipcord, and each tail had several hard knots tied upon it. At any rate, so terrible was the effect, that he remembered that a relative of his, writing to him soon after he joined the army an account of a flogging he witnessed, said that numbers of the men in the ranks actually fainted away with horror at the sight they were compelled to witness, and he had since heard that that was no uncommon occurrence. The description he wished to read was from the autobiography of Mr. Somerville, formerly a private in the Scotch Greys, who had been sentenced to receive 200 lashes. After describing how nooses were placed round his wrists and his ankles, he went on to say:—

“The sergeant-major, who stood behind with a book and pencil to count each lash, gave the command, ‘Farrier Simpson you will do your duty.’ The manner of doing that duty is to swing the cat twice round the head, give a stroke, draw the tails of the cat through the fingers of the left hand, to rid them of slush, flesh, or blood; again swing the instrument twice round the head slowly, and so forth. Simpson took the cat, as ordered, at least, I believe so; I did not see him, but I felt an astounding sensation between the shoulders, which went to the toenails in one direction, my finger nails in another, and stung me to the heart as if a knife had gone through my body. The sergeant-major called in a loud voice, ‘One.’ I felt it would be kind of Simpson not to strike me on the same place again. He came on a second time, a few inches lower, and then I thought the former stroke was sweet and agreeable compared with this one. When the third fell I felt my flesh quiver in every nerve, from the scalp of my head to my toenails. The time between each stroke seemed so long as to be agonizing, and yet the next came too soon. It was lower down, and felt to be the severest. At ‘25’ the sergeant-major said ‘Halt!’ Simpson stood back, and a young trumpeter took his cat and began. He gave me some dreadful cuts about the ribs, first on one side and then on the other. Some one bade him hit higher, I do not know whom. He then gave them upon the blistered and swollen places, where Simpson had been practising.”

He went on to describe the increasing torments caused by the descent of the lash as his back became more and more and more mangled; and at length, he said,—

“I felt as if I could yield and beg forgiveness, but the next moment the coward thought was rebuked within me, and banished.”

After a hundred lashes had been inflicted, he was taken down. And mark this, that these atrocious cruelties were inflicted by sentence of court martial, the sole charge against Somerville being, that he had refused to remount a furious horse when ordered to do so by the riding-master, though he had reason to suspect that he was really punished on political grounds. He must, however, remind the House that this flogging was much less terrible than many, because it was inflicted in warm weather. In cold weather it is said to be a still more fearful punishment. He had in his hand an account of the flogging of a poor fellow who afterwards shot himself. That flogging took place on a bitter cold morning, “when,” the writer says,

He could scarcely imagine that any one would deny that such a punishment as the one described was, as he said before, a barbarous punishment. He would refrain from expressing his feeling that it was a disgrace to this country; that it was a disgrace to the officers who ordered it; that it was a disgrace and a degradation to that body of men upon any one of whom it might some day be inflicted. He could not hope that those who heard him would go with him so far as that, but of this he was confident, that every hon. Gentleman present, even if he did not look upon it with horror, yet at least would regard it with regret. He was not so absurd as to imagine that they, the enemies of the lash, had a monopoly of humanity. He was quite sure that every one would feel as much as he did, that to strip a man half naked, tie him up by his hands and legs, and then lash him with a whip till the skin was torn off his shoulders, and the blood streamed down, was a punishment at once so degrading and so terrible, that it could only be justified by a real and strong necessity. Assuredly they should all rejoice in resolving that the lash should never again descend upon a British soldier, provided only that its abolition would not be followed by that relaxation of discipline which would, he owned, be fatal to the well-being of the army and navy. But if so, it was obvious that the onus probandi lies not on the opponents of the lash, but on its advocates. They might fairly claim from them clear, full, and conclusive proof that the lash was essential; that its use was a real necessity; that without it order and discipline could not be maintained. The a priori assumption in the mind of any right-thinking man must be against the use of such torture: prove its necessity, and they would hold their peace; show that without it those services must fall into disorder or demoralisation, and they would say no more; but if they failed to do so, if they could not—and he thought it would be seen that they could not prove anything of the kind—then, he said, no more was needed; the case for the lash fell to the ground. The fact that flogging was not necessary—that we could do as well without as with it—that its abolition needed not be followed by any relaxation of discipline or order, was demonstrated, not by mere theoretical reasoning, but by actual experience of the most striking kind. He supposed that no one would doubt that of all the Continental armies the French army was the one most distinguished for its discipline, as well as for its valour; in fact that, except our own, it was the most powerful military instrument in the world. But in the French army, in war, as well as in peace, the lash was unknown. Again, it was acknowledged by military authorities, that no army displays more perfect order and good conduct in campaigning, as well as in quarters, than the army of Prussia. He knew that on one occasion the Duke of Wellington was asked which Continental army he would rather command, and his reply was, the Prussian, and expressly because it was so peculiarly manageable. But in the Prussian army the lash was unknown. Again, he found in accounts of the Peninsular war it was incidentally mentioned that the German Legion showed remarkably good order and discipline; on the other hand, he found that it went through the Peninsular war without the use of the lash. To his mind the force of these examples was overwhelming. They offered a demonstration from which no escape was possible; that the highest order and the highest discipline could be kept up without the use of the cat-o'-nine-tails; in other words, tried by the test by which it must stand or fall—the lash stood condemned. What rendered this conclusion still more emphatic was, that in the armies of Austria and of Russia the use of the lash was incessant and terrible; and he doubted whether the result, as seen in the last few years, could be deemed altogether satisfactory. Turn from the Continent to England itself, and they were taught the very same lesson. Thirty years ago, flogging went on in the British army to an extent which he could not have formed an idea of if he had not investigated the subject—to an extent which, in his opinion, was scandalous and wicked. At length the country interfered, and imposed a limit on the use of the lash. The military authorities then, as probably now, declared that it would be impossible to maintain discipline. Public opinion compelled them to impose that limit, and what was the result? So far from the army having deteriorated in character, he found it the universal opinion that it never stood higher in character than it did at the present moment. The same with regard to our navy. There had been an immense reduction, and again, he asked, what was the result? Why, in those old times—those good old times—as the advocates of the lash must think them, we had two general mutinies of whole fleets besides a number of terrible mutinies on board single ships; whereas in our own time mutiny was unknown. To be sure, he might be reminded of the case of the Princess Royal. But it certainly was a most remarkable coincidence (if a mere coincidence it be) that only last Session the attention of the House was called to the atrocious amount of flogging that had taken place on board the Princess Royal under Captain Giffard. It was certainly remarkable that the same ship which had been made notorious by a mutiny, had a short time before been made notorious for the 2,100 odd lashes which had been inflicted on the crew in a single year. Now it was impossible to imagine how these facts could be got over, except, indeed, by the discreditable allegation that our army and navy contained a larger proportion of scoundrels than those of other lands. For his part, he thought that the system was radically wrong if they retained in the Queen's service a single known scoundrel. He held that those services would never stand on a sound footing till it was thought a privilege by any working man to get into them, and a sufficient penalty for any infraction of discipline to be driven from them; but waiving that, he should like to ask those who assert, as he had often heard naval and military men assert, in talking this question over with them, that there were a number of blackguards in every ship and every regiment who could only be kept under by the lash. He should like to ask them this question:—"How came it that last year there were sixty-seven regiments?—how came it that last year there were forty-three ships, containing nearly 6,000 men, whose commanding officers practically repudiated the use of the lash?" Could they want a stronger demonstration of the fact that the lash was not necessary, when they found it flung aside as useless in so great a proportion of regiments and of ships of war? He challenged those who would be against him that night to invalidate these facts; but, if not, to admit his conclusion—the conclusion that the lash could not be supported on the plea of its necessity. But now was it surprising to find that abstinence from a degrading and brutal punishment had not been followed by more crime, but by less crime, not by worse order and worse discipline, but by better order and by higher discipline? Why, every one who had looked into the subject of the treatment of criminals must be aware that the very same lesson which experience teaches so decisively with regard to the cat had been taught again, again, and again, with regard to all punishments of that violent and degrading kind. It had been the great blunder which shortsighted rulers in every age had made, and which had been attended with invariable failure, to suppose that it was by fierce and appalling punishments that crime is best prevented. He should have supposed that of all the dead dogmas in the world, no dogma had been so effectually disposed of. He knew not what truth in social science had been established by a larger induction of facts than the truth that it was not by cruel punishments, but that it was by those punishments which carry with them the public feeling, that men are best kept in subjection. In short, that it was the first essential of wise government that it should be gentle as well as just—not treating even criminals as brutes, but as men—not crushing and trampling under foot those who break its laws, but even in its penalties acknowledging the reverence that is due to every human being. At first sight of course it was natural to imagine men would shrink most from an offence which would involve some fearful penalty, and that was so when the penalty did not go beyond public opinion; but the moment the penalty begins to shock the feelings of humanity it ceased to be as effectual as a milder punishment in the suppression of crime, and for this plain reason, that then public opinion passed over from the law and from those who administer the law to the side of the criminal; he is looked upon as harshly used, and even those who might be interested in detecting and exposing his crime, and all others as well, take a kind of merit to themselves in concealing the crime and sheltering the crime; not only so, but the hearts of the authorities are apt to be touched. In the case of flogging, it was a common occurrence, when the man was tied up to receive his punishment, for the commanding officer to relent and let him off; with that he was far from quarrelling; but the effect of all this was to prevent that certainty of punishment which, as every one knew, was the true preventive of crime. He might seem to speak too theoretically, but the House must remember that upon this theoretical principle was based that great revolution in our criminal law which Romilly and Mackintosh advocated, and which Sir Robert Peel carried into effect. That vast reform in our criminal law which swept 231 offences from the category of capital crimes was advocated and carried out expressly upon that principle, that crime is best prevented by punishments that are in unison with the humane feelings of society. All he wanted was, that the principle which permeates our civil criminal code should no longer be repudiated from our military code, just as if human nature were changed by wearing a uniform. In another respect he had found in his researches into this subject very strong reasons for believing that not only is flogging less effectual in the maintenance of order than a less savage punishment would have been, but, it was actually itself chargeable with producing no small amount of crime, and on this ground, that in nine cases out of ten, the man who had been flogged feels himself so utterly disgraced and degraded by it in his own eyes and in those of his comrades, that thenceforward he makes no effort to gain a good character. His self-esteem was destroyed, and no one was so likely to rush into the commission of acts of drunken violence and other infractions of discipline, as the man who had undergone this punishment. He would only add one word as to the last refuge of the advocates of the lash—the doctrine that it should be maintained, even if not necessary, because it was so convenient a punishment. No doubt a flogging was soon over. But after all the man was disabled, often for many days—sometimes even for weeks, as in the case of a man flogged last autumn at Woolwich. Moreover, it involved a punishment parade, at which the regiment, or the ship's company have to be present, to their great loss of time and inconvenience, so that it had not much of that poor merit of convenience. But more than this, he would never allow that a punishment was really and truly convenient, which offends public opinion; which repels men from the Queen's service; which ruins the man on whom it is inflicted; which is not more effectual than a milder punishment would be; and which, finally, in its cruel and brutal character, was contrary to the spirit of our mild and merciful religion.

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT: It seems to me that in this discussion we are not proceeding according to any very logical or philosophical method; and I am not sure that we have not been confounding one kind of punishment with all punishment whatever. We have, living in the midst of us, a caste—men cut off to a great extent from the communications and from the sympathies which exist in civil life; and if this be the case to some extent in all armies, it is certainly so in a much greater degree in England, where the armed class passes the greater part of its existence abroad, and the ties which connect its members with the ordinary avocations of civil life are broken at a very early period. In this country, moreover, we have a great jealousy of the military power. In other nations the military element overrides the civil in a striking manner. It does so in Austria, perhaps more than anywhere in the world; it does so in Prussia, and in France likewise in no slight degree. But in those countries how do they obtain their army? It is, after all, an average specimen of the ordinary civil classes from which it is drawn. By means of the conscription they drew into the ranks the respectable and steady, the wild and lawless, just as they come, and in the same proportions which exist in civil life. We do nothing of the kind. We have no conscription. The steady and the industriously-disposed know nothing of the army, they do not enter it. Those we get are the young, the heedless, the thoughtless, the wild. (MR. W. WILLIAMS: Hear, hear!) Yes, Sir, and you surely would not remedy that defect by having recourse to compulsory service? Well, having got this population together, you have to adapt them to military organization, and for that purpose you must exercise over them a strong authority. Now, there justly exists in this country, and I trust there always will exist, the greatest jealousy of the military power. If there be any case of military outrage—if it be even a common assault committed by a man in a red coat—you have much more animadversion, jealousy, and alarm than if it were committed by a civilian. It is necessary, therefore, by some means to compensate for this, and to exercise over a body of men more difficult than any other to control a stronger power than exists over civilians. Now observe I am not an advocate for corporal punishment as it has been carried on. But the stories we have heard on this subject are not of yesterday, but are derived from a period when punishment was inflicted with such brutal ferocity that the public mind was justly disgusted, and the public feeling has outlived these punishments. The hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Roebuck) has treated this question in a philosophic spirit, and has argued the whole question of corporal punishment. I do not, however, agree with him in what he has said with regard to the punishment of boys. It was the Spartan system of discipline, and as in this country, when mature we take strong exercise, are used to strong labour, drink strong wine, so in youth we want strong repressive discipline. Our English nature is a strong nature and a turbulent nature, and in all ages and among all classes has required a stronger code than nations of a quieter and more pliable disposition. It has been stated that Sir William Napier was against flogging, but he thought it necessary in war. I cannot allude to Sir William Napier without taking this opportunity of expressing my regret for the loss of the last of that band of heroes of all of whom, save perhaps one, he was the most distinguished by pen and sword, and who so illustrated the great name he bore. Sir W. Napier had a bias against authority from the generosity of his nature, and a bias against what he considered the prejudices of his day; and yet he recognized the necessity of this punishment in war, because war, after all, is a moment when men are devils let loose, and when they require the strongest effort of authority to repress and keep them within the limits of order and obedience. But how do you treat civilians in this respect? The hon. Gentleman (Mr. Buxton) says you have here a punishment which you do not inflict upon civilians. Is that so? I applied to the Home Office for information on the state and practice of the law on this subject. I do not say that it is wrong to flog civilians and right to flog soldiers; only when we are told that we have a different punishment for civilians and soldiers I think it right to tell you how you treat civilians. I have here a list of Acts of Parliament inflicting the punishment of flogging for certain offences. There is the 7 & 8 Geo. IV., c. 28, s. 8. Perhaps you will say that is rather ancient. There are the 7 & 8 Geo. IV., c. 29, and the 9th Geo. IV., c. 31. There is also the 5 & 6 Vict., c. 51, for the punishment of outrages against the Queen. There is, I think another Act, which was passed after the destruction of a vase in the British Museum, and which imposes the punishment of flogging for the wilful destruction of works of art. I think, too, I remember a very strong pressure being put upon my noble Friend (Viscount Palmerston), when he was Home Secretary, to introduce flogging for brutal assaults on wives. After all, then, this is not a punishment unknown to civilians, or peculiar to military life. The results may be stated generally that, as the law now stands, for a great majority of felonies not capital, male prisoners, convicted by a jury, whatever may be their age, are liable to be publicly as well as privately whipped not more than three times for the offence committed. It may be said that these laws are obsolete, and are not put in practice. But I asked what was the number of floggings inflicted upon civilians in the course of the year. I find in England and Wales that the number of males sentenced to be whipped by Courts of Assize or Quarter Sessions in the year 1858, was 83. The hon. Gentleman may say that these were mostly boys. That is quite true, but it is also true that these offenders of twenty years and above, were 22 in number. I have also a return of the number of males sentenced to be whipped on summary convictions by justices in the year 1858. The number was not less than 502, of which 472 were under the Juvenile Offenders Act. The rest were not so, and the offences were under Wilful Damage Acts, Vagrant Acts, Railway Acts, and for other offences. I do not say this is right, but it is the fact; and you have, therefore, no right to argue that a severe, exceptional, and intolerable punishment is inflicted upon soldiers which is not inflicted on civilians. I say that with an army composed in the peculiar manner I have described, it is necessary to have more summary, severe, and deterring punishments than among other classes. I have described the class of men with which you are compelled to recruit your army under a system of voluntary enlistment. You trust them necessarily with deadly weapons. But what is the effect of the system of military discipline on those subject to it? They are more disciplined, and, therefore, more dangerous when they act together than civilians. I have received a letter which I will read to the House, omitting the date and place for reasons which will be obvious as I read. The writer, who is a magistrate at the head of the police in an important town, says:—

"I beg leave to suggest to you that in Parliamentary debates and other public discussions, a very important topic in reference to the army has never been properly noticed. It has only been considered as a military institution costing a great sum, and performing great services; but there is no doubt that the army has done much for society as a reformatory institution, and I am convinced that an inquiry in the police departments of the empire would produce results equally extraordinary and satisfactory. I believe that — is one of the principal recruiting districts, and although we constantly see loose, idle, drunken, and dishonest characters coming before us for military attestation we scarcely ever find them, after a period of service, relapsing into their former habits. The county and city of — regiments of militia, at their first embodiment, almost emptied — of the description of persons to which I allude."

If the colonels of these regiments were present, it might be painful to them if I mentioned the name for them to know the materials of which they have had to make soldiers. The writer goes on to say:—

"On their return after the peace I saw scarcely one of them who had not been greatly reformed, and there are many of them now pursuing an industrious and creditable course. I hope, sir, that you will not consider this note an intrusion, and that you will allow me to assure you that I address you from a motive of public utility."

That is a reflection which has often occurred to me. First, as to the materials of which our army is composed; and secondly, the results that the discipline, of which corporal punishment is a portion, but a very small portion, produces. I have not taken an active part in the establishment of reformatories. For children and boys a little older they may, no doubt, do good. With regard to adult criminals, although I am not disposed to go so far as the gentleman who said he would walk sixteen miles to see a reformed convict, I do not believe in the reformation of adults unless they can be withdrawn from the scene of their temptations. I have seen in our own walks of life persons of bad character and disposition, and I have never seen any one of them reform that I can recollect. That this system of discipline has succeeded in improving the materials of which your army is composed cannot be denied. Last year the hon. Gentleman (Mr. W. Williams) alluded to the increased amount of corporal punishment disclosed by these Returns. I do not deny that the increase has been greater than it ought to have been. The hon. Gentleman to my mind, however, has not put the case quite fairly. He says there were so many floggings in 1847, and so many in 1858. It should be recollected that the army is very nearly double what it was at the former period, but still the percentage has also greatly increased, and in a very alarming manner. I have inquired into the cause of this increase. If you trace a period when you make great efforts to increase the army, you will find that many of the recruits are such as are described by this magistrate—idle, drunken, and dissolute—and you will have at such periods a great deal of crime and insubordination, and, consequently, a great deal of punishment. It is at the same time satisfactory in one respect to find that the great crime for which this punishment is inflicted is that of desertion. One effect of the increased bounty given last year was to lead to a good deal of desertion for re-enlistment in other regiments. In consequence of this, corporal punishment had been applied, and it had proved a check. Now let me say a word on a case that has been alluded to in this debate—the case of Somerville. He was a man of great ability and talent; he wrote remarkably well, and in after life raised himself to a good social position. He was not however degraded by having undergone that punishment, for, as I have said, in after life he raised himself to a good social position, and lived, I am told, to think that within limits corporal punishment is necessary in the army. Let me say a word of the recent case at Woolwich. I think it was a bad one, but in the description of that case there was very considerable exaggeration. Writers for the press must paint vividly, in order to produce an effect at a distance; it is the prevailing fault of our modern literature. The case, however, excited some discussion and comment, the Commander-in-Chief was not in England at the time; he arrived two days afterwards. I immediately called his attention to it. The Duke of Cambridge at once ordered an inquiry into the case, and the result was that the officers conducting the punishment were severely reprimanded in public. Another result of the inquiry was the issuing of the general order that has been before referred to. I think we shall find that the amelioration of military law, with regard to the punishment of military offences, has always followed at a certain interval the amelioration of the law with respect to the punishment of crimes committed by civilians, and I think it ought so to follow that improvement; for in the army an extraordinary degree of discipline must necessarily be maintained. Now, the general order of November last, specifies the military offences for which the soldier was previously liable to corporal punishment; they were, "absence from parade, drunkenness, riotous conduct, absence without leave from tattoo, preferring frivolous complaints, disrespect to non-commissioned officers, striking a comrade, absence without leave, as defined by the 51st Article of War, escaping from confinement, insubordination, making away with necessaries, falsely imputing improper conduct to a superior, and sleeping on post, depending on the circumstances and nature of the service." By the late general order a man cannot now be flogged for any of these crimes. The respectable, well-conducted, and steady soldier—and there are thousands such in the army—may now feel, as he ought to feel, a complete immunity from corporal punishment, except for aggravated mutiny, which, by any and every means, must be repressed. But well-conducted men ought to feel confident of an immunity from a degrading punishment, and by this order they have that security. A soldier cannot be flogged, unless by previous misconduct and the commission of grave offences he has placed himself in a second class, and so made himself liable to it. But even when reduced to this second class, he cannot be flogged for these specified offences, merely because he is in this class. The offences for which a man, reduced to the second class, is liable to corporal punishment are: desertion, mutinous conduct, aggravated cases of insubordination and violence, drunkenness on duty or on the line of march, embezzling public money, stealing from a comrade, designedly maiming, repeated acts of making away with necessaries, arms, &c., and other disgraceful acts, showing vicious propensities. After being reduced to the second class, a man, on repeating these last offences, is liable to be flogged. Yet even when thus reduced "uninterrupted good conduct for a year will again restore the soldier from the second to the first class, as proving a desire for reformation and amendment." The general order further says:—

"Though thus classified, it does not follow that all men under the second class are to be condemned to corporal punishment. Each case is to be decided upon its own merits, and corporal punishment as much avoided as possible; but a man who by misconduct has placed himself in the second class is liable thereafter to corporal punishment, whereas the man in the first class is not liable to such punishment, except in the case of aggravated mutinous conduct, when severity must at once be resorted to to repress more serious mischief resulting from such conduct. His Royal Highness trusts that the above classification will greatly simplify to the officers of the army the method of dealing with crime: will deter the evil-disposed from committing offences, justly subjecting them to severe punishment, which, though necessary to maintain discipline, should be restricted as much as possible; and will give confidence to the good soldier by securing to him, on entering Her Majesty's service, an immunity from degrading punishment, which immunity it will be in his power to preserve to the day when his engagement shall expire."

Now, that is a just and humane order, an order that does credit to the Commander-in-Chief. The hon. Member (Mr. Buxton) says, in these matters we must not trust to military men, because everything that has been done for the mitigation of military punishments has originated with civilians, not with officers of the army. There is a certain degree of truth in that; yet it happens that in this case it was the Duke of Wellington who reduced the infliction of corporal punishment to fifty lashes. And, in justice to a deceased friend of mine—the late Lord Hardinge—I must contradict, as I have often contradicted in this House, the assertion that every improvement in the army has proceeded from civilians, and not from military men. So far from public opinion having forced the Minie rifle upon Lord Hardinge, it is a fact that Lord Hardinge's own efforts led to its introduction into the army. He was far ahead of the public in this respect. As

And you may read a description of solitary imprisonment infinitely more terrible than the descriptions of the infliction of corporal punishment. What would be severe to one man would not be so severe to another; the degree of severity must depend very much on the peculiar nature or constitution of the individual on whom punishment is inflicted. That applies even more to the mind than the body. I know that the Commander-in-Chief is as much alive as any man to the necessity of resorting to other modes of punishment than flogging; he is most sincere and earnest in his intention; and I hope the House and the country will be willing to leave the question in hands so well able to deal with it without shaking the discipline of the army.

MR. EDWIN JAMES said, he thought the cause of humanity was indebted to the hon. Member for Lambeth for bringing forward this question, and the House must feel indebted to the right hon. Gentleman for his speech. In it he had alluded to the punishments inflicted for civilian crime, but he thought the right hon. Gentleman could hardly point to a single instance in the last ten years of any Judge ordering an adult to be flogged, though the punishment was occasionally inflicted on boys who had been previously convicted. He had also alluded to its infliction for any attack on the person of the Sovereign, or the destruction of public property; but it was for the purpose of making these offences infamous by a degrading penalty. On the other hand, it was still retained in the army for many offences which in civil life would not be considered very serious. With regard to desertion he believed that flogging was the great cause of that offence. In the case in which a man died at Hounslow after the punishment an action for libel was brought by the colonel of the regiment, and it was proved on the trial that six men fainted on the ground during the infliction; and of those six men four afterwards deserted. The only effect of the present system was to prevent men from enlisting, and to cause others frequently to desert from the service. If his hon. Friend went to a division he would support him, but he thought it unjust that men of honour and probity should be invidiously held up to public reprobation for discharging what was only their duty, and therefore he hoped that his hon. Friend would not insist on that part of his Motion which would have this injurious effect.

SIR CHARLES NAPIER said, that as a naval officer he could not omit expressing his opinion on the subject before the House. He was the first naval officer in that House who pointed out the horrible barbarity of our articles of war, and insisted on a change, especially as regarded the navy. He had always held that it was illegal to inflict punishment by flogging on a man, except after trial by a court-martial, and he was the first who succeeded in putting an end to flogging round the fleet. But the question was, whether it was possible altogether to abolish corporal punishment? He did not see how it was possible to preserve discipline in a ship where there were hundreds of men without having the power to inflict flogging. How, for example, could they punish men who, when the ship was caught in a squall, were found below, when they should have been on watch on deck? And how without flogging would they put down mutiny? He hated corporal punishment. He believed it was worse for the man who inflicted it than for the man who bore the punishment. Still he believed it to be occasionally necessary, but he would have it inflicted only after trial by court-martial; and he would have it provided that the captain should never be present at the punishment, as he, having the power to remit the sentence, was regarded by the men as a brute when he looked on and did not do so. He hoped the Admiralty would before this Session was over prepare a new system of naval discipline, and that they would provide some description of punishment which would have the effect of checking the practice of breaking leave, so common among the men. At present no captain could depend upon his men coming back at the time specified when leave was given to them, and this was so subversive of discipline that it ought to be vigorously checked.

CAPTAIN LEICESTER VERNON said, he was very loth to continue the debate, but he hoped the House would excuse a few practical observations from a practical man on this subject. Those who belonged to the service were very glad when gentlemen not connected with it let in a little daylight upon subjects of this kind; but he wished to impress upon the House that those who belonged to the service were not naturally cruel men—that they were quite as humane as others—and that they would be exceedingly happy if some other description of punishment than flogging could be found to keep in order the description of men who to a great extent composed the army and navy. He need hardly inform the House that those who went to sea or who followed the drum were not the best part of the community, but were men who hung loosely on society, and those men into whose hands arms were put had to be controlled by necessary discipline. The fear and dread of punishment made soldiers good, just as it did civilians. The soldier was a very different man, when once he became a soldier, from any other person. He (Captain L. Vernon) had seen a man shot in the West Indies for doing that for which any hon. Member of that House who was a magistrate would have fined a civilian only 10s. in this country. But why was the man in question so dealt with? Because, the regiment to which he belonged being in a state approaching to mutiny, he struck the adjutant in the presence of his colonel. After the execution had taken place, General Sir Lionel Smith, the officer in command, assembled the regiment and addressed them. The General was an old man, and he (Captain L. Vernon) remembered what he said on the occasion as if it were but yesterday. Addressing the troops, he said,—"It is a hard thing for an old man like myself to send such a young man as that so soon out of the world; but, although I am an old man, I am not an old woman, and so long as Her Majesty intrusts me with the command of one of her regiments, I will insist on the maintenance of discipline." What happened in another regiment? "A regiment, composed of the sweepings of our gaols, was hurried away to Sierra Leone. It had not been long there until it fell to pieces; for the men mutinied and killed half their officers. All that was the effect of want of discipline. The punishments in other services were much more severe than in ours. He did not want a recourse to severe punishments, but he wished to see discipline maintained, for without that our army would not be worth sixpence.

MR. WYLD said, there were numbers of young men belonging to respectable families in all parts of the country, too poor to enter any of the professions, who would gladly avail themselves of employment in the army and navy but for the circumstance that a degrading system of punishment obtained in both services. It was a strange anomaly that, while the men in the army and navy were now being supplied with libraries and other facilities for education, the degrading punishment of the lash was still resorted to. He felt confident, if that punishment were abolished, that neither of the services would lack recruits from the best portions of the middle and working classes.

MR. FREELAND said, he would join earnestly in the appeal which had been made to the hon. Member for Lambeth to omit from the latter portion of his Motion, relating to the navy, the names of the commanding officers. The settlement of the question of flogging must depend on the power and progress of public opinion; but that public opinion would be weakened and retarded if an attempt were made to concentrate it on individuals instead of directing it against the system itself. If the hon. Member, however, should refuse to comply, he should, though reluctantly, vote against the Motion.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, the hon. and gallant Member for Oxfordshire (Colonel North) had been entirely misinformed in the statement he had made relative to him (Mr. Williams). As to the request of the noble Lord (Lord C. Paget) that he should leave out the names of the commanding officers, he (Mr. Williams) held that the Return would be of no value without them.

Address for Return relative to flogging in the Army and Militia agreed to.

"That there be laid before this House, a Return of the number of Persons flogged in the Navy in the year 1859, specifying the name of the ships, and of the commanding officers, the offence, the sentence, and the number of lashes inflicted on each person, stating whether by order of Court Martial or the Commanding Officer (in continuation of Parliamentary Paper, No. 41, of Session 1, 1859)."

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, he would now move, by way of Amendment, that the names of the commanding officers be omitted.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the words "and of the commanding officers."

Question put, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

The House divided:—Ayes 46, Noes 124; Majority 78.

CIVIL SERVICE APPOINTMENTS.

COMMITTEE MOVED FOR.

MR. HENNESSY said, that in rising to move the appointment of a Select Committee to inquire into the present state of appointments to the Civil Service, with a view to ascertain if greater facilities could not be afforded to properly qualified persons, he felt the Motion was a very important one, but at that late hour he would not do more than call the attention of the House and the Government to its main issues. The present state of the Civil Service examinations was felt to be unsatisfactory, and in some respects they were now in a worse position than they were before the examinations were instituted. Before that system was introduced there were general complaints against the mode in which their patronage was exercised by the Government in respect to appointments in the Civil Service, and the annoyance which every Member of the House suffered from the system. The House of Commons had on two separate occasions laid down the principle that in all cases admissions to that service should be decided by the result of a competitive examination. That principle he believed was one but very partially carried out, for in almost every case of admission there was only one candidate examined. It was with a view of remedying that state of things, and of affording young men who possessed good abilities, but who could command no patronage, a legitimate means of gratifying their ambition, that he made the present Motion; and he trusted to get together a body of gentlemen who would carry out the principle of throwing open the Civil Service to free and unlimited competition, as he believed that nothing would give so great a stimulus to education throughout the country as the recognition of such a principle.

"That a Select Committee be appointed, to inquire into the present mode of nominating and examining Candidates for junior appointments in the Civil Service, with a view to ascertaining whether greater facility may not be afforded for the admission of properly qualified persons."

MR. STEUART said, he wished to second the Motion, because he had been twice prevented, by unavoidable circumstances, from asking a question of the Government on this very subject. He believed the answer he would have elicited would have rendered this Motion unnecessary; but he thought this was a proper step, though he was not without hope that the answer of the Government to this Motion would render even this step unnecessary.

MR. O'BRIEN said, the question was one that well deserved the attention of the House. The manner in which the Civil Service examinations were conducted was, in his opinion, generally complained of by the country, and he should therefore support the Motion. He had no doubt that the Committee, if appointed, would arrive at a principle by which the right men would be appointed to situations.

MR. LAING said, that in resisting the Motion he hoped it would be understood that the Government did so upon the ground that they did not think the time had yet arrived when an inquiry of this kind could be entered upon with any hope of a satisfactory result. The hon. Gentleman had very fairly stated the object of his Motion, which was in effect to throw the appointments in the Civil Service open to unlimited competition, but he (Mr. Laing) thought it would be premature to appoint a Committee before sufficient experience of the working of the system of competition had been obtained. It would be opening a most difficult question, and one that could only be usefully dealt with by proceeding experimentally, and by cautiously feeling their way. The only practical instance which they yet had of the complete working of competitive examination in the Civil Service was in China, and that was hardly a test by which the merits of the system could be fully judged. He admitted there were many arguments in favour of a perfect competitive system; and, were the abolition of patronage on the part of the Government, which was a real annoyance to many of its members, the only question to be considered, there would be no difficulty. The day had long gone by when the existence of a Government could depend on the distribution of its patronage. But there were more important considerations involved. One of the characteristics of Englishmen which distinguished them from foreigners was that they were more enterprising and self-relying, and less inclined to seek public appointments than the same class of persons abroad; and it was a question what would be the effect upon the national character caused by the élite of our youth being led to look forward at an early period of life for admission into snug situations in the Customs or Excise with fixed salaries, rather than trusting to their own energies for success in the world. That was one of the important considerations which made it necessary to proceed cautiously, and to be guided by the results of experience. That experience they had not yet had, and the whole question was unsettled. The system of competitive examinations was only at the commencement; the Civil Service Commission had only just extended its operations, and it was the opinion of the Commissioners — Sir J. Lefevre and Sir E. Ryan, to whom the country was much indebted for their valuable services — that the time had not yet arrived to judge of the results of the system. He, therefore, hoped the hon. Gentleman would be satisfied with the statement he had made, and would not press his Motion upon the present occasion.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, that he agreed with the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury that it would be better to postpone the Motion for the present. He thought, however, that the result of an inquiry by a Committee would result in a more complete examination of the whole subject, and a more complete digest of all questions relating to appointments in the Civil Service, and a modified form of unlimited competition. There were three points connected with the improvement of the Civil Service. One was the adoption of a good mode of selecting candidates, another was the distribution of employment among candidates according to capacity, and thirdly a proper system of promotion in the various offices. The experience at present gained did not lead him to think that all those requisites had been combined, and to throw open the whole service without establishing a distinct character for each class would lead to the result that men who were fit for one class would offer themselves for another. If the established departments were thrown open to supplementary clerks, they would find that young men would enter as supplementary clerks, who, from their education and position in society, would look forward to rising to the highest posts in the service. That had been the case at present. Young men had obtained appointments as supplementary clerks who really looked forward for other employment. The whole subject required consideration, but he would advise his hon. Friend, after the statement of the Secretary to the Treasury, not to press his Motion at present.

MR. MAGUIRE said, he hoped the hon. Member for King's County (Mr. Hennessey) would not be induced by the bland, seductive suggestion of the Secretary to the Treasury to withdraw his Motion. There was a marvellous similarity between the answer given by the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Laing) to-night and that given by the present Home Secretary in April, 1856, when a similar Motion was made, but, although four years had since elapsed, nothing had been done. The Motion did not seek to bring about a precipitate change, but simply proposed to inquire into the mode of working of the present system, which, in his opinion, was highly unsatisfactory, and whether it was the proper time to take away the scraps of patronage which the Treasury now possessed. The competitive system had been tried in the Indian service, and no injury had resulted from it. He would say, let the test of the candidates be what it might, they should throw open competition to the world. He had been urged by a person named Donovan, whom he knew well as a respectable man with a large family, to procure for one of his sons a nomination to compete for a vacancy in a public office, but he had found it as difficult to get this young man's name placed on the list of competitors as it formerly would have been to procure the appointment itself. He had been eight years a Member of that House, and never asked a favour; he was therefore independent of both sides. On the occasion to which he referred he had been put off in a shuffling manner; but he clearly saw that if he had made the application a matter of personal obligation, implying that he himself would be found pliable as opportunity offered, no difficulty would have occurred. That, however, would not suit him, and he was obliged to recommend the applicant to a more regular supporter of the Government. Such a system, he maintained, was alike degrading to the Government and to independent Members of that House, as well as most prejudicial to the public service. The fact was that the Secretary of the Treasury watched this patronage in peculiar times and emergencies, and if his hon. Friend did not divide the House on this Question, he would not do justice to his convictions.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: I think the question evidently raised by this Motion and the speech now made is not a question to be submitted to a Committee, but a question of principle, which, in the first instance, ought to be left to the discretion of the Government; and if that discretion be not exercised in accordance with the opinion of this House, it will then be for the House to express its own opinion. The object of the Motion, as I understand it, is not to inquire whether the system of examination for the Civil Service is properly conducted—not to examine whether the Commissioners charged with the execution of this duty perform it in a manner satisfactory to the public; but the question which it raises is, whether we should adopt as a general principle that anybody who pleases is to come and write his name down in an office, saying he claims to be examined for the next vacancy in it, or whether that system in principle is to continue under which the heads of the different offices are responsible for selecting proper persons subject to examination for the vacancies that may arise. I differ entirely, as at present informed, and as far as my judgment goes, from the hon. Gentleman who spoke last; and my opinion is, that the present system is most consistent with the public interest—namely, that those who are at the heads of the different departments should make a selection of the young men who are to be examined—by competition, I admit—for the vacancies that may from time to time arise. I shall be told that is because the Government desire to retain the patronage which office gives them. I concur with my hon. Friend the Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Laing) in the opinion that so far as patronage has to be considered with the view of maintaining a Government, it is next to valueless. Governments must stand on the general opinion which this House may entertain of their merits, and any Government that fancies it can rest in security on gaining one hon. Member or another by petty appointments to clerkships in different departments of the public service will be destined, within a very short period, to fall to the ground. It is not on that ground at all that I object to this Motion, but it is, in the first place, because I do not think that in a country like this it is desirable that all the young men intending to provide for themselves in future life should turn themselves entirely to getting employment from the Government. I think such a system would have a tendency to lower the feelings of the rising generation. That is the case, I know, in some countries abroad, where every man considers that his only chance in life is to obtain employment under the Government. I think such a system tends to break down the independent spirit which ought to prevail among the youth of the country. And the inconvenience would be obvious, because, while every young man would write his name down, or get his friends to write his name down, with a view to examination for any vacancy that might occur, a very small portion only would succeed; those who did not succeed would be disappointed; and, not having turned their thoughts to a more independent mode of action, would be thrown out of employment in which they might have gained creditable and honourable support and distinction. Then, again, the inconvenience suggested by the hon. Gentleman opposite (Sir S. Northcote) would arise. The administration of this country is divided into a great number of departments. The young men who think their habits and attainments calculated to fit them for a particular department would be writing their names down for a department which, after all, would not be the one for which they were best qualified, and you would get good men as candidates for an inferior department, and inferior men as candidates for a superior department. My opinion is, therefore, different from that of the hon. Member opposite. I do not think it would be for the advantage of the country generally that the present system should be changed. In the inferior departments, at all events, the discretion should not be taken from the heads of departments of selecting those whom they think fit to appoint for competition. I do not mean to say that there may not be some of the higher departments in which, perhaps, the other principle might be employed, but the case of the Indian service is totally different from the Civil Service at home, which is more divided into different departments, while in the Indian service they all work in one stream; and are afterwards distributed to higher departments, according to the wants of the service. I quite concur in the principle that the system of examination—I should say competitive examination, is very much calculated for the public service, and has been productive of very great advantage. It may be true, as I have often heard it alleged, that, in consequence of the tendency which always must prevail in a system of examination to put the standard higher and higher, a certain number of young men have been rejected who would have been very good clerks; but the public gain this advantage, that no young man is appointed who is not perfectly fit for the situation he obtains. I quite agree that the standard examination is not so advantageous as the competitive examination, because the tendency of the standard examination generally is to sink down to a minimum, whereas the tendency of the competitive examination is to raise itself up to the maximum. It has been objected, I know, that some of the questions put by the Commissioners to young men who are candidates for situations at the bottom of an office, involve attainments quite unnecessary for the duties they would have to perform. That is true, but the answer given by the Commissioners is also satisfactory. They say we have three or four young men to be examined for public employment. If the examination merely went to this point—what was necessary to qualify the young men for the duties they would have immediately to perform—there would be a great difficulty in determining the comparative ability and merit of the different candidates; but it would be necessary to add to those questions, that would satisfy the mind that they were fit for the duties immediately required, others of a higher class, in order to see which of the young men has the greatest range of information, and which was most likely to be fit for the higher duties to which he might soon be expected to rise. Consequently, much of the criticism one hears in private quarters, and sees sometimes in the public papers, on those questions being put falls to the ground when you consider that the object is to sift from a certain number of young men, those most competent by natural ability and acquired information, not to fit them only for the lower duties they will be called on immediately to discharge, but also for the higher duties which they may soon be called to fulfil. It may be very fitting and satisfactory to the House at some future period, perhaps next year, to appoint a Committee to ascertain whether the system of examination is or is not conducted in a manner best calculated for the interests of the public service, and so far as I am concerned, I should have no objection to the appointment of such a Committee. But it is due to these Commissioners, who have performed this useful service to the public, to say that I believe they have conducted these examinations on a principle well calculated to secure the good of the public service. I am quite sure that they would feel nothing but satisfaction in a Committee being at a future but no distant time appointed by this House to inquire into the course they have pursued, and I am satisfied, as far as my information goes, that the result of that inquiry would be satisfactory to the public, and honourable to the Commissioners by whom the system has been conducted.

MR. ROEBUCK: The noble Lord mistakes the object of this Motion. It is not to ascertain whether the existing mode of examination for the Civil Service is a good one or a bad one, but to ascertain what that existing mode really is. When we know what it is that actually takes place it will be time enough to inquire whether it be good or bad. I do not understand then why we should wait till another year. We can learn what we really want to know now just as well as a twelvemonth hence. The noble Lord is, therefore, rather precipitate in arguing about the consequences before they happen. I have no doubt that when the world authoritatively knows the facts of the case, it will be seen that this so-called competitive examination and doing away with patronage is all a pretence. That is what I want to fix upon the system. This House has already determined that there shall be an open competitive examination; but your mode of carrying out its resolution is illusory. There is no free competition. When we have this conclusively established before a Committee, we may hope to see a pressure put upon this House that will cause an alteration of the system. At present this is the manner in which it works:—Suppose A. B., one of my constituents, comes to me and says, "I have a son whom I want to compete for a situation in the Home Office. Do you think you can get his name put down for me?" I answer, "I have no doubt that I shall be able to do so." I go to the Home Office, and because I am a Member of Parliament I get what I ask for. But that is not open competition. Suppose that man was not one of my constituents; suppose he was a person of no importance in the borough or county in which he lived, and yet had a large family of children, one of whom wished to compete for a public appointment; if he did not know a Member of Parliament or some one of influence, why he would have no more chance of admission to this competition than I now have of competing for the seat of the Great Mogul. The hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury used a very curious argument. He says this proposal would cause the attention of all the enterprising young men in England to be directed to official positions; that it would, in fact, draw the best minds of the community to such stations. So the result to which his argument brings us is that we now have second-rate men in office, and I quite believe him. What we want by open competition is to have first-rate men in office. By a competitive system we have obtained first-rate men for India. And what harm can possibly arise from this inquiry? The hon. Gentleman says the subject is not ripe for inquiry. What! is it not ripe for ascertaining what the present practice is?—for, remember, that is the real question before us. We wish, in fact, to lay bare what you now do, that the world may know what your system of competition is, which I denounce here as an absolute sham, covered up under a stale pretence.

Mr. CLAY said, he presumed the Motion was made in the expectation that the Committee might recommend some other system of nominating candidates than that which now existed. The noble Lord, however, seemed to imagine there was no medium between the present mode and throwing the Treasury doors open to every young man between sixteen and twenty-five who demanded to be examined. The latter plan would be quite impracticable. Some test, whether in the form of a preliminary examination, a schoolmaster's certificate, or otherwise, would surely be required. These, however, were precisely the points that needed investigation, and he thought the labours of the Committee would be exceedingly useful, whether it sat this year or the next. The noble

Lord seemed to entertain great fear of the mischief that would follow from an immediate inquiry; but he (Mr. Clay) did not, and therefore he should support the Motion.

COLONEL SYKES suggested that the system of competition practised in the various departments of the Indian service might be very advantageously applied to the admission of civil appointments in England. The standard of examination for Indian appointments was very high, and it obviated the inconvenience of too great a number of candidates. The object of all these competitive examinations was to enable those who came successfully out of them to obtain advancement in life. He should support the Motion.

Mr. COLLINS said, he trusted the hon. Member would divide the House upon his Motion. He had been applied to a few years ago to aid the son of a Yorkshire magistrate in procuring an appointment. He was bandied about from one person to another, and was told that the Treasury nomination-list was full. He was afterwards informed that he might get the young man's name placed upon the right hon. Member for Wells's private list, but, of course, he heard nothing more on the matter. It was a gross injustice that the influence of a great person should be necessary to secure that chance of competing for the service of his country which was the birth-right of every free born Englishman.

Mr. RIDLEY said, he thought if the best men were engaged for the public service by open competitive examination it would be necessary to pay them higher salaries, and thus the expenses of the civil service would be much increased. Railway companies and private firms remunerated their ablest servants at a liberal rate. It would be better for the country and more convenient for the Members of that House if the public patronage were taken out of the hands of Members of Parliament.

Mr. HENNESSY said that his object was inquiry, and in accordance with what appeared to be the general wish, he should carry his Motion to a division.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, that if the hon. Gentleman's only object was, as had been stated by the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield (Mr. Roebuck), to ascertain what the present system of examination really was [Several hon. MEMBERS: The system of nomination]—he should have no objection to the Motion, provided the object stated were more minutely defined.

Question put, and agreed to.

RECREATION AND IMPROVEMENT OF THE PEOPLE.

COMMITTEE MOVED FOR.

SIR JOHN TRELAWNY said, he had waived that part of his Motion on this subject which involved any allusion to the Lord's-day, and to the Resolution in its altered shape he believed that no opposition would be raised. His object was to obtain for the people the advantages of the expense already incurred in reference to such institutions as the British Museum and the National Gallery. If these places were open at stated hours on week-day evenings, as was the case now at Kensington, working men would be won from other pursuits highly injurious to their morals, and great benefit would result to the community. He should not, however, enter upon the general question, but would simply move—

"That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire whether it is in the power of Parliament to provide, or of this House to recommend, further facilities for promoting the healthful recreation and improvement of the people, by placing Institutions supported by general taxation, within reach of the largest section of the Taxpayers, at hours on week-days when, by the ordinary custom of trade, such persons are free from toil."

SIR CHARLES DOUGLAS seconded the Motion.

MR. KINNAIRD said, he was glad the hon. Baronet had thought fit, in deference to the general feeling of the House, to modify his Motion on this subject. As it now stood, he (Mr. Kinnaird) should have great pleasure in co-operating with the hon. Member in any measure calculated to place the means of healthful and innocent recreation within the reach of the working classes, and so to benefit the whole community.

MR. R. HANBURY said, he also wished to express his satisfaction at the course which the hon. Baronet had pursued in reference to the Motion. He would at the same time suggest that the early payment of wages by employers would greatly facilitate the efforts of our artisan population, and others to enjoy the advantages now sought for on their behalf.

Motion agreed to; Select Committee appointed.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

MR. LOCKE KING moved for leave to bring in a Bill to further secure the liberty of religious worship. As the law now stood any number of members in the Church of England could meet in a private house for the celebration of religious worship, according to the rites and ceremonies of the Church of England, except the most important of all—namely, the clergymen; and the object of the Bill was to remove that exception. If encouraged by the House he was ready to extend the operation of the Bill to include any locality whatever, but that point he proposed to settle in Committee.

MR. LYGON said, he wished to inquire whether this Bill, dealing with religious worship, ought not to have been introduced, in the first instance, in a Committee of the Whole House.

MR. SPEAKER replied in the negative. Leave given.

Bill for further securing the liberty of Religious Worship ordered to be brought in by Mr. Locke King and Mr. HORSFALL.

Bill presented, and read 1^o.

TREATIES OF GUARANTEE.

ADDRESS MOVED.

MR. KINGLAKE moved an Address, praying that in completion of the papers called "Treaties of Guarantee," there might be laid before that House extracts of the treaties by which Her Majesty was engaged to maintain in force any stipulations concerning the frontiers of France. The reason for his Motion was that the gentleman who had drawn up the previous return had omitted to insert those treaties by which England bound herself that certain States should be kept separate from other States. He thought that the return for which he had moved would tend to remove acrimony from the discussions between this country and France as to the annexation of Savoy, because it would show the Emperor that this country was not acting upon any whimsical idea or invidious feeling, but in conformity with solemn treaties. It would be right for him to give the House an idea of the papers which it would be necessary to produce. The definitive treaty between France and each of the other allied Powers, signed at Paris in 1815; the treaty of alliance and friendship between England and Austria, and a similar treaty between England and Russia, and England and Prussia.

MR. KINNAIRD seconded the Motion. Motion agreed to.

Address "that there be laid before this House, in completion of the Papers called 'Treaties of Guarantee,' Extracts of the Treaties by which Her Majesty is engaged to maintain in force any stipulations concerning the Frontiers of France."

The House adjourned at One o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Friday, February 17, 1860.

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILLS.—2^a Saint Mary in Rydal Marriages Validity.

COMMON LAW COMMISSION.—REPORT.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR laid upon the table of the House the third and last Report of the Commissioners appointed to inquire into Process, Practice, and System of Pleading in the Superior Courts of Common Law at Westminster. The noble and learned Lord then proceeded to state that he could not refrain from availing himself of that opportunity of expressing the high sense which he entertained of the services rendered to the cause of law reform by those four Commissioners—Lord Chief Justice Cockburn, Mr. Baron Martin, Mr. Justice Willes, and Mr. Walton, the Remembrancer of the Court of Exchequer.

LORD BROUGHAM entirely agreed in the testimony borne by his noble and learned Friend to the great merits and services of these learned Commissioners. He hoped the present Report would be followed by results as beneficial as had ensued from their last Report.

CHINA.—THE INSTRUCTIONS TO MR. BRUCE.

THE EARL OF DERBY: I have been requested by my noble Friend the Earl of Malmebury, who is not now present, to state that two or three nights ago, in consequence of what had fallen, in "another place," from the noble Lord the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, he thought it necessary to place upon your Lordships' books a notice of his intention to make a statement on Tuesday next respecting the instructions given to Mr. Bruce. I am desired by my noble Friend to say that since that time he has received a private communication from the noble Lord which is perfectly satisfactory to him, and it will therefore not be necessary for him to trouble your Lordships with any explanation on the matter.

ANNEXATION OF SAVOY TO FRANCE.

QUESTION.

THE MARQUESS OF NORMANBY: I wish to put a question to my noble Friend (Earl Granville) in consequence of a communication which I understand was made in "another place" last night with reference to the proposed annexation of Savoy and Nice to France. What I wish to ask my noble Friend is, whether in the existing state of the negotiations between this country and France on this subject—if negotiations be still pending—he thinks it desirable, for the promotion of the objects we all have in view, that another opportunity should be given to this House to pronounce an opinion on this question, and especially that we may hear some explanation from the Government as to the share they are alleged in some quarters to have had in producing the present state of things? I allude to what was stated in the course of the discussion the other night—though the Government did not appear to have any official record on the subject—that in the course of last autumn Count Walewski told Lord Cowley that the revival of this question of the annexation of Savoy was a consequence of the active intervention of England in the affairs of Central Italy, with a view to what she considered a solution of the difficulties that existed. I merely refer to that as a ground why I think it is right we should have an opportunity of again considering the subject. If I understand from my noble Friend that in the present state of the negotiations he thinks it is better that we should not renew the discussion, I will give no notice for any future day, only expressing the hope that the Government will not enter into any engagements that may bind this country in future with reference to this question without first taking the opinion of Parliament.

EARL GRANVILLE: The question, of which my noble Friend gave me private notice, was that it was his intention to ask whether Her Majesty's Government had received any further intelligence with respect to the proposed annexation of Savoy to France. I have to inform him that the

to send their children to receive their education in endowed schools, he should prefer the Amendment to the original clause: but as he was persuaded that for the purposes proposed it would have no effect whatever, but would leave the evil just as before, he could not accept the Amendment. In discussing this question much depended upon the point of view from which it was treated. The point from which he viewed it was that it was most important and most desirable to induce Dissenters as much as possible, to send their children to the endowed schools. If he were proposing to take anything from the Church of England he could understand that he should incur the reprobation of the right rev. Bench. But what he asked took nothing from the Church—according to an illustration as old as Cicero—if I let a man light his candle at mine I have still as much light as before. He could see no injury the Church would derive from the admission of the children of Dissenters to these schools, but on the contrary, believed it would rather derive benefit. Some persons were apprehensive lest the presence of children whose parents did not conform to the doctrines of the Church, might tend to weaken the attachment of the other pupils to that Church; but he thought it more probable, by joining in the same studies and sharing the same amusements with their fellow pupils, members of the Church of England, the children of Nonconformists might be induced, in after life, to modify their dissent, if not to become churchmen. He regarded the admission of Dissenters' children to these schools as an advantage to all, and not least to the Church itself. There was another consideration which, though addressed to less noble motives, ought yet to be taken into account. He had been reminded that in many endowed schools there was a capitation fee paid by all the scholars, and therefore an increase in the number of pupils would be an increase of the school funds. That was very desirable in itself, but it would operate beneficially in another way. In many schools the emoluments of the master were made to depend to some extent upon the number of pupils in his school, and nothing could be a greater stimulant to zeal and activity on his part than the knowledge that he had the whole community from whence to attract pupils. It appeared to him therefore that the introduction of Dissenters into these schools was a thing eminently to be desired. But the clause proposed by the most rev. Prelate merely declared that it should be lawful for a majority of the trustees to let such children in. Now, in ninety-nine out of one hundred cases the majority of these trustees were Churchmen; some of them, no doubt, had a strong feeling against any such provision—indeed, the petitions which had been presented to their Lordships' House against any such provision showed how strong the feeling was, so that if it were left to them to exclude whom they pleased, the benefit as regarded Dissenters might be altogether an illusory one. He therefore thought that the clause as it stood was better than the proposed substitute. His noble and learned Friend (Lord St. Leonards) on the other hand, proposed that Dissenting children should be admitted to endowed schools only where they had enjoyed a prescriptive right of admission for the last twenty-five years. Of course, if their Lordships wished, with this exception, to exclude Dissenting children, the clause was properly framed to accomplish that object; but, for his part, he could not see why any class of the community should be shut out from the privilege of a good education because they had not enjoyed it during the last quarter of a century. It was true that such a limitation had been inserted in the Dissenters' Chapels Bill. There the question was what doctrine ought to be inculcated in each particular chapel in the kingdom, and it was absolutely necessary to cut the knot by providing that if certain doctrines had been taught in a chapel for a certain time they should be deemed rightly taught. But what had that to do with the principle of admitting Dissenters to endowed schools? There was no reason why, if excluded heretofore, they should be excluded now. When the Court of Chancery believed it was empowered to allow Dissenting children to share in these privileges, the Judges never asked whether any prescriptive right existed; it was then the invariable rule to let Dissenters in, the feeling of the Court being that, if the schools had been established now, instead of in the reign of Edward VI., the founders would have excluded no one from the benefits conferred there. The Judges were evidently of opinion that the law as it was now interpreted was a harsh law. Perhaps it would be a relief if it were possible in the Bill to dispense altogether with the machinery of the Court of Chancery; but the right of Dissenters to enter these blished Church also, he for one was willing to redress that grievance; but when he found that they declared that the removal of their own grievances would not satisfy them, and that they demanded that church rates should be abolished, and that Churchmen themselves desirous of maintaining the church should not be allowed to do so, he then said that such a demand was wholly unreasonable and could not be complied with. So here if the Dissenters asked to have their children educated in these endowed schools that was a question that demanded grave consideration; but when he found that, according to the preamble, their object was to improve and to alter both the government and the education of these schools—when he found that they demanded to have a portion of the government of these schools—then he asked if they had any ground for the demand. He contended that clearly they had not. But, observe, there was a sort of mockery of an intention to do homage to the intentions of the founder, and it was said that the intentions of the founder, where they could be ascertained, should have full operation. The admission of the Dissenters by a conscience clause was all that they could possibly ask, and he had shown a disposition, when he had the power, of admitting Dissenters into these schools. When he had the honour of holding the Great Seal, a case came before him in which he, as visitor for the Crown, allowed the Dissenters to have the benefit of an endowment, and he introduced a clause into the scheme to that effect; and he would to-morrow, if he had similar powers, exercise them in the same manner. But the object of this Bill was not only to give to the Dissenters the benefit of endowments never intended for them, but to give them the power and privilege of directing and controlling the mode and character of the teaching in these schools. If they looked to the Dissenters' Chapel Bill they would find that twenty-five years of possession was considered a limitation in order to admit Dissenters to the rights which they might consider they had. It gave to them the benefit of the time during which they had enjoyed the foundation. No doubt possession for a quarter of a century would give some colourable claim, and some such limitation might be inserted in this Bill. Then if they looked to the Charitable Trusts Act, which was passed a few years ago, they would find that it contained a clause that nothing contained in the Bill should affect church property. That showed the care that he took in making provisions respecting these endowments. For these reasons, as at present advised, he thought it his duty to oppose this Bill. He had indeed originally intended to oppose going into Committee at all; but seeing the numerous attendance of right rev. Prelates who took a great interest in this measure, he would not persist in that intention.

House in Committee.

Clause 1 postponed.

Clause 2, Judge of Court of Chancery may issue summons to show cause why a "Conscience Clause" should not be inserted in scheme.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY said, he was opposed to this clause, as he feared its effect would be to raise litigation in many parishes where at present there is no dissatisfaction. He was quite ready to admit the children of Nonconformists to the benefits of those schools, and so to grant them all which under the change of circumstances they might justly claim. But he could not admit that the Nonconformists should have a share in the government of the Schools, nor could he consent that the doctrines of the Church of England should be set aside in favour of other doctrines which might be variable, inconsistent doctrines, according to the views of the Trustees for the time being. He desired to preserve the foundation as it stood at present, and has always stood; whilst he allowed individual parents to enjoy all the advantages of the school, without any sacrifice to which their consciences may be opposed. He trusted that this proposal would meet with general concurrence as fair and equitable, reserving to one party what they have a right to maintain, and giving to the other party as much as they could reasonably require. He therefore proposed as an Amendment, that:—

"It shall be lawful for all Trustees of Endowed Schools, from Time to Time, as they shall see fit, to make such Orders, as, whilst they shall not interfere with the religious Teaching of the other Scholars as now fixed by Statute or other legal Requirements shall provide for admitting to the Benefits of the School, the Children of Parents not in communion with the Church, Sect, or Denomination, according to the Doctrines or Formularies of which religious Instruction is to be afforded under the Endowment of the said schools."

LORD CRANWORTH said, if the effect of the Amendment proposed by the most rev. Prelate would be to enable Dissenters matter be left by the Bill to the trustees, but with some directions for their guidance.

LORD LYTTELTON suggested that the Bill ought to be referred to a Select Committee, for assuredly if exact directions were not framed for the guidance of trustees throughout the country there would be much discrepancy in their proceedings.

LORD BROUGHAM felt the greatest possible satisfaction, indeed the utmost gratification at the course which this discussion had taken. The proposition of the most rev. Primate was extremely liberal; and the suggestion of the right rev. Prelate (the Bishop of London) well adapted to carry it into effect. It was of the utmost importance that the basis of this measure, which was to be found in the present clause, should be carried with as little dissent among their Lordships as possible, so that it should appear to be the general wish of both sides of the House to remove, as far as possible, the differences between Churchmen and Dissenters, both as to the children attending the schools and as to the trustees having their management. A little concession on either side would be highly expedient for the purpose of securing unanimity in that general principle. But he could not agree to any such concession as would leave the whole matter entirely in the hands of the trustees, without any compulsion, and much less without any direction, to take the step or not, and if they took it, to take it with such modifications and conditions as they might themselves choose. He thought that some such suggestion as that of his noble Friend on the cross benches (Earl Grey) would furnish a solution of the difficulty, but he should propose to add that no compulsory direction should be given when by deed, will, or other instrument, there was an exclusion of any particular sect. He could by no means go along with the view that the Court of Chancery had taken of this particular subject with reference to the admission of Dissenters by assuming that where there was no express direction given, an endowed school should be held as established for the promotion of education according to the doctrines of the Church of England, and consequently closed against Dissenters. But what had we done even in cases where the founders had indicated their intentions in the plainest possible language? Had the intentions of the founders been scrupulously executed, and their regulations observed? On the contrary, we had frequently taken the thing into our own hands, altered the course prescribed, and confiscated the funds to our own use. This was the case in the reign of Edward VI., where all property, real and personal, and which was intended for "superstitious uses," was confiscated. It was doubtful whether at this hour there was an Act of Parliament perpetually and entirely prohibiting superstitious uses or gifts. The statute of Henry VIII. only proscribed these uses for twenty years, and the statute of Edward VI. was entirely retrospective. Acting on the principle that these uses were illegal, the Court of Chancery had refused to execute the trusts and condemned them as being superstitious; and when they discovered that the intention of the founder was charitable, but the use was superstitious, the trust fund had gone to the Crown, and the Court of Chancery had directed the disposal of the property. Sir W. Grant expressed it thus.—We considered that the author of the instrument intended charity, but we required that he should be charitable in our own way, and not only applied this fund, whether real or personal, to purposes not within his intentions, but in direct opposition to those intentions. This had even been carried so far that in a multitude of cases the charity had been appropriated in a direction absolutely adverse to the intentions of the founder. So that if a Roman Catholic bequeathed property for performing mass or other ceremony, his very object was frustrated, and the children educated according to Protestant principles and in abhorrence of the Roman Catholic faith. He would therefore suggest some modifications in the Bill to prevent any interference with the declared intentions of the founder. What he desired was that in all cases where there was no positive prohibition of Dissenters or exclusive preference of Churchmen, endowed schools should be thrown open. It was not a small matter with which their Lordships were dealing. There was, happily, an enormous number of endowed schools—upwards of 4,000, and he was gratified to find that since 1833 the number of children attending those schools had increased from 180,000 to 360,000. He believed that the peace of the country and of the Church would be materially aided by the course which their Lordships were now recommended to take. There was no hostility on the part of Dissenters personally to the Church. If there was, he should be the last man to partake of that hostility. The Church of England he held to be distinguished by all the good qualities which could give stability or do honour to an ecclesiastical establishment. It was as learned as the Romish, as evangelical and pure as the Calvinist Church, while it had over both the high advantage in a limited monarchy of being friendly in its constitution to the cause of moderate freedom, equally adverse as that cause was to the ordinary despotism of some countries and to the popular tyranny of others. Above all, it surpassed other churches in tolerance. He well remembered hearing his learned and excellent Friend, the late Dr. Shepherd, of Liverpool, himself a conscientious Dissenter, rebuking a member of his own sect who had made an attack upon the Church of England. "Not a word more against the Church of England," said the doctor; "for rely upon it, that though we differ from her and renounce the regiment of bishops as much as the Presbyterians of Scotland themselves, we never shall have so wise, so peaceable, and so great a neighbour."

LORD CHELMSFORD had felt inclined to support the clause proposed by the right rev. Prelate, because he considered that it conceded everything that Dissenters ought to have. He preferred the permissive form in which the clause originally stood to the shape of compulsion which it had now assumed; but as it was not opposed by the right reverend Bench, it was impossible for him to resist it, because he knew they would be supported by the majority of the House. If, however, the 7th clause, with reference to the admission of Dissenters as trustees, was inserted, it might so happen that Dissenters might come into authority, and they would of course take care that the law as set forth in this section should be set in motion, and the consequence would be that the Church of England would in time be stripped possibly of her entire authority over these schools. If the 7th clause was omitted he would have no objection to support the Bill.

THE BISHOP OF OXFORD said, that if this clause were made imperative in the simplicity in which it was now proposed, it would render impossible the foundation of schools of a purely Church of England character—a result which none of their Lordships could desire; and it would therefore be necessary to insert words to prevent its having such an operation. For instance, there was a school in his own diocese founded by trustees, and which particularly provided that the training and teaching should be that of the Church of England, and no other. Would it be consistent with ordinary justice to compel such trust to be altered? His right reverend Colleagues had intimated, that for the sake of unanimity, if the House were favourable to the clause, they would accept it; for they felt that the great object to be had at heart was to preserve the managing power of Church of England schools in Church of England men. If without injuring the interests of children of the Church of England, they could extend the benefit of all these schools to our Dissenting brethren, he had not the slightest wish to exclude them, but on the contrary, desired to see them admitted, provided all such guards and regulations were introduced as to prevent concessions defeating the primary objects of these schools—that of training the children on Church of England principles. What they felt to be the one only security for it was that the trustees who were to have the management should be members of the Church of England. The clause, he thought, would be far better permissive than imperative. In all cases where it was carried into effect without injuring the primary character of the schools, the permissive clause would be sufficient. The permissive clause, he thought, would accomplish all that was desired. If that clause were made imperative, and if the trustee clause were not carried, he should be prepared to vote against the whole Bill on the third reading.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY thought it probable that, if the children of Dissenters were allowed to come to the Church of England schools, a large portion of them might become members of that church. They would not be likely, at all events, to become its bitter antagonists. He was glad to observe the spirit in which the Bill had been received by the Episcopal Bench, and he had no doubt that his noble and learned Friend (Lord Cranworth) would not object to insert in the Bill a clause to exempt from the operation of his Bill, schools which by special endowment were founded for the benefit of children of the Church of England.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR was understood to suggest that the second clause should not be struck out, but that, according to the provisions of Sir Hugh Cairns' Bill, its operation should be regulated by the usage of twenty-five years. If during twenty-five years the endowments had been

LORD CHELMSFORD intimated that he would move the rejection of the 7th clause when they came to it.

THE BISHOP OF LINCOLN thought, that the object which they ought to seek to attain was, that they should maintain the principle on which schools were founded, without being exclusive ; that the governing body should be confined to the religion enjoined by the founder, but that the greatest liberality should be manifested in extending the advantages of the schools to children of every denomination. He would vote for the Amendment first proposed.

On Quccation, resolved in the negative.

Clause proposed.

"It shall be lawful for all Trustees of Endowed Schools from Time to Time, and they shall be bound, to make such Orders as, while they shall not interfere with the religious Teaching of the other scholars as now fixed by Statute or other legal requirement, shall provide for admitting to the benefits of the School the Children of Parents not in communion with the Church, Sect, or Denomination according to the Doctrines or Formularies of which religious Instruction is to be afforded under the Endowment of the said Schools; Provided that in the Will or Wills, Deed or Deeds, or other Instrument or Instruments regulating such Endowment, nothing be contained expressly requiring the Children educated under such Endowment to learn or to be instructed according to the Doctrines or Formularies of such Church, Sect, or Denomination."

Clause agreed to.

Clause 7, (Unless otherwise expressed in Will or Deed, Trustee not ineligible on account of his Religion).

LORD CRANWORTH said, that the effect of this clause was simply to declare that Dissenters were not ineligible as trustees. The Bill in the other House of Parliament contained a clause to the effect that if it had been the practice to elect Dissenters for the last twenty-five years such practice might continue, but not otherwise. He thought that utterly indefensible; and what he simply suggested was, to declare in general terms, that Dissenters should not be ineligible, but that they should be put on the same footing as of necessity a great many important schools in the kingdom were now put as the law now stood. At present the government of certain endowed schools was vested in the Corporation or in the Companies of London, of which many of the members were Dissenters. If Dissenters were not, under this Bill, to be eligible as trustees of endowed schools, how could their Lordships stop short and leave present post those Dissenters now trustees. The question was they would now settle this question all, or leave it to be raised again, or other and more inconvenient. It was sure that the Dissenters were grateful to them for the clause which had been proposed by the most respectable of the Lordships, but if they were to say that those who were not to be eligible as trustees were feared they would, to a certain extent, leave a grievance to be redressed. In fact, it seemed to follow logically from what they had done that they should admit Dissenters to protect themselves, which this clause had conferred. There was another point well worth consideration of their Lordships. It was a time when Dissenters were excluded from the exercise of a great number of public functions; among those connected with municipalities. But how were we now to decide whether a man was a Dissenter? He trusted it would never be said that a man was to be eligible as a trustee as was provided by the now happy Test and Corporation Acts, having taken the sacrament of the Lords' Supper, or being in the habit of attending to the rites of the Church within the year. That was the question, but he trusted none of their Lordships wished to revert to that most objectionable test. How, he repeated, were they to ascertain whether a man was a Dissenter? Was it to be by common reputation? Was it to be by the going occasionally to a Dissenting place of worship make a man a Dissenter? He contended that there was no other means of deciding such a question, and that their Lordships began to legislate upon who was or was not a Dissenter, they entered upon an endless discussion.

LORD CHELMSFORD said going to discuss the question of five years' prescription. The entirely changed during the day he now thought, notwithstanding the arguments of his noble and learned friends, it would be extremely desirable to delete the clause altogether, and not to allow the children of D to be trustees under any circumstances. Observe how his noble and learned friends followed up one concession by another. His noble and learned friends had drawn a logical deduction from the concession conceded to the children of D, that the right of admission to endowed schools were bound now to admit D

THE DOCTOR OF NEWCASTLE reminded the noble and learned Lord that his noble and learned Friend (Lord Cranworth), in introducing this clause, was merely following in the steps of the Solicitor General of the late Government.

LORD CHELMSFORD said, that the first Bill was introduced by Mr. Dillwyn, and was referred to a Select Committee, of which the late Solicitor General was a member. In introducing the second Bill, his noble and learned Friend acted merely as the instrument of the Committee, and was not himself responsible for the clause.

THE DOCTOR OF NEWCASTLE said, however that might be, he was anxious that no party spirit should be shown with regard to this Bill. He felt the more strongly on this point, as he had been acting for the last two years as the chairman of the Commission on the subject of education, and he could assure their Lordships that there was one thing more than anything else which struck him in the course of his investigation, it was, that with the increase of the population attending the schools, the country what was called the Dissenting element did not exist; and he believed that was the conclusion, and he believed that he ought to say to his colleagues, that that was the result of no formal resolution on the subject, that if the sectarian element of Dissenters and ministers of religion were kept out from the question of schools the religious harmony would be almost co-extensive with the attendance in schools. A most admirable example of the moderation and liberality which was so desirable had been shown that evening by the right reverend Bench, and he was confident the Dissenters would deeply feel and strongly appreciate it. It was a pity that that spirit should be marred by subsequent differences, and therefore he would suggest to his noble and learned Friend that this clause had better be omitted, and that the Bill should be made to stand on the clause agreed to by the right rev. Bench.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY deprecated the unqualified rejection of the clause. If the exclusion of Dissenters from the office of trustee was to be maintained, how was it proposed to deal with those cases such as the Bradford Charity, where Dissenters had already been appointed trustees? If it was decided to be against the wish of the founders to appoint Dissenters, was it intended to disqualify Lord Panmure and Lord Aberdeen from the offices they now filled as governors of the Charterhouse? He should regret extremely that any course should be adopted which would not only exclude Dissenters for the future, but would deprive those gentlemen who had been already selected for the office by their fellow townsmen, and had performed the duties to the satisfaction of all parties.

LORD BROUGHAM said, that although it might be that Sir Hugh Cairns was only a Member of the Committee of the other House, and had nothing personally to do with the clause, yet he found on a Bill which bore Sir Hugh Cairns' name on the back a clause to the effect that where Dissenters had been admitted to the office of trustee for a space of twenty-five years the right should continue. The clause under consideration was the same except that it omitted the necessity for twenty-five years' usage. That Bill, also, effectually admitted the children of Dissenters to all these schools unless they were excluded by the endowment deed. He should greatly regret if Dissenters were not to be admitted as trustees, from which office they were excluded, not by legislation, but by the effect of a recently-pronounced legal decision. The law, till that decision was come to in Chancery some time ago, admitted Dissenters. That was now held to be contrary to the presumption of law. It was laid down that if no sect was mentioned in an educational endowment, the Church of England must be presumed to be intended ; and the effect had been just that of an Act of Parliament to repeal the previously existing law. The noble and learned Lord near him (Lord Chelmsford) was much alarmed at the prospect of Dissenters becoming first trustees of endowed schools, and then by and by increasing to a majority, and then overruling the Churchmen and taking possession of the direction of the education of the country ; but he overlooked the discontent and disappointment which would be felt by the Dissenters, by that great body of religionists scattered all over the country, large in numbers, and eminent in wealth, and talents, and endowments, by the rejection of this clause—a discontent and a disappointment much greater than the comfort arising from the concession offered by the most reverend Primate the Archbishop of Canterbury. The evil in one case would be great and pressing, and present ; in the other, it would be inconsiderable and distant. But his noble and learned Friend indulged in the habit not uncommon with alarmists at reform and every kind of progress of using his telescope at both ends ; and, having seen at one look a remote object magnified and brought near, he next applied the other end to the near objects, and thus made them appear remote and insignificant. The distant and small peril he made appear near and great, while the near and great peril he made look insignificant and remote. It was well for him that he had not taken the same liberties with his glass while he was the ornament of another profession. If he had on his quarter deck found his telescope the wrong way, when our enemy's vessel was near, he would have made no preparation for defence, and their Lordships would have been deprived of his presence in their House.

LORD ABINGER said, the House had been told that having conceded a clause to the Dissenters, they, as a body, would feel worse off than they would have been had the concession not been made ; and this question he would be glad to discuss after that of church rates had been settled. Was the concession intended to conciliate ? In his experience he had never found any good result from an attempt to conciliate a decided enemy, and he could not help regarding Dissenters as decided enemies to the Church. In a free country every man's commerce with his God ought to be free ; but Churchmen should be true to themselves, and not admit a preference to be given to scruples of conscience duties, one of which consisted of able obedience to the law and existing institutions.

LORD CRANWORTH said, he concealed from the House or from that he was placed in a very difficult position. He had been asked by a most respectable gentleman who senters to take charge of this Bill knew that they felt their exclusive school trusts to be a great grievance he should not have acceded to the request if he had not sympathised with their feelings, and if he had not been that their sentiments were not without foundation. At the same time quite alive to the force of his noble Duke's remark, the concession had been made in clauses which had been passed clauses would be regarded as a boon, and might carry with it what was desired, and he was hoping that the grace of that boon would be lessened by any angry discussion of other parts of the Bill. Doubtless, whether he was taking the course, he would consent to the omission of the clause ; but he should to himself the right of reintroducing it in a modified form at the bringing in of the Report if he saw any prospect of being able to carry it.

Clause 8 (Act not to apply to Institutions in Ireland) agreed to. Other Amendments made.

Report of Amendments to be brought in on Thursday next.

House adjourned at a quarter of eight o'clock, to meet on Monday next.

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILLS.—1^o Piers and Settled Estates Act (1856) Amendment. 2^o Consolidated Fund (£407,649) ; Corporation Mortgages, &c. ; Valuable Property (Ireland) ; Roman Catholics.

AMENDMENT ON THE BUDGET. NOTICE.

MR. DUCANE :—Sir, I beg to give notice that on Monday next, on that Mr. Speaker do leave the House for the purpose of going into Commi-

the Customs Acts, I shall move the following Resolution as an Amendment to the Motion :—

“That this House, recognizing the necessity of providing for the increased expenditure of the coming financial year, is of opinion that it is not expedient to add to the existing deficiency by diminishing the ordinary revenue, and is not prepared to disappoint the just expectations of the country by reimposing the income tax at an unnecessarily high rate.”

PRIZE MONEY IN INDIA.—QUESTION.

SIR EDWARD GROGAN said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for India, Whether the Prize Money captured by the Troops employed in quelling the late Mutiny in that Country is to be divided equally amongst all the Troops engaged without reference to district, or are there to be separate divisions of the Money for the relief of Lucknow under Lord Clyde (for which those engaged have hitherto received neither batta nor distinction), for the capture of that city, of Delhi, and of the sums realized in other places?

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, that all the troops in India during the mutiny, wherever employed, would certainly not receive prize money. The troops who captured Delhi would receive the prize money of that place; the troops who captured Lucknow would receive the prize money of that place; but the troops who captured no place and took no prize money would not receive prize money belonging to other troops.

STATE OF HUNGARY.—QUESTION.

MR. LONG said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs if any special information on the State of Hungary has recently been received by the Government; and if so, whether there is any objection to that information being communicated to the House.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, that a great deal of information had been received from our Minister at Vienna with respect to the state of Hungary, but, as it referred to the internal government of another country, he considered that it would not be convenient to lay it before Parliament.

AMMUNITION FOR THE VOLUNTEER CORPS.—QUESTION.

MR. WAY said, he would beg to ask the Secretary for War whether her Majesty's Government propose to make provision in the Army Estimates for supplying

Mr. DuCane

Ammunition to the different Corps of Rifle Volunteers; and whether Her Majesty's Government will place the Rifle Volunteers on the same footing in respect of Ammunition as the Volunteer Artillery.

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT said, he would prefer to give an answer in a few days, when he should be prepared to make a statement upon the whole subject.

THE HOP DUTIES.—QUESTION.

MR. MILDMAY said, he rose to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, whether it is his intention to enforce the payment of the Duty on all home-grown Hops on the 1st day of January, or whether he will allow home-growers, by availing themselves of the proposed system of Inland Bonding, to share in the advantage enjoyed by the importers of foreign Hops, of not paying the Duty until the Hops are sold for consumption.

MR. LAING said, his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer had stated in a letter which had appeared in the public papers the arrangements which he proposed with regard to hops :—namely, that the reduced duty on Foreign and English hops should not take effect until the 1st of January, 1861. As a considerable period was allowed the English hop-grower for payment of the duty, and as the duty was not paid usually until some time after the crop was gathered and sold, it was not probable that a longer interval would be enjoyed by the importer of foreign hops. He, therefore, did not think that any system of inland bonding would be extended to articles like hops.

MR. DODSON said, he would also beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer whether the Resolution reducing the Excise Duty upon Hops to 14s. a cwt. will apply to the duty upon the crop of 1859, payable in May and November next; and if not, from what date it is intended that the corresponding Resolution reducing the Customs Duty on Foreign Hops should take effect?

MR. LAING said, that the present Duty on Hops would apply to the whole of the crop of 1859, payable in May and November next; and as had been already stated, the reduced Duty both on English and Foreign Hops would only come into effect on the 1st of January, 1861.

TRAINING OF THE MILITIA.—QUESTION.

MAJOR PARKER said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, if he is prepared to give an assurance that Regiments of Militia will not, unless the exigencies of the State require it, be called out for training during those periods of the year when the services of the men are most needed for agricultural purposes?

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT said, the Committee which sat on the subject of the Militia last year recommended that trainings in future should be as nearly as possible simultaneous, so as to prevent the passing of men from one corps to another, in order to get double bounty and training pay. The Government had determined, as far as possible, to act upon that recommendation. It was clear that in different portions of the country the time of harvest was different; he had, therefore, put himself into communication with the Lords-Lieutenant of counties; and, in all probability, regiments in the south of England would assemble in May, and regiments further north later, in order that the training should not occur at a time when labour was greatly required.

TIME BARGAINS.—QUESTION.

MR. ALDERMAN SALOMONS said, he would beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer if the proposed Penny Stamp on Brokers' Contract Notes will apply to all transactions in the Public Funds, and will it therefore legalize all such transactions?

MR. LAING said, it was intended to make the Penny Stamp applicable to time bargains, and to repeal the Act of George II., which he had no hesitation in saying was a relic of an obsolete system, and, if enforced, would be most prejudicial in its effect. It was now a dead letter, except to cast an unmerited stigma on a respectable body of men, and to arm dishonest persons with the means of repudiating inconvenient contracts.

FORTIFICATIONS OF PLYMOUTH AND DEVONPORT.—QUESTION.

MR. PALK said, he wished to ask the Secretary of State for War, Whether the expenses of Fortifying Plymouth and Devonport are included in the Estimates that have been laid upon the Table?

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT said, that the Estimates on the Table contained a lump sum on the subject of fortifications, without specifying the particular places to which the money was to be applied. It was rather unusual; but the hon. Gentleman would have probably guessed the reason was that the Report of the Commissioners on National Defence, in complete form, was only placed in on Saturday last. It was a most grave and serious consideration, and he wished to have time to lay it before the Government, with the view to consider ever plans it was expedient. Under those circumstances he could not propose a lump sum. The continuance of existing works was included, and in the period he would state the course the Government intended to take on the whole subject.

EXCHEQUER BONDS.—QUESTION.

MR. DISRAELI said, as the House had not gathered, he would ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, evening to what period it was intended to defer the payment of the £1,000,000 of Exchequer Bonds due in the course of the next financial year, he would ask the Secretary of the Treasury to state the period.

MR. LAING said, that the precedent for the renewal of Exchequer Bonds was that set by the right hon. Member himself, when Chancellor of the Exchequer, in 1858, when £2,000,000 of Exchequer bonds were renewed for a half and four and a half years. It was probable that a somewhat similar arrangement might be taken in this instance. The financial arrangements of the House were further advanced, and the Government was not in a position to give an exact date. But sufficient notice would be given before any proposal was made on the subject.

On Motion that the House do adjourn till Monday next,

THE TREATY OF COMMERCE WITH FRANCE.—QUESTION.

MR. BENTINCK: The project I have in view in asking the question of which I have given notice, is the Motion for adjournment which I gave on what we failed in obtaining on occasion from the Government. The subject is one of deep interest to the country, and in order that I might strictly to the rules of the House, perhaps, be kind enough to allow me to put it as a hypothetical case. A suppose that on a very recent occasion some hon. Member of this House put the question I now propose to put to the noble Lord at the head of the administration to a distinguished Member of the present Government, and received an answer something to the following effect:—"That as to whether the rejection of the treaty would produce any disturbance in our friendly relations, why the hon. Gentleman and every other Member of the House is quite as capable of forming an opinion as we are; that any threat or intimation of that kind has been made is utterly untrue, but as to what effect any angry speeches in the House of Commons against France, followed by a rejection of the Treaty might have, hon. Members can judge for themselves." I confess, if I had been in the position of the hon. Member who I suppose as having put that question, I should have heard the answer with considerable surprise. In the first place, it appears somewhat singular that a distinguished Member of the Government, entrusted with the foreign relations of the country, should have failed to have told any other Member of Her Majesty's Government what, in his opinion, might be the result of the discussion of this most important question, and that the Government of which he is a Member should not have anticipated the possible result of such discussion, and were not prepared to say what in their opinion that result would be. I confess if I had received such an answer I should certainly, having failed to obtain a direct answer from one Member of the Government, have taken the course of applying to the head of that Government, in the hope of obtaining a more distinct reply. I will leave the House to judge how far I have drawn on my imagination in putting this supposititious case. In my opinion the whole thing lies in a nut-shell. We have been told that the Commercial Treaty with France was a treaty which had been ratified, subject to the sanction of the House of Commons. On this only one interpretation can be put, that we are left to deal with the subject unfettered by any other consideration than the expediency of the Treaty itself. It is true that nothing to the contrary has been said in the House, but we are constantly hearing whispers in the lobby that we should be very careful how we deal with any of the details of the treaty, because any rejection on our part of its details might disturb our amicable relations with France?

If that is the real meaning of the noble Lord, I can only look upon it as a positive insult to the House and the country. I cannot, however, bring myself to believe that the Government have not anticipated that the Treaty may not be accepted by the House, and that it has foreseen and provided for all possible consequences. I wish, therefore, to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether any understanding has been come to between the Governments of France and this country in the event of the Commercial Treaty not being sanctioned by Parliament?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: I will endeavour to give the hon. Gentleman as plain an answer to his question as I can; and it will be very simple, as might naturally be expected. The Treaty was concluded between the Governments of France and England, as appears by a distinct Article in the Treaty, subject to the approval of Parliament. We may, perhaps, have been too sanguine in our expectation of the success of a measure which we deemed to be of great importance to the public interest, both as regards the development of our own commercial resources and as regards the natural and, we trust, the sure consequences that will result from the cementing more closely and thoroughly a good understanding between the two nations; but, confiding in the good sense of this House and the country, and anticipating that their verdict would be in conformity with our judgment, our hope, and our expectation, it is needless to say that we have not deemed it to be our duty to provide by any understanding with France for the failure of our just expectations. My answer, therefore, is that no such understanding has been come to, because we did not anticipate a failure of the proposals which we have made. Although there may be those who, like the hon. Gentleman, disapprove the treaty—and we don't, of course, challenge or question the judgment which any person or set of persons may pass upon it—our sanguine expectation is that the judgment of the country and of Parliament in the aggregate will be in favour of our proposals. Perhaps, while I am on my legs, I may be permitted to state that, as we are to commence the discussion of the Budget on Monday, it would be most convenient for the public service and for the despatch of business if the debate were to be allowed to go on day by day without being postponed by the intervention of any other business, which would be likely to occupy the House for any time.

ARMS OF THE ARTILLERY RIFLE CORPS.—QUESTION.

LORD ELCHO, in rising to put a question to the Secretary of State for War relative to the arming of the Volunteer Artillery Corps, observed that his attention had been called to a circumstance which had occurred at Liverpool, which afforded a pretty good indication of the feeling entertained by the Volunteer Artillery Corps with respect to the question of the arms which they were to carry. When Colonel M'Murdo, who had been appointed inspector of the Volunteer Artillery Corps, proceeded some days since to Liverpool to inspect about 1,500 of the corps, the major commanding and the officer of an artillery corps consisting of 640 men, which had been raised there, had impressed upon him the absolute necessity of arming the volunteers with the rifled carbine, and not with the old musket. It appeared that a majority of the force had joined on the express understanding that the artillery corps would be armed with the carbine and bayonet, and under those circumstances it was not to be expected that they should march through the streets of Liverpool armed with an antiquated Roman sword? The thing was utterly ridiculous. The major had also reported to the inspector that unless the men were properly armed he anticipated the utmost difficulty in keeping the corps together. He (Lord Elcho) should have thought nothing of this had it been an isolated case, but the fact was there were the same complaints in every volunteer artillery corps. The Government had intimated that volunteers raised in sea-board counties should be formed into Volunteer Artillery Corps, but he thought that it would be found impossible to do so unless they consented to issue a proper description of arms. With that view he begged to ask the Secretary of State whether there was any intention on the part of the Government to arm the Volunteer Artillery Corps with the carbine and bayonet?

THE INDIAN ARMY—WOOLWICH AND SANDHURST.—QUESTION.

MR. HASSARD said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, Whether as the Army of India has now been brought under the immediate administration of the Crown, it is his intention to permit Officers of the Indian Army to send their sons to Woolwich and Sandhurst upon the same terms as to payment as those upon which Officers of Her Majesty's other Forces are permitted to send their sons to those establishments?

DEFENCES OF THE COUNTRY. QUESTION.

MR. ELLICE (Coventry) said, he was desirous of putting to the Secretary of State the question of which he had given notice, with reference to the discussion on the Budget on Monday, Whether the Army Estimates comprise the whole sum to be asked for the Defences of the Country for the ensuing year, or when an Estimate for any additional sum is to be laid upon the table? The Budget which had been submitted to the House was of a somewhat ambitious character, and dealt largely with the internal and external condition of the country. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had gilt the pill with all that consummate art and ability of which he was master; but it was essential that Parliament, in examining the prescription, should have before them all the elements which could enable them to form a decision. The right hon. Gentleman was about to make extensive remissions of what had been hitherto regarded as the permanent revenue of the country, and to repeal some taxes which were very objectionable in themselves and had become odious to large portions of the community. He had not the least objection to the abolition of these duties, providing a substitute were forthcoming to repair the wide breaches thus made in the permanent income of the nation; but the resources which were brought to bear for this purpose were of so adventitious and accidental a character—as, for instance, the taking up of the credit on the malt duties, and the sum of money which had come in once for all from Spain—that before concurring in the proposals of the right hon. Gentleman he was anxious to know what other expenses it was probable the country would be called on to incur in the course of the year. They had been asked to vote a sum of £500,000 on account of the Chinese expedition. The war with that country he looked upon as unjust and unfortunate, and he believed that it would prove to be a great mistake; but, right or wrong, they were bound to meet the expenditure, and the experience which he had acquired from former undertakings of a similar character led him to the belief that the sum which was to be voted on this account would prove altogether inadequate. Under such circumstances he felt he was perfectly justified in putting the question of which he had given notice. For if they were about to take away a large portion of the permanent income of the country and to repair the loss by accidental and adventitious means, and if in addition they had the prospect of a large aggravation of their expenses in the East, the whole case as to the expenses of the year ought to be put before the House. In answer to the hon. Member for Stroud, who was the great advocate of an extensive system of fortifications, the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War had last Session stated that owing to the recent period at which the Commission of Inquiry had made their Report, he was not prepared to state what course the Government might think it right to adopt. What he now wished to inquire was, not what the Government were disposed to recommend, or the amount which it was probable would eventually be required, but whether it was likely that in the present Session any considerable sum of money would be asked for on account of those plans. On the subject of the expenses themselves he expressed no opinion whatever, but as regarded the military Estimates which had been laid on the table it was impossible to speak without deep lamentation and regret, and he trusted that they would afford a lesson to the younger Members of the House. It might be possible, after careful examination, to effect some slight reduction in their amount; but the great bulk would still remain, and he supposed that they must make up their minds to meet it. It was therefore of the utmost importance that the country should be dealt with openly and honestly, and be made acquainted with the entire amount of the Bill. It was simply in a financial point of view, and in order to the clearer understanding of the discussion upon the Budget on Monday night, that he would now ask the right hon. Gentleman whether the Army Estimates contained the entire sum which would be required for the defence of the country during the ensuing year?

PRACTICE GROUNDS FOR VOLUNTEER CORPS.

Mr. WYLD said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for War if it is the intention of the Government to provide grounds for the target practice of the Volunteer Rifle Corps? According to the present regulations, the different corps were required to provide their own practice grounds, which should in no case be less than 200 yards in extent, and it was found that in reality a much more extensive range was required. The difficulties in their way, especially in populous localities, were so great that, unless some assistance were afforded by the Government, he believed it would require considerable time before these corps acquired that efficiency which was so very desirable.

Mr. SIDNEY HERBERT said, he would answer the questions as far as he could in the order in which they had been put to him. In reference to the question put by the noble Lord (Lord Elcho), he could only say that if the volunteer artillery corps wished to extract from the Government rifle carbines of the best description the Government would not be able to comply with the demand, because there was not yet a sufficient supply for the regular forces; but if the corps would accept carbines of an inferior description, the Government would be very happy to place them at their disposal. With respect to the question put by the hon. Gentleman below him (Mr. Wyld) he had to state that it was not the intention of the Government to purchase practising grounds for the use of volunteer corps. If Government were to undertake to perform any such duty as to provide ranges for rifle corps, the cost to the country would be something enormous. Where volunteer corps, having strong local influence and strong local connections, could hire or buy, perhaps obtain gratuitously, ground for such a purpose, it should be done; for if the Government came into the market there was a peculiar tendency in the value of property to rise in consequence, and of this he had had so much experience that he should be very much dissatisfied at any attempt to extend the practice. As to the question of the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Hassard), he was sorry he could not give him an answer that would be satisfactory. The College at Sandhurst was not financially in a very satisfactory state at present, and an extension of the privileges of that institution to the sons of Indian officers at the present rates would only tend to involve the college in further embarrassment. It must be recollected that the officers of the local army of the Indian Government received higher pay, and their widows obtained higher pensions, than was the case with officers in the Queen's service, though the latter had a counterbalancing advantage in the right of sending their sons to Sandhurst. An officer in the Queen's army received £127 half-pay, and he paid £40 a year for the expenses of his son at Sandhurst, leaving a balance of £87; but an Indian officer received £365, and had to pay £100 for his son, instead of £40, leaving a balance of £265. That established at once a very great difference. However, he did not wish to preclude himself from dealing with this question in the future. To the question of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Ellice) whether the Army Estimates upon the table contained all the sums which it was likely Government would require for the military purposes of the year, he answered, in the first place, "No," because there was a Vote that would have to be taken for the disembodied militia of upwards of £500,000; but if the right hon. Gentleman referred to any Supplementary Estimate, in addition to those before the House, he (Mr. Sidney Herbert), would guard himself first by saying that subsequent to the Estimates of last year two Supplementary Estimates were proposed; but he would say that the Government had no expectation of being called on to ask the House to vote any additional sums over and above those already before them. He agreed with the right hon. Gentleman that the Estimates were large enough in all conscience. He should have to explain that evening what were the causes of this great—he might almost say—lamentable increase; but regretting that increase as strongly as any one, he should shrink from his duty if he did not avow that these sums were necessary in the peculiar circumstances of the country, but he repeated that there was no intention of asking for any additional sum. It was true there were items for fortifications in the present Estimates of no very inconsiderable amount, but as the Commission on this subject had given in their Report it would become his duty as Secretary for War to form his opinion on the course best to be pursued; and if, having come to a conclusion as to what was necessary, he could persuade the Administration to adopt his plans, and they could obtain the assent of the House of Commons, well and good; but he repeated that they had laid on the table of the House the exact sum which they had reason to believe Parliament would be called on to vote for this year. With regard to the sum taken for China, it must be remembered that the Vote of credit asked was about £1,350,000, part of which would be applied in the present financial year, and the remainder be thrown upon the next.

CONSOLIDATION OF THE STATUTES.

QUESTION.

MR. COLLIER said, he wished to ask the Attorney General, Whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to take any measures for the consolidation of the whole of the Statute Law?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, at the close of the last Session the House had declined to continue the Statute Law Commission—a decision in which he was not unwilling to concur. He immediately, with the approbation of the Lord Chancellor, took steps for arranging a plan with a view to the consolidation of the statutes. He secured the services of three gentlemen—two of whom were to undertake the Civil, and one the Criminal Statute Law. In this latter work considerable progress had been made, and they were greatly indebted to the labours of the late Government, and especially to his right hon. Friend the Member for the University of Dublin. With regard to the Civil Law Statutes it appeared to him most desirable that, in the first place, they should ascertain with accuracy of what the Statute Law of England now consisted, and after some delay, he had been able to obtain the consent of the Government to the employment of two gentlemen, under the superintendence of the Lord Chancellor, who had been directed to form what might be called an index of the Statute Law as it stood; in this also considerable progress had been made, some of the labours of the old Statute Law Commission having been adopted. It was intended to bring into one comprehensive index all the statutes that had expired, become obsolete, or had been rescinded, partially or entirely. The result would be to reduce the statute-book to a very few volumes. He proposed, then, to have the statutes arranged in a general way, under particular heads, and he hoped to be able with the consent of the House, during the present Session, to pass a preliminary measure for the purpose of sweeping away from the statute-book all that, on an accurate examination, should turn out to be no longer part of the statute law. The gentlemen employed, under the superintendence of the Lord Chancellor and the law officers, were proceeding with an expurgated edition of the statutes. They would be arranged under convenient divisions, each statute printed so as to bear on the face of it, in foot-notes, evidence of the manner in which it was affected or operated upon by subsequent statutes not expressly repealed, and in that way he trusted, proceeding regularly from the present reign backward, he would be enabled, in a very short time, to lay before the House a reduced and expurgated edition of the statutes. The House must be aware that the very small staff placed at the command of the Lord Chancellor and the law officers would forbid the hope of any great expedition. The whole sum devoted to this great work was not to exceed £3,000 a year; the limited nature of the supply would therefore render it impossible to make as much progress as might otherwise be expected. With regard to the criminal law, matters were more fortunate, for more had been done with it. Probably the hon. and learned Member was aware that Bills consolidating the Criminal Law had already been brought into the other House of Parliament; they were laid on the table, and he durst say would, in a very short time, come down to the House of Commons. He trusted that the whole subject of the consolidation of the statutes would be committed to a Board. A Resolution in favour of that proposal had already passed the House. He had had the honour of submitting a plan for carrying that Resolution into effect, which was favourably considered. The consolidation of the statutes, after the expurgated edition was completed, would be very much facilitated; but he thought the consolidation should be committed to a Board composed of more members than the small number of gentlemen who were now able to give their time to it.

Mr. WHITESIDE said, the question of the hon. and learned Member for Plymouth was whether the whole statute law was about to be consolidated. He (Mr. Whiteside) thought if they began in that wholesale way they would get little done. It was much better to proceed gradually in the matter, taking the statutes that related to one branch of the law first, and when they had consolidated them to proceed seriatim until the whole work of consolidation was completed. It should also be recollected that the Board would have no power to change or ameliorate the law, and he wished to call the attention of the Attorney General to Bills for the Abolition of the Punishment of Death and the Consolidation of the Statute Law of England and Ireland, which had been laid before the late Government, and had met with their approval. These measures should be brought forward on the responsibility of the Government. It was decided by the late Government that the first subject for consolidation should be the criminal statute law, and after that the commercial and then the real property statute law; because if they got the criminal and commercial law and the laws relating to landed property consolidated, they would have that portion of the statute law simplified which concerned men in the ordinary affairs of life.

SMALL-POX IN LONDON.—QUESTION.

Mr. DARBY GRIFFITH said, he rose to call the attention of the Secretary of State for the Home Department to the recent increase of Small-Pox and to the liability of the propagation of infectious diseases by the use of Street Cabs in conveying such cases to Hospitals and other places, and to ask whether it would not be desirable that Government should introduce some legislative provision for the establishment of Carriages for the exclusive use of the sick, and for the prohibition of the employment of Street Cabs for the above purpose within the Metropolitan district. There could be no difficulty in finding the proper machinery for carrying out his suggestion. There were several Boards in London, any one of which might take charge of it—the Poor Law Board, the Police Commissioners, the Medical Department of the Privy Council, and the Metropolitan Board of Works. The parish of St. James had already a carriage appropriated to the conveyance of the sick to the hospital, and there was no difficulty in confining its use to that class. The carriage could always be horsed from the nearest stand—by hiring the cab and horse, and harnessing the horse to the sick carriage, leaving the cab in the proper charge—and the cabman could receive extra payment. To show how much small-pox was spreading, and how largely the conveyance of cases in street cabs tended to spread the infection, he might mention the case of a town within ten miles of London where a street cab had brought from the metropolis a person labouring under small-pox, and that single case had affected the whole town, so that the epidemic was raging in the whole locality. He would therefore ask the question that he had placed on the paper.

Mr. CLIVE said, he quite agreed with the hon. Gentleman as to the danger involved in the present practice. He had no doubt that it would be extremely easy to prohibit the carrying of sick persons in cabs. The difficulty would be in finding a substitute for those vehicles. It could hardly be expected that the Government should undertake the conveyance of all the sick persons in the kingdom. It would be quite possible for parishes to make provision for that purpose, but until some such arrangement were made it would be hardly right to suppress the existing mode of conveyance. The police authorities had, however, ordered some model cabs to be provided for the conveyance of such sick persons as were under their control.

RECORDS, &c., AT THE INDIA-HOUSE. QUESTION.

COLONEL SYKES said, he rose to ask the Secretary of State for India what foundation there is for a report that the business of the India Office is to be transferred to apartments in the Victoria Hotel, Westminster; that a portion of the manuscript Records at the India Office are to be destroyed; and that the Museum and Library are to be dispersed; and in case of their being any truth in the above report, to ask what arrangements are contemplated to enable the East India Company to conduct their affairs. It had been rumoured that apartments had been taken at the Victoria Hotel, Westminster, for the purpose of transferring the business of the India Office there for a term of three years, at a rental of £6,000 per annum. The idea of the Government of India being transferred to lodgings at an hotel seemed hardly consistent with its dignity, and that £6,000 a year was to be paid for these lodgings seemed odder still. But that was not all. Under the roof of the present India House were arranged a vast number of manuscript records, comprising 200,000 folio volumes, which had with great labour and pains been racked, indexed, and classified in so methodical a manner that any paper that was required might be obtained in less than five minutes. These documents had to be referred to every hour by the different departments, and the greatest inconvenience and confusion must obviously result if they were transferred to porary lodgings of the Government. India House there was also a museum comprising an epitome of India in all of climate, soil, minerals, raw arts, manufactures, social character and races; and there was not a turing town in the kingdom who take an interest in that collection. museum had been open to the public twice a week for only two years, yet it had been visited by 150,000 persons. It was, therefore, most that the collection should be gathered as a whole, and not broken up and dispersed in a variety of places. The British Museum could not exhibit all of its present treasures; and therefore, be no use in sending the contents of this Indian Museum deposited in the underground store of that overlooked institution. In the museum there was a library of manuscripts at the India House were consulted by learned men from all parts of Europe. No greater advantage could be conceived than the bringing up of such a collection. The question might also be raised whether these treasures were not the property of the East India Company, as they were acquired, not from territorial revenue, but from the Company's commerce. Moreover, the cost of their removal, the temporary accommodation to be obtained by the Government, presented a controversy as to the best style of architecture for our public offices, enormous as well as destructive, as the prospects of Indian finance decidedly brightened, there was no margin for unnecessary outlay. The Secretary for India was solely responsible to the House for the good Government of India in every department of it except in that of finance; but in that authority only ran concurrently with the Council; he trusted, therefore, the right hon. Baronet would be able to assure the House that the proposed change had been carefully considered. The gallant Member concluded by putting the question.

Mr. CRAWFORD said, he rose to express a hope that the rumour mentioned by the hon. and gallant Member was without foundation. In any new arrangement the Government ought to pay attention to the convenience of those persons engaged on business in the City who quent transactions to conduct with the Indian Department. It would be a great impediment to the operations of bankers, stockbrokers, and East India agents if they had to go to and from the West-end to manage their affairs.

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, he was not surprised that his hon. and gallant Friend who had long taken so great an interest in Indian matters had put this question to him. The House would, however, remember that the removal of the Indian Department to the West-end of the town was not now an open question. That removal had been decided upon long ago, and the only question at present was as to the time at which it should be carried into effect. The present arrangement led to great public inconvenience, on account of the time wasted in moving backwards and forwards, a distance of more than three miles, between Westminster and the India House. It was not a mere matter of personal but of public convenience, that the offices of the India Department should be near Downing Street; and he was sure the noble Lord who preceded him in office would confirm that statement. The benefit of the Indian Council would be entirely lost unless the Secretary of State was in constant communication with the members of it; and that could only be effected, during the sitting of Parliament, by removing it to the West-end. As it might be some time before the vexed question of style in regard to the new offices was settled and the buildings erected, a portion of the new Hotel in Victoria Street had been hired for the temporary accommodation of the Indian Department, which would probably be removed there in June. There was no intention, so far as he was aware, of dispersing the library. As to the East India Company, by June adequate accommodation would be provided for the discharge of the not very onerous duties they had to perform. The removal of the India Office might possibly cause some slight inconvenience to mercantile men at the east end of the town, but everything would be done to lessen that inconvenience as much as possible. A portion of the business of the Company, such as the transfer of India stock, might, he thought, be transferred to the Bank of England. With regard to the records, there was a very considerable number of them; in many instances there being not only duplicates and triplicates, but quadruplicates and quintriplicates of the same documents. Acting on the Report of a Committee he had appointed to examine them, he intended to destroy a large quantity of them having reference to ships of the East India Company, which were not of the slightest use. Those of any value the hon. and gallant Member might depend upon it would be preserved.

FOUNDLING CHILDREN IN IRELAND.

QUESTION.

MR. GREGORY said, he would beg to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland if it is the intention of the Government to bring in a Bill this Session which shall provide for the religious registration of foundling children, and if so, when it is likely to be introduced?

MR. CARDWELL said, that in conjunction with the Irish Poor Law Commissioners he had considered the present state of the law in Ireland on the subject referred to by the hon. Member, and he could not but admit that it was very unsatisfactory and required amendment. In bringing in the Poor Law and Medical Charities Act, however, which would occur at an early period, he should have a proposal to make to the House in regard to this matter.

FORGERY OF TRADE MARKS.

QUESTION.

MR. ROEBUCK said, he wished to call attention to the fact that the trade marks which our manufacturers placed upon their wares were fraudulently imitated by foreign manufacturers, who brought discredit upon British productions by passing off spurious and inferior articles as such. He understood that negotiations had been entered into with foreign Powers for the purpose of devising means to prevent the forgery of these trade marks, and he wished to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether any negotiations have been entered into, and if so, what was the state of them at the present moment?

MR. MALINS remarked, that the practice of forging trade marks was by no means confined to foreigners, and that no greater adepts in that practice were to be found than those in our own country.

THE COMMERCIAL TREATY WITH FRANCE.—QUESTION.

MR. STIRLING said, he rose to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs if he will make a statement to the House explaining why it is necessary or expedient that the fiscal arrangements between Great Britain and France, proposed in the Budget, should be made the subject of a Treaty, seeing that there exists no apparent constitutional obstacles to the adoption of those arrangements by the ordinary legislation of the two countries respectively; and whether any Correspondence bearing on this point exists between Her Majesty's Foreign Secretary and Earl Cowley and Mr. Cobden, or between any other official persons who took part in the late negotiations; and if such Correspondence can be laid upon the Table of the House? Until within the last few weeks it seemed to be generally admitted in that House that treaties of commerce formed part of an exploded system, which ought not to be revived. It was not expedient for this country, he had understood, to enter into such treaties, because it was almost hopeless to arrange our traffic in such a way that foreign States should not suppose we were bent only on some special advantage for ourselves, and because in the case of France the powerful Protectionist party in that country would say that their Government was bartering away the fruits of their toil and industry to give it to England. Such, at least, were the views expressed no later than last July by the noble Lord at the head of the Government (Viscount Palmerston) and the noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs (Lord John Russell). The words in which the noble Lords expressed themselves so strongly against commercial treaties were listened to with assent and approbation. They were called forth by a speech of the hon. Member for Birmingham, Mr. Bright, who seemed to advocate a commercial treaty with France. After the noble Lords had spoken, the hon. Member for Birmingham rose and explained that he was not an advocate of commercial treaties generally, that he had not advocated a commercial treaty on that occasion, that he had merely advised an independent repeal of the wine duties as likely to lead to good results, and that his opinions were strictly in accordance with those of his noble Friends. When they saw a Government, composed of and supported by statesmen who had done so much to disseminate the principle that commercial treaties were not desirable, acting in direct violation of the opinions they had expressed, he thought it right to ask why that which appeared to them to be wrong in July should appear to be right in December. He had endeavoured to make himself master of the question by listening to speeches and reading despatches which had been presented to the House. But neither in the Treaty itself nor in the very meagre correspondence between the noble Lord and the negotiators of the Treaty, nor in the elaborate and admirable speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, could he find the slightest allusion to this point. The only allusion, and it was a very passing one, was in the speech of the noble Lord at the head of the Government upon the Address. In that speech the noble Lord said that, in order to obtain such guarantees for the future as were essential (though in July the noble Lord thought that such guarantees ought never to be asked), owing to the peculiarity of the constitution of France, some form of convention was necessary. Having no other light to guide him, he went to the published constitution of France, but he confessed his researches had been wholly fruitless. He found by the constitution that all public measures proposed by the Emperor passed through a small Council of State nominated by himself, and then went down to the two Chambers. The Upper Chamber, or Senate, consisted of 150 members, all, except the cardinals, directly nominated by the Emperor himself, and, although they gave their services gratuitously, the Emperor had reserved power to endow any of them with a salary not exceeding 30,000 francs a year. Their sanction was required for every measure. The Second Chamber, or Corps Législatif, was elected by universal suffrage from a list of names supplied by the French Emperor. The most important function of that body was to discuss and vote on all measures laid before it, which were described as projects of law and questions of taxation. It was impossible, therefore, to see in the constitution of that country any reason why a reduction of duties might not have been made in France, as here, by the ordinary operation of legislation. The inferences to be drawn from that course not having being followed, and from recourse having been had to the extraordinary power which the Emperor undoubtedly possessed of making commercial treaties with the full force of law, were so obvious that he would not trouble the House by attempting to draw them, more especially as they were admirably drawn by the noble Lord the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs on the 21st of July last. As great interest was taken in the subject, he ventured to put the question to the noble Lord of which he had given notice, believing that if the noble Lord had a satisfactory explanation he would be happy to give it.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: With respect to the question of my hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield (Mr. Roebuck), I have to state that considerable pains have been taken in order to ascertain what can be done with respect to foreign trade marks. On reference to the Law Officers, it was found that the state of the law at present is very imperfect, and that no penalties attach for the forgery of trade marks in this country. It would therefore be obviously useless to ask foreign Powers to give our manufacturers protection in their country which we do not afford to their manufacturers in this. For this reason it has been thought necessary to frame a Bill, which will shortly be brought in by some member of the Government, to enact such punishment for forging trade marks as may be thought sufficient to prevent that offence. When that Bill has become law the Foreign Office will be able to negotiate with foreign Governments for the object which my hon. Friend has in view. With respect to the question of the hon. Gentleman who spoke last, I think he must see that it is a question of so large a nature that he can hardly expect me to answer him this evening. If he desired to put forward his remarks as arguments against a commercial treaty, it was in his option to do so. But I should be ill consulting the wishes of the House and the time which the House has to consider the Army Estimates if I allowed myself to be led into this discussion. I despair of convincing the hon. Gentleman, as he was not convinced by the arguments of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, but I promise him I will take a part in the discussion on Monday, when it appears the whole question of Protection and Free Trade is to be brought before us; and my argument with regard to treaties of commerce will be that when they delay Free Trade I shall be against them, but when they tend to promote and hasten the establishment of the principles of Free Trade I shall be in their favour. In fact, a treaty of commerce is but a means to an end. I was asked yesterday several questions relating to another important subject, to which attention has been very much directed—namely, the annexation of Savoy. I satisfied the questions which were put to me, but I think it right to add, for the information of the House, to the statement which I then made. Her Majesty's Ambassador in France, having addressed the Emperor on this subject, was assured that the Emperor of the French would not proceed to a final decision on this matter of Savoy without consulting the great Powers of Europe. The Emperor stated, moreover, that he should never think of annexing any part of Savoy unless the people of Savoy were desirous of that annexation. Our Ambassador afterwards was desired by the Emperor of the French to make this communication to Her Majesty's Government, and the same communication was subsequently repeated by M. Thouvenel, the Minister for Foreign Affairs in France. I do not know that I can state anything further on this subject, but it will appear from what I have stated that there must be further negotiations before any final decision be come to.

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, I am sorry to prolong a discussion of this kind, but the point on which I have to inquire is one of general and pressing interest, and cannot be postponed. It relates to the question to which the noble Lord has just adverted—the Treaty of Commerce. I believe I am only expressing the general feeling of the House when I say we want to know how the consideration of the Treaty with France will really be brought before the House. The House will recollect that in a former instance—in the case of the treaty of 1787—the minister, by command, brought down the treaty as the noble Lord (Lord J. Russell) did the other day, and immediately after gave notice that he would, on a certain day, move that it be taken into consideration. When that day arrived there was an exposition of the character of the treaty, and then the minister proceeded to move Resolutions which generally speaking embodied the articles. The House of Commons passed those Resolutions and addressed the Crown. The Resolutions were then sent to the House of Lords, which also passed them, and in a similar manner addressed the Crown. Both Houses having addressed the Crown, a gracious answer was received, and then the House of Commons proceeded, I think, to pass a Bill to carry the treaty into effect. I do not see, however, that the Government are now pursuing a similar course. It appears to me that if a similar course is not pursued the House of Commons will be deprived of its just privilege in a most important matter. The noble Lord, the Foreign Minister, has not given notice of his intention of calling on the House to consider the Treaty of Commerce, or to legislate for the purpose of carrying that treaty into effect. But on the contrary we hear that on Monday Resolutions in a Committee on the Customs' duties are to be moved by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. It may be said—and I beg that the House will observe this, for it is very important—that when you go into Committee on the Customs Acts you will be called upon to reduce duties the reduction of which is provided for in the Treaty, and that, therefore, the Resolutions for this reduction is a preliminary step in order to give the sanction of this House to that Treaty; but if the House consider they will find that the means of observation and of criticism by the line chalked out by the Government are very partial and limited. The House can only give an opinion on points in which the Customs' duties are involved. There are most important Articles in the Treaty which by this means will never come under the consideration of the House except in a form and at a time which will render it very inconvenient for the House to discuss them. Take, for instance, the 13th Article of the Treaty, which has excited so much attention in reference to the duty on coal. That will not come before us when we go into Committee on the Customs' duties, because there is no duty on coal, either on its export or its import. Sir, I think that the House of Commons ought not in the year 1860 to be put in a worse position than it was in the year 1787. Again, take the third Article of the Treaty. That is an Article of an important character, referring to the differential duties on shipping; but the House will have no opportunity of giving an opinion on that important Article by merely going into Committee on the Customs. What I would wish to know from the Government is,—what is the mode contemplated by the Government of enabling the House of Commons to give a full and constitutional consideration to this Commercial Treaty with France which is now placed on the table for our opinion—whether the noble Lord intends to pursue the same course in this instance as was pursued by Mr. Pitt in 1787?

MR. HORSMAN said, he was afraid that the House was being led into a most irregular course, which would before long involve it in great difficulty. There were certain preliminaries to going into Committee which ought not to be passed over. The noble Lord the Foreign Secretary seemed to have misapprehended the purport of the question of the hon. Member for Perthshire (Mr. Stirling.) The hon. Gentleman did not enter into the merits of the Treaty, but, after pointing out that we were about to make certain changes in our tariff which we could make without a treaty, and that the French Government were also about to make certain changes which their Legislative Chamber could make without a treaty, he went on to ask. "Why does the Government resort to a treaty to do that which they can do without a treaty?" Reciprocity treaties were an obsolete, antiquated, condemned mode of doing business, and by no Gentleman in the House had they been more strongly condemned than very recently by the two noble Lords the principal members of the Cabinet. The noble Lord said it was too much to expect from him to go into the question to-night, but it was not too much to expect from the Chancellor of the Exchequer that he should have gone into it the other night. The first thing the Government ought to have said was,—“Before we go to consider the details of the treaty we think it our duty to inform the House why we take such an exceptionable and objectionable course as to proceed by a treaty at all.” This treaty gave the foreigner the power of intruding himself into our internal legislation. By it we surrendered our legislative independence; we abandoned our commercial policy. [Murmurs of dissent.] Certainly he had always understood that the system of reciprocity and bartering for equivalents was what we gave up when free trade was adopted. At any rate, by the Treaty we abandoned the exclusive right of administering our own internal financial affairs, and what the Government ought to have said to the House was, “We ask you to take an exceptional and reactionary course, and it is our duty in the first instance to point out to you the overwhelming motive and necessity for it.” That ought to have been done before going to the consideration of the Budget. The point raised in addition by the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Disraeli) was still more important. By the 20th Article this Treaty was not to be valid unless the 11th Article received the assent of Parliament. It was not that the withholding the sanction of Parliament from the 11th Article was to make the 11th Article invalid, but the whole Treaty. Another objection also had struck him. He should much like to hear the opinion of the law officers of the Crown as to whether in the course pursued Her Majesty had not been advised by Her Ministers to exceed the power of Her prerogative. By this clause she fettered the future action of Parliament in a matter of taxation. She assumed legislative powers, and She declared that in time to come no duty should be levied on a particular article of export. That he believed to be a stretch of the prerogative of the Crown, and an unconstitutional usurpation of the powers of the Legislature. He hoped the Government would say first in what mode they proposed to ask the consent of Parliament to the Treaty; and next, whether, in this Article, by inadvertence, no doubt, Her Majesty had not been advised by Her Ministers to assume a power which by the constitution does not belong to Her. He did not press for an answer at that moment, but he should do so on the following Monday.

MR. AYRTON said, he thought the right hon. Gentleman opposite had done the House some service by the point which he had raised, because there was another important view of this Question which had not yet been noticed. By the suggested mode of proceeding what might be called the omissions in the Treaty could not be taken into consideration. How was the House to discuss such an important point as the liberty reserved to the French to keep on the duty on the export of raw silk to this country, while we engaged to levy no duty whatever on the manufactured goods exported from France to this country? There were other questions of omission which ought to be considered in connection with the Treaty, and some mode ought to be devised by which the whole policy of the Treaty might be brought before the House. An hon. Gentleman had given notice of a Motion with regard to the shipping interest; but the manner in which that notice had been framed was most inconvenient. The Question ought to be considered in connection with the whole policy of the Treaty. In looking at the Treaty the point to be considered was whether justice had been done to all the great interests of the country, and not whether it would redound to the benefit of one or two special interests. He hoped, therefore, that the Government would de-visé some means by which the opinion of the House could be distinctly pronounced on the policy of the Treaty as a whole. Before sitting down he wished to ask the Secretary to the Treasury a question in reference to the Budget. It was stated by the Chancellor of the Exchequer that the wine licenses would be granted to all keepers of eating-houses at certain rates. Now, as there was a large number of persons who had been licensed, and not eating-houses, he was anxious to know whether the keepers of those houses would be able to take out licences to sell wine, or whether it was intended to confine them to certain houses?

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he had early called attention to the very anomalous course pursued by the Government in this matter. He felt that it was a stretch of Her Majesty's prerogative to undertake that that House should be pledged for years to come in respect to taxation. However, he thought a more serious question would arise when the House went into Committee on the Customs' duties. It was impossible not to see that the free discussion of the subject was very much impeded by the language held by the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary, who told the House that he really could not say whether, if these duties were not repealed, that circumstance would be considered offensive by the Emperor of the French, or not—the position of the House was certainly most embarrassing. For if the House were not to accept the system of free imports in England and the system of protection in France dictated by the Treaty, we should be perpetually reminded that we were likely to do something disagreeable to the Power over the way. The most anomalous thing of all was, that Parliament was asked to legislate for both countries, and that if it sanctioned this Treaty it would sanction a system of protection in France for ten years. He was old-fashioned enough to agree with the majority of the people of France and of America that raising revenue by Customs' duties was a very good form of taxation; he never would condemn Customs' duties, merely because they incidentally encourage native industry; but whether France chooses to adhere to that system or not was her own affair—not, he ventured to think, that of the House of Commons. His duty was to represent English constituency, and on that ground he thanked the right hon. Gentleman (the Member for Bucks) for having pointed out the fact that this matter could not be fully and freely discussed by the proposed mode of procedure.

MR. LAING explained that if the Resolutions proposed by the Chancellor of the Exchequer were carried it would be competent for the occupier of any beer-shop by taking out a licence as an eating-house to obtain in addition a licence for selling wine. But it was right that he should state that a large number of representations on the subject of the Resolutions as to licences had been received, which would require a great deal of consideration and probably some modification would be introduced into those Resolutions, more especially as regarded police regulations and the hours of opening. He could only state at present that those modifications would be submitted to the House in a complete form, and that time would be given for their consideration before the House was asked to come to any decision whatever.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, he wished to remind the noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs that he had omitted to answer one question which had been addressed to him by the hon. Member for Perthshire (Mr. Stirling)—namely, whether any correspondence bearing upon the foreign Treaty existed between Her Majesty's Foreign Secretary and Earl Cowley and Mr. Cobden, or between any other official personages who took part in the late negotiations, and whether such correspondence would be laid on the table of the House?

LORD HARRY VANE said, he was anxious to express his hope that Her Majesty's Government would take into consideration the recommendation which had been made to them, and would take such a course as would enable the whole subject of the Treaty to be submitted to the deliberation of the House. According to the method originally proposed such unquestionably would not have been the case; and he hoped that the evening would not close without some distinct intimation of the course which the Government were prepared to adopt. Allusion had been made by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire to the course which had been pursued in 1786, and on a question of such importance he thought it would be inexpedient to depart from the precedent which had thus been established. He differed in opinion from the right hon. Member for Stroud, for he held that all taxation must proceed from, or at least, be suggested by, the Crown, and that the House had no right to go into Committee of Supply or to vote taxes without such a recommendation. The Government were correct in advising her Majesty to enter into a treaty, but it required the subsequent sanction of both Houses of Parliament. He did not think the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Horsman) would be able to sustain the position which he assumed. He would not detain them further than to state again that the Government ought to place before the House some definite course of proceeding.

MR. E. P. BOUVERIE said, he was most unwilling to address the House, but he thought it worthy of consideration whether the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire was sound or not. No one could for a moment doubt that it would be necessary for the House of Commons to pronounce their opinion, aye or no, upon the French Treaty; for it was expressly stated in the Treaty itself that its validity was conditional on its acceptance by the British Houses of Parliament. But the question really was as to the order in which they should proceed—whether they would consider the Treaty as a whole, and pronounce upon it either the approbation or disapprobation of the House, and subsequently pass to the consideration of domestic legislation with reference to it; or whether they would in the first instance enter upon domestic legislation, deciding the points which arose not with reference to France, but solely with regard to the interests of the people of this country; and having achieved this object, they would then proceed to consider whether the Treaty was sound or not. He apprehended that the fair and proper method for the House of Commons to pursue was to deliberate in the first instance on the changes which it was proposed to effect in certain duties in contemplation of the Treaty, and having decided, purely in accordance with British interests, whether the Government were right or wrong in having recommended these, they could then proceed to the consideration of the Treaty itself.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, that while agreeing with the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Bouverie), that it was of the utmost importance that the two questions to which he had referred should be discussed separately and distinctly he could not believe that the mode which the right hon. Gentleman had proposed was the convenient or even the constitutional course. Certainly, if he were right, Mr. Pitt was wrong; and with all respect, he must say that on such a point he would prefer the authority of the elder statesman. The right hon. Gentleman seemed to have misapprehended the answer given by the noble Lord to the question so well put by the hon. Member for Perthshire, and which was, in fact, a reply to some question which had occurred to his own mind, and which had never been put. The noble Lord (Lord John Russell) stated distinctly that it was his intention on Monday next, upon the question that Mr. Speaker do leave the Chair, to go into the whole question of the French Treaty, and to vindicate the whole of its contents. Surely, then, it was necessary for those who dissented from such a course of proceeding to make their remonstrances at once, and to say—as he was happy to have heard it said on both sides of the House—that such was not the proper and constitutional method of proceeding. He now understood from the cheers which the noble Lord had given to two or three hon. Gentlemen that he was not prepared to vindicate the Treaty on Monday next, but proposed that a separate occasion should be afforded to the House, in order that, in the proper and legitimate discharge of its duties, it should be able to express a deliberate opinion, aye or no, on the provisions of that Treaty. He must again thank his hon. Friend the Member for Perthshire for bringing forward this important question; and he begged to say that to that question Her Majesty's Government had not attempted to give the shadow of an answer.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, that the noble Lord opposite (Lord J. Manners) had no doubt unintentionally misrepresented him altogether. He had understood the hon. Member for Perthshire (Mr. Stirling) to ask why it was that when both countries by their legislative bodies, could have instituted changes in the duties which they relatively imposed, the Government had chosen to proceed by way of Commercial Treaty; and he replied, that when the debate was raised on Monday upon this whole question he would give the reasons why in this instance Her Majesty's Ministers had thought it advisable to enter into a Commercial Treaty. He did not say, as had been represented by the noble Lord opposite, that on that occasion he would be prepared to enter into the details of that commercial treaty. He would now give to one part of the general question an answer, which possibly he had before omitted to do—namely, that no such correspondence as had been referred to existed at the Foreign Office.

MR. HARDY said, with a view of showing how completely and inseparably the Government had mixed up the Budget and the Commercial Treaty, he would with permission read a passage from a letter written by the noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs (Lord J. Russell) to Earl Cowley and Mr. Cobden. It was as follows:—

“The effect of your instructions will be to place at your disposal a large sum belonging to the revenue from Customs, to be employed in removing, in most cases, wholly, and in all cases to a considerable extent, the charge of Customs' duty from very important productions of France. These productions are not in general articles of primary necessity, or of such universal use among the people of the United Kingdom as to entitle them on those grounds to the first attention of the Government. They are selected, then, for relief, in part indeed upon commercial grounds, but in part also because of the collateral effects which we anticipate from the conclusion of the Treaty.”

If the House were to act in the manner that the Government now called on them to do—in an independent way and for the interests of England alone—they ought in the first instance to enter on the consideration of the Treaty, and afterwards to take up the discussion on the Budget.

Motion agreed to.

House at rising to adjourn till Monday next.

On Motion that Mr. Speaker do leave the Chair, for the House to go into Committee of Supply, VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Sir, I take advantage of this Motion to answer the inquiry of the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Disraeli). It must be obvious to anybody who has read the Treaty, or to any one who reflects on the constitutional principle, that it is essential that the opinion of Parliament should be taken on the Treaty as a compact between the two countries. The only question is as to the order by which our proceedings should be governed. Now, I humbly think—considering that the Treaty involves a considerable number of changes in our Customs' regulations,—that if we had come down to the House, and at once and before any other proceeding had proposed a general Vote sanctioning the whole Treaty as it stands, we should have been met with the natural objection—“You call on us by one vote to give an opinion on a matter involving a great number of details ; you are not dealing fairly with Parliament. Let us go through the whole matter point by point and step by step, and when we have arrived at a conclusion on all the separate parts, then give us an opportunity of expressing an opinion on the national engagement as a whole between the two countries." That, Sir, I apprehend, was the course pursued by Mr. Pitt ; that is the course we mean to pursue. We intend to take the sense of Parliament on the different matters dependent on that Treaty, in combination also with changes made on separate grounds in our other Customs and fiscal regulations. But undoubtedly it will be our duty—a duty from which we have no intention of shrinking—to give to the two Houses of Parliament an opportunity of stating their opinions plainly and directly—aye or no—in approbation or disapprobation of the Treaty. It will be our duty to give notice of the time most expedient for the public interest to take the discussion, and the House may be assured we have no intention of shrinking from that duty. My noble Friend has deprecated the premature discussion of the Treaty, and with all submission I must say, when the House is assembled to discuss the Army Estimates it is inconvenient to employ the time of the House in discussing a treaty which will probably be a subject of debate in the ensuing week. My noble Friend has been interrogated by several hon. Gentlemen after the time when the forms of the House permit him to be catechized ; and I believe I myself am now in some degree departing from those forms in giving the information asked by the right hon. Gentleman.

MR. DISRAELI : The House will permit me to say that I have not yet received any answer from the noble Lord to the question I put to him. No Member of the House will suppose for a moment that this Treaty is to be carried into effect without the House having an opportunity of giving its sanction to it ; but the question to which I wish to call the attention of the House is the mode and manner in which it shall receive that sanction. I understand from the noble Lord that the question whether the Treaty will be approved of by the House will be brought before us ; but what I maintain is that it ought to be brought before us in the mode in which the Treaty of 1787 was brought before it by Mr. Pitt, so that upon each Article of the Treaty the House should have an opportunity of expressing its opinion. I do not agree to the conclusion at which the noble Lord has arrived as to the propriety of the course settled by the Government, because the House will have the opportunity of parting with a considerable portion of the revenue of the country, and afterwards have the opportunity of rejecting that Treaty on the hypothesis of passing which the destruction of the revenue was founded. I quite agree that nothing can be more proper than that we should have the subject, prefaced by a financial statement embracing the project of the Government with respect to the Commercial Treaty with France the financial prospects of the present year, and the policy of the Government so far as that policy is acted on by internal and external necessity ; but it does not follow that because we have had such a statement we should immediately go into Committee upon the Customs Act. The House will remember that in 1787 the Prime Minister was also Chancellor of the Exchequer. When he moved that the Treaty should be taken into consideration he first of all gave a full exposition of the financial policy of the Government. The next step taken was to call upon the House to take the Treaty into consideration, thus giving the House an opportunity of expressing its opinion upon every Article of the Treaty. That, in my mind, was the proper and constitutional course ; nor do I believe that any other course will be satisfactory to the country.

THE MILITIA.—QUESTION.

MR. PALK said, that in calling the attention of the House to the great expense incurred in raising and training a Regiment of Militia so as to make it fit for permanent duty, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for War what arrangements he contemplates to fill up the vacancy in the numbers of the Army that will be occasioned by the disembodiment of the Militia Regiments? This was a question of great importance, especially at the present moment, when the affairs of foreign nations were in a state of great derangement, and nobody knew how soon our Militia might be required. Great as the talk about the power of England was, it should be remembered that the policy which one ministry pursued might be immediately reversed by the succeeding ministry, and they had no large standing army to carry into immediate effect the policy of the Government. A short time ago the country was frightened out of its propriety by a fear of invasion, and there were Volunteer Corps, Rifle Corps, and Artillery Corps raised all throughout the country. In addition to this they had the Militia—a force raised and commanded by the gentry of the country, who organized and drilled those regiments at great expense and inconvenience. When they were drilled, however, they were acknowledged to be a force that could be in every way depended upon, and if, instead of disembodimenting that force, as he regretted to hear was intended, they were to reorganize and put it on a permanent footing, it would form a reserve from which they might enlarge their army at any time by whole regiments and battalions. The Militia force was a force no Government ought to hastily get rid of. Was there anything in the state of foreign affairs which justified them in disbanding 12,000 of the Militia force they had in order to replace them by regiments coming home from India? If, when those regiments came home, they found their depôts in a perfect state of efficiency, there might be no objection to such a course: but no regiment coming home from abroad was in so perfect a state of discipline as the Militia. He would much rather keep up an embodied Militia as a permanent reserve, for the purpose of garrisoning the fortified places existing, and those which he hoped to see erected, than see the force disbanded, and their place supplied with troops coming home from India. If the Government would confine themselves in ordinary times, when there was no fear of an invasion, to a force of 10,000 men, enrolling them for five years' service these men would be glad after that period to enter into the line, and would prove a most valuable and experienced force. In this way they would avoid the objectionable practice of calling out a very large body of the Militia at once. It was generally supposed that the agricultural labourer was only required for getting in the harvest, but he was equally required for other purposes, such as draining, ploughing, and the hay harvest. If they had a permanent force of 10,000 Militia, the injury to agricultural interests, inflicted by the sudden calling out of the Militia, would be avoided. To what extent was the reduction to be carried? The Estimates gave the House no information upon the subject. No doubt the right hon. Gentleman would explain that, but he must excuse him for calling his attention to the matter. However peaceable might be our relations with France every minutiae with regard to our army was deeply studied in that country. He would also refer the House to a statement of the accoutrements with which a French marine was furnished, as appeared on the occasion of a visit by Admiral Desforres to the fleet at Toulon. Amongst the rest each man was provided with a six-barrelled revolver, a hatchet, and grappling-iron. The Commercial Treaty did not seem to be going quite so smoothly as Government had perhaps at first supposed. It had been said in that House that the Government were so sanguine they should be able to pass this measure, and that it would re-unite the bonds of peace so strongly, that they had not thought it necessary to consider what the effect of its rejection would be on the minds of the French Emperor and the French people. That, however, was a most important ingredient in the case. The French people were not so accustomed to the inconsistencies of our Legislature as we were, and he thought it extremely possible that if the Treaty were not adopted by that House some feeling of irritation would be created in their minds. Entertaining that opinion, he thought it would be most dangerous and ill-advised to disembody one single regiment until this matter were settled. It would be most unwise to do anything that should diminish the defences of the country. Whatever the number of regiments to return from India, he should, at the present juncture, welcome their approach with the greatest satisfaction. Even with them, with the Militia, and all the volunteers that could be raised, there would not be a man too many. When a Ministry had difficult negotiations on hand, or a difficult policy to follow, the best force he could have was a large army well appointed.

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON said, he rose to express a hope that the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War would, in the statement he was about to make to the House, give them some information as to the intentions of the Government with regard to the militia. It was very important both to the country and to the army that they should have a large force of militia, whether embodied or disembodied; but he was afraid it would be found, when the Return of the hon. Member for Middlesex was produced, that the number of the militia bore a very small proportion to the nominal amount voted by Parliament. The number of absentees on the books of regiments had been found to be increasing at every annual training, and the force now available, in all probability, was not over 60 per cent of the Parliamentary Vote. He did not speak without a knowledge of the subject. In the militia regiment he had the honour to command there had been for two or three years an accumulation of absenteeism most annoying to officers and prejudicial to the public service. Had the War Office permitted them to strike off the absentees from that regiment two years ago, there would have been no difficulty in filling up the numbers. During the last two years there were but few fresh absentees, but they were cumbered with the names of those who were nominally members since the conclusion of the Crimean war, but had long since enlisted fraudulently in regiments of the line. The object of these fraudulent enlistments was to obtain the full bounty and allowance given to a recruit who was not a militiaman. In his opinion they would never be stopped until the difference in the allowances of a militiaman and a civilian entering the army was put an end to. He quite appreciated the motives of the Government in not striking off the names from the roll, because it would be impossible to avoid declaring the number of fraudulent enlistments. He hoped the Government would adopt such a course of calling out the militia regiments in turn as would at once prevent their training being a loss to agricultural labour, and at the same time retain for us a valuable body of men accustomed for years to military training. He did not wish to say one word which might be construed into speaking disrespectfully of the Volunteer Corps who had so gallantly come forward to enrol themselves in the service of their country; but he could not help drawing the attention of the Government to the fact that while they must always depend upon patriotic impulse for the volunteers, they had in the militia the old constitutional force of the country, from which they could at any time largely recruit their army.

COLONEL DICKSON observed, that he was glad the subject had been brought forward, although he had not met with the support his Motion deserved when he introduced it. They had been on the previous night entertained with a graphic description of certain militia regiments. He did not mean to say that they were composed of the very best materials, because it was well known that the great mass of the militia were raised from the lowest dregs of society. He was not ashamed of that, because the fault lay with the rules of their military organization, which deterred any but the lowest classes from entering it. On the contrary, without taking any undue credit to themselves as officers for the discipline and treatment of the militia, when he considered the nature of the material upon which they operated, he thought that they ought to feel proud at the improvement which they had effected in the private character of the men themselves, as well as at the efficiency of the force. He did not object to the disembodiment of regiments which had been long embodied, but he deprecated any general disembodiment, or rather he objected to its being carried out in such a harsh and unfeeling manner. The case of the junior officers of militia thrown destitute on the world was a very hard one; and it was to be regretted that the Secretary of State for War should have met their claims the other night with the simple remark that he thought these young men had derived great advantage from having been two or three years in the service. The promises held out to them had been deliberately broken, and certainly their prospects had not been improved by their two or three years' militia experience. Then as to the injury to the public: he believed the French and other nations were as anxious to avoid hostilities as ourselves; but, from the questions constantly put in that house, it was clear there was a lurking suspicion in the public mind that the political horizon was not so clear as had been supposed. The Estimates to be asked for by the right hon. Gentleman reached £14,800,000, and with the Supplementary Estimates which would have to be considered, the total expense would reach nearly £15,500,000; and yet the whole number of disposable men of all ranks, exclusive of those in India, was only 143,000. Under those circumstances to disembody a large number of well-trained militia regiments was most unadvisable. There was a Vote of £300,000 for the embodied, and of £500,000 for the disembodied militia. How was that money to be spent? He believed that no Member in the House understood the way in which those Estimates were made up. The expense of the disembodied militia would not much exceed £150,000, which would leave £650,000 for the service of the embodied militia and for the training of the disembodied regiments. But he maintained that that training was thrown away. If we were to have a militia, it ought to be kept in a state in which, should its services be called upon at any moment, it would be found perfectly efficient. A certain number of the regiments should always be embodied, even though the embodiment of each regiment should last only for a short time. Then we might rely upon having, for every regiment that was embodied, six or seven others that would be ready in case of need. In short, he would ask, was the militia to be a service, or was it not? Were the officers to keep their regiments in order, though they were never likely to be wanted? or was the force to be treated as one to which they might be proud to belong? At least, let the militia not be disembodied without some slight recognition of the services of its deserving young officers.

SOLDIERS' BELTS AND BUCKLES.
QUESTION.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, he rose, pursuant to notice, to call the attention of the House to the use which soldiers off duty are in the habit of making of their belts and buckles, which has been found by experience to be injurious to the safety of the public; and to ask the Secretary of State for War, Whether it is essential to any Military duty that soldiers off duty should wear equipments which are only necessary to support side-arms, the wearing of which has been long dispensed with on such occasions; and whether, therefore, the consideration of the public safety may not, in the absence of any military necessity, reasonably induce the military authorities to discontinue the practice of allowing soldiers to wear such belts and buckles when off duty; and to move an Address for Copy of any Correspondence or Return that may have occurred between the Police and the Military authorities on the use which soldiers off duty are in the habit of making of their belts and buckles? He wished to express a hope that this matter would receive the attention of the Government. Soldiers were pre-eminently the creatures of impulse, and the slightest relaxation of the rules of the service was injurious at all times. They ought in that respect to be treated as children, and be prevented from doing harm. One of the chief difficulties which the great Duke experienced was to restrain his troops from plundering, marauding, and excesses of that character. Like too many others of their countrymen, their predominant idea of recreation was getting drunk in low public-houses, and when intoxicated they were often led into acts of violence towards that community whom it was their special business to protect. The way in which they sometimes used their belts upon unoffending civilians had called forth the animadversion of the metropolitan police magistrates. It had been said, indeed, in answer to such complaints, that accidents would happen even in the best-regulated families, and that there was no reason why soldiers when off duty should not be allowed to wear these ornaments. If, however, they were to be indulged in such amusements with their heavy buckles and belts—in the use of which, by the way, practice was making them far too perfect—the same logic would require the authorities to restore them their side-arms, which had been taken from them on account of the dangerous nature of the diversions in which they had been employed. Indeed, the tunic belt was fast becoming a formidable substitute for the side-arm; and a severe blow could easily be dealt with that weapon by an expert hand which it would be extremely difficult to parry. It had from this reason the effect of intimidating the police, and thus was a serious injury to the public peace. In a case recently tried at Westminster Sessions, Mr. Bodkin, the assistant Judge, had remarked that soldiers' belts were weapons of a very dangerous description, and sentenced the offenders to a long term of imprisonment. In the neighbourhood of the Tower these outrages were less frequent, and the reason appeared to be that the soldiers, when they got leave from the Tower Barracks, betook themselves to the West-end, to the purlieus of St. Giles's or Westminster. It was remarkable that the soldiers of the Life Guards or the Blues were never found amongst those offenders—they were entirely confined to the Foot Guards. A writer in the newspapers, who signed himself "Old Practical," recommended that every man guilty of such an offence should be handed over to the tender mercies of his comrades, and made to run the gauntlet of their buckles. But why had the military authorities themselves hitherto shown no disposition to put down the practice? Recently, a sergeant had told a magistrate that a man who had been guilty of an outrage of this kind would be deprived of his belt for a year. Very well; but did not that show that the man would be just as well, when off duty, without his belt? If this matter were to be left entirely to the discretion of the officers, why not exempt the soldiers from responsibility to the civil law in every other respect, and allow them to conduct themselves in the streets as they thought proper. He imputed no blame to the military authorities, but brought forward the subject in the hope that effective measures might be taken for the prevention of an evil which prevailed to a considerable extent.

GENERAL UPTON said, he could not but express regret at the number of cases which had occurred of soldiers assaulting people with their belts. It was a great distress and disgrace, however, to a well-conducted soldier to be deprived of his belt; and he thought that the remarks of the public press upon this subject, coupled with the efforts of the officers would have the effect of preventing the recurrence of the outrages complained of. When they considered the number of the Guards quartered in the metropolis, and the small number of the offences charged, he thought it would be a hard thing to punish the many by discontinuing the permission to wear their belts and buckles off duty. He felt sure that if the matter was left in the hands of the Commander-in-Chief and the officers of the Guards, there would be very little occasion for the repetition of severe remarks.

CAPTAIN ANNESLEY observed, that in his opinion these offences were by no means more numerous among the Guards than among the men of other regiments. The reason why so much was said about the misdeeds of the Guards was that in the metropolis when one of them went out at night, got drunk, and did any mischief, he was brought up before the magistrates the next morning, and the whole story appeared in The Times. People read it and talked about it, and so the Guards got a bad name, whereas in a garrison town similar escapades might happen and never be heard anything of. It was hardly fair to represent the Guards as the black sheep of the service, for the truth was these assaults happened just as often in provincial towns as in the metropolis. He thought it would be going too far to take away the belts of the whole army because a few soldiers had misconducted themselves; and, besides, if that were done, a commanding officer would lose that means of punishing a man. At present if a man misconducted himself his belt was taken away, which was a marked punishment, and he should like to hear what better punishment could be substituted. There were more than 6,000 of the Guards, and the number of offences which had been complained of among them during the last two years had not reached thirty. The highest number in any battalion being sixteen only in a year, while in the others the numbers were as low as five, six, four, and three per annum, and in one none at all.

THE CHINA EXPEDITION. QUESTION.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, he wished to ask Her Majesty's Government if any estimate has been made of the expenses of the war with China, because nothing had so mischievous an effect on the purse of the country as wars in the East. The Affghan war cost from £15,000,000 to £18,000,000, and the Burmese war £3,000,000? He wished to know, also, whether any portion of the expense will fall on the Indian Revenue; and, out of what funds will the expense of transporting the Troops from India to China be defrayed?

SIR DE LACY EVANS said, the question of the hon. Baronet was of great importance. It was quite obvious that the sum of £500,000 referred to by the Chancellor of the Exchequer in his speech on Friday last would be quite inadequate to meet the costly preparations now being made for hostilities in China. He would venture to express his opinion that no glory could be obtained from a war with the Chinese. He lamented that it had been entered upon at all, and he attributed it to the injudicious selection of high officials. He understood that 20,000 British troops were to be sent, together with the siege artillery, and an immense bulk of stores. The cost of transport alone for so great a distance must be immense, and he therefore deemed the hon. Baronet quite justified in demanding an explicit and rational statement from the Government as to what would be the probable expense of this enormous expedition.

GENERAL PEEL said, he also wished for some explanation of the proposed expenditure of the China war. He understood the Chancellor of the Exchequer to have deducted from the revenue of this year £500,000 towards the expenses of the China war. He wished to know whether all the regiments to be sent from India to China had been already transferred to the home establishment, and how the Native Indian troops were to be paid. The Estimates now before the House were for £14,800,000. The Chancellor of the Exchequer in his statement estimated the Army and Navy Estimates at £15,800,000—the increase of £1,000,000 being £500,000 for the Chinese war, and £500,000 for the excess of expenditure over Army Votes for the year 1859-60. The £500,000 would not cover the expenditure already incurred in the Chinese war, and he should like to know whether the other £500,000 would be sufficient to meet the excess of expenditure, because, if there must be a Supplemental Estimate, the whole Budget would be upset. He had not the least idea that he exceeded his Estimate of 1858-59 by a single shilling, and yet he found it necessary to introduce a Supplemental Estimate. If that was the case in a year when there was no extraordinary expenditure, what must be the case when they were sending out so large a force to so distant a place as China? He never could understand how the men of the Native army who had been in China for the last two years had been paid. He had never made any provision for them. Nevertheless those men were sent out by the Governor General with the authority of the War Office. If then they had not been paid by the late Government, there must be a heavy charge in some shape or another upon the Indian Government which would come upon this country to repay the money. He also wished to know whether an agreement had been made with the Indian Government that the 22,000 men now sent to China, but who were chargeable on their establishment should not come on the home establishment during any portion of the coming financial year. If not, every one of those men when sent home would be an excess in the number of men actually voted.

EXPORT OF COAL.—QUESTION.

COLONEL PERCY HERBERT said, he rose to ask for an explanation of the 11th Article of the Treaty of Commerce with France, which engaged Her Majesty not to prohibit the exportation of coal. The Article was framed with great simplicity of language, but evidently without any consideration of the possible contingency of war. It might be very suitable in their new Plenipotentiary, but those who did not believe in the immediate approach of the millennium might be allowed to object to it. The terms of the Article betrayed great carelessness on the part of the negotiators, and a certain amount of blame was also to be imputed to the Foreign Secretary who had ratified the Treaty. Still, as everybody knew that negotiation was not the forte of the noble Lord, some blame must also lie at the door of the noble Viscount at the head of the Government for not exercising that superintendence over his Foreign Secretary which the interests of the country demanded. Probably, for the sake of keeping peace in the Cabinet, the noble Viscount had allowed his Foreign Secretary more licence than was permitted to himself in a former Cabinet, when the situations of the two noble Lords were reversed. This Article, as he read it, bound us, even in the event of war being imminent with the French, to permit them, up to the very day of war being declared, to export as much coal as they wished for the purpose of making war against us. If we were at war with any other nation this Article bound us to allow France to take as much coal as she pleased from any of our ports and dispose of it as she pleased to the other belligerent. And in the event of war between France and any other country we were bound not to use our neutral rights, but to permit the export of coal to go on, so that our colliers might run the risk of being captured by the cruisers of either belligerent, and we should have to submit to the insult or be dragged volentes volentes into the war. He hoped the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary would give the House his interpretation of the Article at once, and not delay it until his speech on the Budget, when so many questions, political, commercial, and financial, would have to be discussed that the insignificant question of our national defences might be forgotten, perhaps, altogether. If the noble Lord did not give any explanation, or if the explanation were unsatisfactory, he should feel it his duty to submit a Resolution on the subject.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: The objection taken by the hon. Gentleman to a certain part of the Commercial Treaty does not refer to commercial interests or trade regulations, but to its effect on our political relations with France. I believe that that Article, which has certainly met with a great deal of comment, was inserted in the Treaty without any political view. Our negotiators took no political view of the question, and the French Government have declared—indeed I feel assured—that they had no political view in agreeing to it. The hon. Gentleman, perhaps, is not aware that it is our general policy not to impose export duties. On this particular article Sir R. Peel proposed an export duty, in which I supported him, and it met with the concurrence of this House, but it excited such great discontent in the country, as being opposed to the principles of trade, that in the following year he remitted it. Our general policy, therefore, is in favour of not imposing export duties and not preventing the export of coal. The hon. Gentleman, I suppose, would wish to have a power reserved of prohibiting the export of coal to France, either while it is exported to other countries, or else a general prohibition. But a general prohibition would be opposed to the interests of a large number of our countrymen; and the export of coal increases so much from year to year that no Minister would be able to carry such a proposition. Well, if you cannot have a general prohibition, to make a special prohibition in the case of France might be held of itself to be a symptom of hostile relations with that country—an indication of your intention to go to war before any long time; and you would give France the right of asking what your intentions were, and whether you meant to go to war with her or not. In fact, apart from all questions of the Treaty, you could hardly venture on such a measure unless you meant to place yourselves in a hostile position towards France. But the hon. Gentleman will say that if that is the general policy of this country it is still unnecessary to make your exports a subject of treaty. But, perhaps, he is not aware that stipulations with regard to exports do not first appear in this Treaty which he says Earl Cowley and Mr. Cobden have negotiated without sufficient attention and which I have too carelessly ratified. A treaty was concluded not long ago with Russia under the direction of the Earl of Malmesbury, by an Article in which we agree not to forbid exports of any particular article to Russia unless we also forbid them to all other countries. Coal comes under that provision, and therefore we have already existing an agreement with Russia, sanctioned by the Earl of Malmesbury, not to prohibit the export of coal unless we prohibit it to all other countries. And yet we are quite as likely to go to war with Russia as with France. For the last forty-five years we have not been in a state of hostility with France, but we have been with Russia. But even if there were no 11th Article in the Treaty, by the "most favoured nation clause" we should be compelled, while we allowed the export of coal to the United States, Spain, or any other country, not to prohibit its export to France. We should have to choose between stopping the trade altogether or permitting it to France as well as to all other countries. This being the state of the case I think it is quite a delusion to attach any great importance to this article. It is an article in favour of a branch of our export trade which is of great importance, and which it is our interest to continue; and I cannot see that the Treaty in the least affects any practical interests. The hon. Gentleman says we may some day be on the brink of war with France, and what would happen then? No doubt, in the present state of steam navigation coal is an article of great importance in war; but there is another article which has lately become of much more importance—rifled ordnance. We were informed in the course of the autumn that very considerable orders had been received in this country for rifled cannon. How absurd it would be to allow rifled cannon to go into France at the moment we were prohibiting the exportation of coal to the same country! The fact is that when we come to a state of approaching hostilities there will be an end of commercial treaties, and we shall unquestionably take whatever measures we may deem necessary for our own security. In 1793 complaint was made that the Treaty of 1786, which has been mentioned to-night, was violated by the British Government in prohibiting the exportation of wheat. What was the answer made to that complaint? Mr. Dundas said, "I am perfectly aware of everything you say, but we were about to go to war. My object was to distress the Power which was likely to be our enemy, and, therefore, I prohibited the exportation of wheat as a measure of defence." So, in like manner, the present Treaty is intended for a time of peace. The hon. Gentleman may not value peace. [Cries of "Oh, oh!"] I have no wish to use any harsh expression, but the hon. Gentleman seemed to think himself at liberty to cast reflections upon me. The object of the present Treaty, I repeat, is to maintain relations of commerce while we are at peace with France. If, unforunately, we should ever approach the brink of war we shall take measures to protect ourselves, and the 11th Article of the Treaty will assuredly not prevent our doing so, any more than the treaty made with Russia last year would prevent our prohibiting the exportation of contraband of war and warlike munitions to Russia in the event of an impending war with that country. Such is my answer to the hon. Gentleman. I believe that the 11th Article of the Treaty has no such importance as he supposes. It was not considered when the Treaty was negotiated to have that bearing which is now attempted to be given to it. The same obligations would be imposed by the article relating to the most favoured nations, and therefore the objections of the hon. Gentleman are entirely destitute of force.

SIR HUGH CAIRNS : The importance of the subject now under discussion cannot, I think, be overrated. The noble Lord has, I venture to state, entirely misapprehended the question. There is no controversy, I apprehend, on either side of the House, as to the policy of export duties. I have not heard any person say he hoped the time would come when an export duty, even on the article of coal, would be a desirable duty. The question before us is an infinitely more serious one than the comparatively trifling question of export duties. What are the powers at present possessed by the Executive Government with respect to the exportation of coal? They are defined by Act of Parliament; they have been conferred upon the Crown by an Act of the Imperial Legislature, and no later than 1853, when many noble Lords and right hon. Gentlemen opposite were themselves in office, they were given in these words :—

“ The following goods may, by proclamation or order in Council, be prohibited either to be exported or carried coastwise :—Arms, ammunition, gunpowder, military and naval stores, and any articles which Her Majesty may judge capable of being converted into or made useful in increasing the quantity of military or naval stores or provisions.”

There is here, therefore, a power granted to the Crown by Parliament, on any emergency of the State, of prohibiting the exportation to any place, or to all places, of anything which can be converted into military or naval stores. Of course coal is, above all other things, the article now which can not only be converted into naval stores, but without which any other naval store would be comparatively immaterial and useless. I apprehend that, as a matter of constitutional law, there can be no doubt that the power thus committed to the Crown to be exercised for the benefit of the State is a power which it is not in the right of any British Minister or Government to advise the Crown to surrender or part with for either ten years or the space of one year. I mean, of course, without the consent of that Parliament which has bestowed the power. But the noble Lord says, “ You are talking about war with France. In the first place, we do not expect to go to war with France; and, in the next, if we did, we should put an end to the Treaty altogether.” The noble Lord adds, moreover, that we could not prohibit the exportation of coal to France without prohibiting it to all other countries. But the question is not war with France—it is war with any country on the face of the globe. Here is a power given to the Crown to be exercised by the responsible advisers of the Crown, in the event of war either actually declared or imminent, with any country in the world, to prohibit at once by proclamation or order in Council the exportation of coal to the whole universe. What then will be the consequence of the 11th Article of the Treaty? It is not an Article by which the Crown engages not to prohibit the exportation of coal to France, but an Article by which the two high contracting Powers engage not to prohibit the exportation of coal to any place whatever. If the Treaty obtains the assent which it requires, the consequence will be that the power of the Crown to prohibit the exportation of coal to any country whatever will be terminated. We do not desire to put even hypothetically the case of the country being at war, but let us so far do violence to our feelings as to suppose that we were at war with Russia or the United States. What is the power which the Government at present possess? The Minister of the day can advise the Crown, by order in Council, to prohibit the exportation of coal to any country in the world. But now we are asked to come under an obligation with one country—namely, with France—by which we should tie our hands with respect to the power we already possess as regards every country on the face of the earth. The noble Lord has cited the treaty with Russia. What does that treaty say, according to the statement of the noble Lord himself? I understand from him—for I have not had time to refer to the treaty—that there is a clause by which we engage not to prohibit the exportation of coal to Russia without prohibiting it at the same time to all the world. I believe that is a reasonable clause, and one which does not interfere with the general power of the Crown. All the Crown has to do in consequence of the Russian treaty is to exercise the power which it already possesses of prohibiting the exportation of coal entirely. No one can suppose that any Government would be so foolish as to frame an order in Council which, upon the ground that we wanted to prevent America being supplied with our coal, should merely prohibit its exportation to that country. The exportation would be prohibited to all the world, and that is the power which the Crown possesses at present. Exclude one country from the prohibition, and the whole world will be able to obtain coal. Here, then, is a question deserving the serious consideration of Parliament. The present is not a fitting opportunity for discussing it fully, but I want some information from the noble Lord. We are asked to go into Committee upon Monday next with the view of repealing the wine and spirit duties, and duties on manufactured goods, under the Treaty with France. The Resolutions which have been prepared expressly state that it is in consequence of the Treaty we are asked to repeal those duties. Suppose the House agrees to the propositions of the Government, I presume the consent of Parliament is to be taken in some shape or other to the 11th Article of the Treaty. I do not believe that any Minister can be found who would advise the Crown to surrender a power conferred by Parliament for the public good without the assent of that Parliament which has given the power. By Parliament I mean, of course, the House of Lords and the House of Commons. Suppose, then, we repeal the duties and afterwards refuse to surrender the power of prohibiting the exportation of coal. What would be our position then? The Emperor of the French may say, “I, as one of the contracting parties, am prepared to accept the Treaty as a whole; but you cannot get the assent of Parliament to an important clause, and therefore I refuse to go further in the matter.” We are told by the noble Lord that the 11th clause was not intended as a political clause; but, at all events, it was regarded as a clause of some importance. I do not think it was of much importance to us to obtain a promise from the Emperor of the French that he would not prohibit the exportation of coal. The importance, therefore, was to the Emperor of the French to bind us not to prohibit the exportation of English coal either to France or to countries from which she could procure it. What would be our position if the Emperor, under the circumstances I have suggested, were to decline to accept the Treaty? In the meantime we should have repealed our duties, because we all know that the passing of Resolutions upon the Customs Acts is, for all practical purposes, an immediate repeal of duties. By so doing we should have placed these trades, and all those dependent on them, in a position from which it will be difficult to extricate them. I want to ask, therefore, whether the Government intend to take the assent of Parliament to the 11th section of the Treaty; and, if so, whether they have any assurance from the Emperor of the French that he will accept the Treaty without that section which Parliament may refuse to sanction. If they have no such assurance, and if they fail to obtain the assent of Parliament to the 11th Article, will they be prepared to ask us to rescind those Resolutions for the repeal or modification of duties which in the meantime we may have passed? We are entitled to have these questions answered. It is idle to discuss the Articles of the Treaty, or the propriety of dealing with certain duties, until we know that our discussion will not be altogether purposeless and nugatory.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: I cannot suppose that the hon. and learned Gentleman imagines that Resolutions of this House, so far as the levying of duties is concerned, have the power of an Act of Parliament.

SIR HUGH CAIRNS: I said, “For all practical purposes”—using the words of the Chancellor of the Exchequer in his letter published in the newspapers to-day.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: I cannot conceive that any one, especially a constitutional lawyer, can suppose that, should Parliament be prorogued without any Bill being passed to alter these duties, a mere Resolution of this House could effect them. Should that be the case, the whole matter would fall to the ground, and the duties would not be reduced. The other questions of the hon. and learned Gentleman I may have occasion to answer on a later day.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, that in pressing on the consideration of the Army Estimates which had only been delivered to

hon. Members on Wednesday last, the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War was treating the House with great disrespect. These Estimates were larger than any that had ever before been submitted to Parliament in a time of peace, and would provide for a force in this country, including militia, yeomanry, constabulary, and rifle volunteers (a most important force), of 267,000 fighting men. With the navy which had been already voted he did not believe that any number of foreign troops could ever land upon these shores which would require one-tenth of that force to dispose of them. Moreover, the Estimates were composed of between 2,000 and 3,000 items, and therefore required most attentive and careful consideration.

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT said, he wished to state, in answer to a question of an hon. Member opposite (Mr. Darby Griffith), that the Commander-in-Chief had had under his consideration the subject of assaults committed by soldiers with their belts, and intended to deprive any badly-conducted man of that portion of his accoutrements. He also purposed to put in operation a military police, which had been attended with great success in some of our large garrison towns, and which it was hoped would put an end to all complaints.

Motion agreed to.

SUPPLY.—ARMY ESTIMATES.

House in Committee of Supply,

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT : Before I commence the statement which it is now my duty to make to the Committee, I will answer a question which was put to me by the hon. Baronet (Sir H. Willoughby), and I will answer it very shortly, because we shall soon have an opportunity of going into detail upon the subject to which it refers. He asks me whether any sum will be required to defray the expenses of the China expedition beyond the £850,000 for which a Vote of Credit is taken this year. First, let me say that I think the amount of force which is destined for this service has been greatly exaggerated. I apprehend that the General Order which we have seen will not be carried out to the extent which was contemplated at the time it was issued, when the Indian Government had not heard from home ; and it must also be borne in mind that part of the Native troops mentioned in that order are not additions to the force in China, but are going out to relieve the three battalions which have hitherto been stationed at Hong Kong and Canton. With regard to the payment, I have, in the Estimates which I am about to submit to the House, included the pay and allowances of the European troops. There are two Votes of Credit which together will amount to between £1,300,000 and £1,400,000, of the first of which £600,000 will be applicable to the army, and the occasion on which they are discussed will be the best opportunity for going into the question whether or not they are likely to meet all the necessities of the expedition. [Sir H. WILLOUGHBY : Will there be any charge upon the Indian revenue ?] The immediate charge will fall on the East Indian revenue, and we shall have to account to them at a subsequent period. To the questions which were asked me by an hon. Gentleman opposite with regard to the militia I will not now reply, as it will be more convenient to announce the views of the Government with regard to the embodied militia when I am stating the amount of force which we are about to take. The hon. Gentleman behind me (Mr. W. Williams) says that I am taking an unfair advantage in bringing forward these Estimates at so early a period after the Votes have been circulated. There was some delay in the printing which I regret, but for which I am not responsible, which delayed the circulation of the Votes ; but I think that, looking at the state of public business in the House, and considering the necessity there was for the financial statement being made unusually early, the Committee will feel that it is for their convenience, and for that of the public service, that the Naval and Military Estimates should be brought forward as soon as possible. It is true, I believe, that these are the largest Estimates which have ever been proposed in time of peace. They are not, perhaps, so large as they look, but I frankly admit that they are enormous Estimates. Let me make an accurate comparison between these Estimates and those of last year. There is a difference in the amount to be received in the way of deductions. Last year my right hon. and gallant Friend opposite (General Peel) received from the East India Company £700,000. I shall receive only £450,000, which leaves me in a deficiency, so far as that goes, of £250,000. The Estimates for the present year amount to £14,842,275, as con-trusted with 12,859,297 in last year, showing a net increase of £1,982,978. The House naturally will wish to know what are the causes of this enormous increase. In considering the manner in which the sums that Parliament might vote upon these Estimates would be expended with the greatest advantage to the country, I had to determine whether it would be by the maintenance of an increased standing army, by the continued embodiment of the militia, or by laying in stores of those new arms and implements of war which the advance of science has introduced, which the neighbouring countries of Europe are rapidly adopting, and which we ourselves could not neglect without serious injury to the relative power and safety of this country. The object, then, is to expend a given sum in the manner that will be most likely permanently to increase the strength of the nation. I will not employ the whole increase in men, because when the money is paid at the end of the year, you are not more advanced in contributing towards the permanent strength of the country. You will not be the stronger in respect of arms or material of which you ought to have a large stock for the future, irrespective of your immediate requirements. Then comes the consideration as to the kind of stores and armaments of which we should lay in this stock. That in which we have been most deficient is small arms and rifled guns, which are necessary not only for the land but also for the sea service, and you will see in the Vote for stores of this kind an enormous Estimate—something short of a million—for rifled guns for the navy. And I do not think it possible—looking to the rapidity with which armaments of this description are being made abroad and the enormous strength which is thus added to the navies of those nations—that we can for one moment pre-empt the manufacture of the best possible weapons. That is one reason for devoting so large a sum to a single item; a sum so large as apparently to account for the difference between the two Estimates—I say apparently, because my gallant Friend likewise took a large Vote for small arms last year. How necessary it is to hasten on the making of those rifled guns has been shown by their effects on the plains of Italy; and on board ships they may be of a value and importance which no one yet can sufficiently understand. I come now to consider what has been done with regard to the standing forces. The gallant

Officer (Colonel Dickson), by combining the sum of £330,000 for the embodied militia with another Vote, has made a calculation, and says he is at a loss to understand the meaning of the Estimates. In the discussion the other night I tried to explain the manner in which these Votes were constituted, and I then alluded to what I think an error in form—which in future years it may be possible to remedy—according to which a distinction is taken between the Vote for the embodied militia and that for the line, though both, in point of fact, are for the same thing; both are battalions of infantry, performing exactly the same duty. In the mind of every Secretary of State for War the intention has always existed, to a greater or less extent, of disembodiment some portion of the militia; he plays them off against the diminution or increase of the regulars, and between the two he maintains a force of average amount. In order to ascertain what we propose under this head, you must place together Votes 2, 3, and 4; and you will then find that we have got £4,846,843 last year, as against £5,498,428 in the present. I proceed upon the assumption that we are going to have a large disembodiment of militia; and I have placed upon these Estimates, the pay of the troops in China. If by some good fortune the troops engaged in what I agree in thinking a most unfortunate and calamitous war should soon be enabled to return, they will come home to England without disturbing my Estimate, because they are already borne upon it. Let me now say why it is that the Government think it is better to maintain a force of regulars and to disembody the militia. The gallant Officer opposite (General Peel) expressed, I think in March last, his intention, to some extent, of disembodiment the militia, and wrote a circular expressing that very proper decision; but circumstances occurred which led him afterwards to take a Vote for its continuance. To maintain an embodied militia in time of peace, however, is not according to a proper system—it ought to be a reserve, on which you can draw in case of war, or fear of war. I must express my entire dissent from the idea which has been advanced to-night, and which is very popular, that all the militia ought in turn to be embodied—according to some for a very short period, in the opinion of others for some little time longer—and then on the disembodiment of each regiment, that it should remain without further training for a very lengthened period. I cannot conceive anything more likely to be attended with all the evils and mischief of constant disembodiment, without the acquirement of any efficiency in return. I quite agree with the gallant Colonel (Colonel Dickson) that unless the regiments are embodied for a very long period the system presses with great hardship on the officers; but these frequent disembodiments after short intervals of service would affect them still more seriously. On every ground, I conceive the embodiment of militia in time of peace to be a wrong principle. You will say, then, why is it done? I certainly cannot afford to throw blame upon any person, for I was the first to embody the militia. But at that time we were engaged in the war with Russia; there was no dread of invasion, and the efficiency of the militia was not an object of consideration, but it was of the utmost importance, at all hazards and without any consideration of expense, to open a fresh channel for recruiting for the line. It may be said, and with truth, that this was a very expensive process—that the men received two bounties often without any increased efficiency, but still you got the men, and in cases of emergency you must have recourse to unusual proceedings, and you cannot stand upon rules. I believe the embodiment of militia was justifiable under the circumstances, and that the same reasons held good when the Indian mutiny broke out. But recollect that in recruiting the line from the militia you are destroying the regiments of the latter as fast as they are rendered efficient by their officers. I can imagine nothing more heart-breaking to militia officers who take pride in their respective corps than to have all their best men draughted away; and I think the country has never appreciated the value of their services during the war, when, without a murmur, they suffered—what was sufficient to excite irritation in the mind of any man—the enlargement of the line at the expense of the force with which they themselves were connected. There is another objection to the continued embodiment of the militia, which is, I think, of a serious character. So long as a militia regiment is raised and trained in its own county, and does not go beyond its limits, and so long as the men have an assurance that they will never be embodied except in war a wholly superior class are to be found in its ranks. But as soon as a regiment is permanently embodied, the class of men who come in are those who want permanent service, and, in point of fact, exactly the same as those who are enlisted in the army; so that you are establishing a competition against yourself—you are narrowing and injuring the great recruiting ground for the army. For all these reasons, the Government have felt satisfied that the embodied militia ought to be dispensed with as soon as possible; but they feel, at the same time, that much hardship is entailed on the officers and men of the disbanded regiments, who enlisted for the sake of permanent service, and not from any feeling of local attachment to a particular corps. However much I object to volunteering from the militia into the line—which is very like cutting off one end of a blanket and adding it to the other—I feel that in such a case some consideration is due. There will be found a considerable increase in the force we propose to take this year. It will amount to 20,000 men. I do not mean in comparison with those now borne, but with those voted last year. We have raised two new battalions at home of field artillery to replace those who went from here to China. It is the intention of the Government, looking to the deficiency of artillery in this country, and to the improbability of any artillery being sent to us from India—because the melting away of the Native artillery and the losses of the local artillery render it hopeless to expect that the Indian Government can spare us any considerable force of this kind—it is the intention of the Government, I say, that some increase shall be made to this force, and they propose to add a brigade of garrison artillery and a brigade of field artillery, a brigade of artillery corresponding to a battalion of the Line. We also propose to make an addition to a small extent to the force of engineers. The reasons of the Government for this increase may be very shortly stated. We have at home one broken half battalion of engineers, but we have a very great increase in the works which require the superintendence of the engineers. We have found too this year, as we did last, that the scientific and skilled labourer of the sappers is not only very valuable, but also very economical. During the strike this year which took place at Woolwich when the works would have been stopped, they were carried on by soldiers at a less cost than the labour of the workmen. There is this additional reason, that the number of engineers is not sufficient to give a fair relief to those who are engaged in different works abroad; officers of the Engineers, too, are in such request on account of their attainments and skill, that nothing but a strong exercise of authority on the part of the Commander-in-Chief can keep them out of civil and upon military duties. The Government have therefore thought that they could not do better than make an augmentation of half a company to the present companies of Engineers. That will give us an additional force of two brigades of Artillery and a battalion and a half of Engineers. We propose to take the rest of the proposed augmentation in the manner in which it may be most easily reduced when the additional forces come home to us, and in a manner, too, which does not increase the number of officers. We propose to increase the strength of our battalions of infantry by raising the companies from 80 to 100 men. This is the mode by which the army may be most easily reduced, for after all we have got an army amply sufficient if we only see that it is properly distributed. If the prosperity and peace of India continue to be maintained, we shall, when the China expedition has accomplished its objects, obtain additional regiments thence. If we get them before, an equal amount of the proposed augmentation must be dispensed with. Therefore, if we were to propose to raise additional battalions at home we should have to disband those battalions, which is one of the most painful things a man can have to do. You have a number of officers who go upon half-pay, and who lose what they have learnt. All promotion is stopped, and for these and other reasons we think it better to proceed by raising men and adding them to the present infantry battalions, rather than increase the number of officers. When the troops now in India and China come home the numbers may be reduced, and by the cessation of recruiting you can bring down your establishments to the extent to which they are augmented by the arrival of troops from abroad. I ought here to mention a smaller matter—an old force which is rendering valuable service—the Invalid Artillery. They occupy stations upon the coast. They are selected for their good conduct from the regiments of artillery, they are composed of the best men, they are a not very expensive force, and are commanded by a major who entered the service as a private soldier in the artillery and who is a distinguished officer. This force is doing good service, for such is the demand for their assistance in training the militia and volunteer artillery that all the officers and non-commissioned officers are thus employed. I am glad the hon. Member for Lambeth (Mr. W. Williams) is not now in the House, for he might have complained of the great amount of the increase we propose. Well, but is the force so very large that we propose to maintain, or is this whole army of 240,000 so very much disproportioned to the wealth and population of the British empire? I have looked to see what is the proportion of soldiers to the population, not only in this but in other countries. I have taken the numbers of our army two or three years ago, at the conclusion of the war, as a fair average test. Thus, in England, with a population of 28,000,000, you have an army of 220,000, being a force in proportion to your population of one to 128 persons. In France, with a population of 36,000,000, you have an army of 378,000 men, which, mind you, is the number taken from the Estimates, that hardly ever agree with the number actually borne on the army. That is one in 95. In Russia, with a population of 65,000,000, the army numbers 900,000, which is one in 72. In Austria, with a population of 40,000,000, there is an army of 587,000, or one in 68. In Prussia, with a population of 17,000,000, there is an army of 211,000, or one in 80. In Spain, with a population of 17,000,000, there is an army of 142,000, or one in 119. That comparison, it will be seen, puts England the lowest by a great deal in proportion of troops to the population; but that is not a fair statement of the case. The English army is not only the army of England, it is also the army of India, the army of Australia, the army of North America, of the West Indies, of the Cape of Good Hope, and other dependencies. And, therefore, in point of fact, to put the comparison fairly, you ought to see what number of troops you have got, and compare that number with the population of the whole Empire. If the comparison is made in that way we shall find that the army of England, as compared with the population, is as one to 246, which is a proportion unknown to any other part of the world. Another question is well worth looking at. It is a very common notion, both in this House and the country, that the English army is very dear, in consequence of the great proportion of officers to the number of men. The English army, I do not deny, is a very expensive army. Our style of living is expensive, our army partakes of the national characteristic, and both officers and men are higher paid than any others. But is the proportion of officers to the number of men so much larger in England than in other countries? In the infantry the number of officers to a company is in England three, in France three, in Austria four, in Prussia six, in Sardinia four. It is true that these companies become in the continental armies much larger at certain times, and then they are so unwieldy that the former proportion of officers is insufficient. In England there are 23 soldiers to each officer, in France 22, in Austria 26, in Prussia 19, in Sardinia 19. With the exception of Austria, England is at the head of the list in regard to the number of men to each officer. In cavalry the number of officers to a squadron is in England six, in France seven, in Austria six, in Prussia five, in Sardinia five. The number of men to each cavalry officer is in England 18, in France 13, in Austria 22, in Prussia 15, in Sardinia 17. In artillery the number of officers to a battery is in England six, in France four, in Austria four, in Prussia six, in Sardinia three. The number of men to each artillery officer is in England 36, in France 30, in Austria 29, in Prussia 19, in Sardinia 32. On the whole, therefore, these returns show that there is no excess of officers in the English army as compared with the army of any other countries. Now, Sir, I have mentioned the reasons why the Government think the militia should be disembodied. The augmentation which the Government now propose to make in the regular army will to some degree supply the place of the militia. The House, however, will recollect that without looking at the return force from China we shall have a very great diminution of the gross amount of troops by the exchange of 20,000 militia against the 6,000 or 7,000 proposed additions to our regiments. When we talk of disembodiment the militia we do not altogether part with the whole of our force. You have the disembodied militia behind, which will, I hope, in the course of a few years be in a better state of organization, and which adds to the sense of security, as a means of augmenting your force upon any emergency. Deducting the Indian depôts, which are not paid for by us, we shall have, on the 1st of April, 87,722, and with the Indian depôts 100,701 men in our establishment, including the augmentation. With the disembodied militia I wish to deal according to circumstances. I hope I shall be able to dispense with almost all of it. Next year, in March, the Act expires under which, contrary to constitutional practice, the embodied militia is kept up in time of peace, and I am anxious to effect the disbanding within the year, because I doubt the practical effect of passing another Act to continue the service for a short period. If that were done, I doubt whether we should ever bring the peasantry to believe that in future the militia is to be a disembodied force. As to the regular army, I shall have to propose a change to which, though it may seem a small matter, I attach some importance. As the term of enlistment has been altered to ten years, I think it will be good policy to make some change in the period at which good-conduct pay shall commence. The extra pay earned by good conduct now commences at the end of five years' service, and there is a further increase at the expiration of every successive five years. A recruit joining the army feels, however good his conduct may be, that some years must elapse before it begins to affect his pay. It is obviously important to hold out every inducement to good conduct; I therefore propose to shorten the first period at which the extra pay begins, and give the first penny at the end of three years, with another penny a day at the end of five years more, and so on as now. This change, I think, will also form an inducement for men to remain in the service after the expiration of their first ten years' service. It is scarcely necessary for me to make any allusion to the number of field-guns. The change we are making in the artillery will substitute Armstrong guns for all the old brass field pieces. There need be no alarm about the twelve Armstrong guns sent to China, as before many months elapse we shall have obtained a sufficient number of guns for all our field batteries. The gun-carriages can be made to answer for the new guns with trifling alterations. Let me say, in passing, that these new guns were sent to China that they might be tested in the most complete manner by ascertaining how they worked in the field. If they have any defects we shall be sure to hear of them, and we shall obtain a much better report of any deficiencies than we should get from any trials at Shoeburyness or on Woolwich Common. I shall have now to enter on a mass of details as to how the army is commanded, how it is armed, fed, clothed, and paid, and what is its state as to health. The first question is how it is commanded, and it arises on a Vote that has always excited much attention, jealousy, and complaint in this House—the Vote for the Staff. I do not wish to overrate the services of the Staff, and I know how very much depends on the regimental officers. But recollect this—if you destroy the Staff you destroy the brains of the army, and leave it nothing but limbs. At the commencement of the Russian war many complaints were made of the inefficiency of the Staff: how should it have been efficient when before that war it was never employed in the field nor anywhere else? No Staff officer had had any practice, and yet they were expected to do, for the first time in their lives, what they had never learnt, and to do it under the most trying and difficult circumstances. Such expectations deserved to meet—as they did meet—disappointment. Since that war every Government has wisely endeavoured to remedy this defect in our military system by employing officers of the Staff in places where they may learn as much of the art of war as can be learnt during peace. Let me state here that the Government has lately made two changes in the Staff of the army. The first change is in the constitution of the permanent Staff at head-quarters—the Horse Guards. We found, on looking back for a long period of years, that two officers had held the appointments of Quartermaster-General and Adjutant-General, one for forty, the other for twenty years. It seemed quite obvious that a system which left two men for such enormous periods of time almost at the head of the army, could not work well. They could know nothing of modern service, and must have existed only on the traditions, and been influenced by the feelings and practice of the time when they served in it. It must surely be a great disadvantage that the best Staff officers should not have an opportunity in turn of seeing the administration of the army from above, of seeing what no man can see who is not at the centre—how the army is governed, on what principles it is governed, and by what machinery it is moved. On the other side, it must surely be a great advantage to the Commander-in-Chief to have several officers passing through his office, that, by the change, he may know who are the best administrators, and be enabled to put his hand on men on whom he can rely in time of need. The newly established regulation, therefore, is that the Staff at head-quarters shall be governed by the same rule as the rest of the Staff of the army, and hold their appointments for five years only. The Commander-in-Chief has cordially co-operated in that measure; he agreed entirely with the view the Government took of the matter; and I am glad to think that a change has been made likely to prove so beneficial to the army. At the same time, that there may be no mistake, I must mention that two conditions are attached to this change, which, I think, are only just and equitable. One is, that all the Staff officers should not be changed or leave at the same time, so that the Commander-in-Chief would be left with a Staff all unacquainted with the business of his office. It is desirable that the officers should quit at intervals as others are appointed. We also wish to give the Commander-in-Chief time to find Staff appointments elsewhere for those officers who had accepted appointments on the Home Staff, on the understanding that their employment was for life. In making changes of this description it is wise to be liberal, as it facilitates other changes of a similar character. Again, with regard to officers holding the command of brigades at out-stations, it has hitherto been the practice to give it to colonels with the temporary rank of major-general. The result was that the Commander-in-Chief was a good deal restricted in his choice of officers for this command. It is now proposed that brigades shall be commanded by colonels, not with the rank of major-generals, but of brigadiers. This rule will reduce the emoluments in some, but I hope not an undue degree, but it will give the Commander-in-Chief a wider selection of officers, and enable him to get younger men for commands,—always a good thing. The exceptions to the rule would be in such places as Malta and Gibraltar, where the chief in command is also the Governor, and much occupied by civil duties. One Major-General will also be preserved at Aldershot and one at the Curragh in case of the absence of the officer in command of the division. These two changes, I, hope will have a good effect on the whole Staff of the army, as it would enable the officers on it to see the working of the system at head-quarters, and give the Commander-in-Chief the power of placing younger men upon it. Last autumn there was a very general impression in this country that the French army had got some peculiar bayonet exercise which gave them a great superiority over every one else. There was the use of the sword-bayonet in those troupes d'élite which fought all through the Italian campaign; and it is perfectly true that a great deal more attention was paid in other countries than in England to the physical development of the soldier. I applied to the Commander-in-Chief to select an officer to go to Paris, and likewise to Berlin to see these exercises. He brought back a report on their nature and adaptability to our service. Colonel Hamilton, of the Guards, a very intelligent officer, was selected for the duty, and he discharged it with great ability. Well, Sir, it is doubtful whether there is any superiority in the sword-bayonet over the old bayonet, and the French officers themselves say they did not know till they read it in the English papers that there was any supposed advantage. They say it was topheavy and very apt to injure the musket to which it was fixed, and in the war there was a very large party who preferred the old to the new bayonet. But it is quite true that the French—I suppose for the same reason that their cookery is better than ours, because their material is not so good—not having the same sinew and stature, devote more care to the physical development of the soldier, and attach more importance to regular gymnastic exercises under the superintendence of regimental and even medical officers. No doubt the system must be greatly strengthened and the general health improved by such exercises. Nobody in the streets can help observing how much better a man in the cavalry walks than an infantry man. He is better set up, looks more active, strong, and muscular; and no doubt the great variety of his exercise, and especially his sword exercise, must contribute very much to produce that result. I see some dissent from an infantry officer opposite; but I do not speak from my own observation alone, I have heard many military officers make the same remark. Colonel Hamilton visited those places, and we mean to act on the report which he brought back. You will find that in these Estimates we take money for the erection of buildings, gymnasia, in which these exercises may be practised at one or two of our principal stations. The camp at Aldershot is a rather sore subject with a friend of mine behind, but after all it has been one of the most useful institutions for an army we have seen of late years. It has been useful not only for the purpose of exercising the troops, but in a different way in trying inventions. There have been in the course of five years no less than 150 different inventions tested there by use, and these tests have been of great advantage to the service, because they prevent you embarking, on à priori expectations, in some new form of material which may turn out on practical use to be insufficient. We have got among other inventions tested with success one in which the right hon. Member for Oxfordshire took particular interest. Again there has been at Aldershot less desertion than in the British army anywhere else; there has been a great diminution of it; there has been less crime at Aldershot, less disease. The returns of the mortality are so low that to me, having for a long time now been engaged in observations on this point, they almost appear fabulous. At the same time I am bound, on the other hand, to admit that the troops there being young, youth accounts a good deal for the small rate of mortality; but still I have no doubt, next to the healthiness of the situation, the main reason has been the amount of exercise in the open air which the troops undergo there. They have tried there with great success the sending out of flying camps—baking their own bread, cooking for themselves, and conducting all the operations that would take place in a regular campaign. I will not go further into detail on that point. With reference to the commissariat, I will read to the Committee an extract of a letter from Mr. Warriner, dated January 25, 1860, after lecturing at Aldershot. He says:—

“ I visited the commissariat, and I have great pleasure in saying that the beef contains at least 25 per cent more nourishment than that which I usually see supplied to the troops in London and its vicinity, and that the mode of distribution for the prevention of fraud is exceedingly good. The bread is likewise 20 per cent better, that is, four Aldershot loaves are equal to five London ones. I believe there are few places in the kingdom where such good bread can be obtained as that produced by the commissariat at Aldershot.”

There is a change which has been introduced into the mode of rationing the troops which I hope will lay the foundation of very extensive and valuable improvements to the advantage and comfort of the soldier. The troops at Aldershot and two or three other stations—in the Mediterranean garrison and at the Cape of Good Hope—receive from the commissariat, not only bread and meat rations for a stoppage from their pay of 4½d. a day, but an additional quantity of bread and groceries, consisting of tea, coffee, sugar, pepper, and salt, at an additional stoppage of $1\frac{1}{2}d.$, and the effect has been excellent, because the commissariat, buying on a large scale, can supply the men for the same money with a larger quantity, or, if not a larger quantity, a superior quality of tea, coffee, and sugar, and, though the men looked at it at first with suspicion, the reports from all the camps are now fully confirmatory of the wisdom of the change. I hope to extend it further. I think it will ultimately be found of enormous advantage to the army, and having one rate of stoppage all over the world, leaving a net pay due to the soldier. In addition to the extension of flying camps, the brigades have been employed in the construction of field works, digging wells, embarking and disembarking in boats, getting carriages on the railway, and other works. The staff at the same time in each district has been employed by the Commander-in-Chief in making accurate surveys of the locality, and these surveys, with their notes sent in to the Commander-in-Chief, are placed in the Topographical Department, and may become of great value at some future time. With regard to clothing, I am happy to say there has been a great diminution of complaints, in consequence of the improvements initiated by my gallant Friend opposite (General Peel). Under the mode of clothing which formerly existed there were great complaints, not only of the material, but of the workmanship. I will read to the Committee an extract from the letter of the commanding officer of the 43rd Foot. He says—

"I have, however, the honour to state, for your information, that since I have been in the 43rd Light Infantry—upwards of twenty-two years—I do not remember having seen so good material supplied for the use of the privates, and the alterations required have been much fewer than in previous years. The sergeants' clothing appears to be very good, and that for the staff sergeants appears somewhat better than usual."

The clothing, however, is not well made on our system. There is an advantage in a certain degree of competition; it kept everybody up to the mark. There was a new establishment in Pimlico, conducted by Colonel Hudson, where the clothing was made cheaper and better than anywhere else. There is an establishment at Woolwich where the Artillery clothing is made. Still there was a very great deal done by contract, each being a check on the other. It is certainly very difficult to deal with this question of contract, and I was very much struck by a statement made the other day, that in France they had done away with the system of open tenders. During the Italian campaign it was found that a vast number of shoes had been sent out there, not made of bad leather, but not made of leather at all, but of paste-board, so that the foot went through it in two days. Then comes the question, how the troops are armed? I believe, upon the whole, that they are the best armed troops of any nation in the world; but that is no reason why their weapons should not be improved if possible. I will say a few words on this subject, because since the volunteer rifle movement hon. Gentlemen have had their attention much turned to it. At Hythe, General Hay, a most distinguished officer, and an excellent judge, prefers the Whitworth rifle to all others, and he is right; but it cost £10, instead of £2 17s. 6d., the price of the Enfield. When you deal with an army that, of course, implies an enormous outlay, and the question of expense becomes important. You are bound to show that a rifle that costs three times as much as another, is three times as efficacious, and will kill three times as many men. But I am afraid the distinction between the two classes of weapons is not so great as that. To equip an army of 100,000 men with the Whitworth rifle would require a million of money, and for the whole of the army it would require a supply of nearly five times that amount; so that it would be impossible for any Government to face such an expenditure as that. One officer with whom I conversed on the subject, observed that nobody could doubt that a chronometer was a better thing than a watch; but who would think of carrying a chronometer in his pocket when a watch would answer his purpose; and the risk of loss, or damage was not so great? But there is another question that has been raised here, and that is as to what is the right bore for the rifle. In 1858 a few Enfields were made experimentally with the bore reduced to half an inch, and this was found to carry the same description of ball much further than with the larger bore, and even to make a good show with the Whitworth. This leads one to suppose that the question of the bore is much more important than has generally been supposed. No doubt, the great fault of the Enfield rifle is the weakness of the barrel, and a charge, with the bayonet driven home, would not improve the weapon for purposes of shooting. With a reduced bore, however, the same weight of barrel may give greater strength. As the question of the bore is felt to be exceedingly important the Government have appointed a committee of officers to inquire, and to test with accuracy the different sizes. What we want is the decision of practical men, who will devote their energies for a short time to the consideration of the subject. You may perhaps say, "How will you be able to effect a change when you have got so very large a stock on hand of rifles of the existing bore?" My answer is, that the introduction of two ammunitions is not a thing so inconvenient as not to be got over. We have peculiar facilities for changes of that description. Our troops are scattered all over the world, in India, the Colonies, and Great Britain, and you may divide your ammunition in the same way. There is no reason why the ammunition should be mixed. If it were mixed, no doubt inconvenience would be felt; but, supposing the committee of officers I have referred to should come to the conclusion that it would be wiser in future to work with the smaller bore, the inconvenience would be got over. Admitting some inconvenience, however, that is no reason why we should go on working with an inferior weapon if a better one can be found. Passing from this topic let me proceed to one in which I have always taken a deep interest—the health of the army. The mortality of the troops abroad is, generally speaking, greater than the mortality at home, because abroad there come into play the injurious effects of climate and other causes, which tell against the health of the soldiers. But even abroad there is a great improvement in the health of the troops, except in India, where during the war they suffered much exposure, which caused consequent debility and death. I turn, however, to the mortality at home, about which there has been so much discussion in this House and elsewhere, it being much more possible to attend to the health of the soldier at home by judicious interference on the part of the authorities than it is abroad. I should add that I have a strong reason for not dwelling on the mortality abroad, and that is, unless you take long averages you cannot come to a satisfactory conclusion regarding it. Take, for example, the case of the West Indies. You may have for a time a low state of mortality among the troops there. Then there comes a terrible epidemic that decimates your regiments, and unless you take one of these epidemic years into the average your calculations will be unsatisfactory. In England, with more supervision and better climate, the sanitary state of the army was not so variable. I find, taking the average of the fifteen years previous to 1856, and comparing the mortality then with that of the last year, that we have the following results:—The mortality of the Household Cavalry, which was ten per 1,000 in the former period, is now 8·24; cavalry of the Line, former average 13·3, now 7·92; Royal Artillery, former average 14·4, now 8·09; Royal Engineers, former average 11·2, now 7·19; Foot Guards, former average 19 and a fraction, now 7·74; Infantry of the Line, former average 17·9, now 8·05. In the dépôt battalions the average is higher than in the others, being for last year 12·28. Let me guard the House against a too strict deduction from those figures. I have no doubt that the improved health of the troops is to a considerable extent owing to their being dressed better, fed and housed better; but it must be remembered that the army is a great deal younger now than it was previous to the Crimean war. At the termination of that war many old men left the army, and their places were supplied by younger lives, and probably the improved health of the army is principally owing to the diminished ages of the men, though it is satisfactory to think that a part of the improvement has been caused by our sanitary reforms. This is proved by the fact that in the case of the Household Cavalry, which were neither in India nor the Crimea, and therefore never exposed to the causes that rendered it necessary to supply the places of old men with young, the mortality has fallen from ten to 8·24 in 1,000, now eight per 1,000 is the average mortality of the healthiest class in the country—the agricultural labourers; if we can bring the mortality in the army to be no greater than that among agricultural labourers we shall remove from it the stigma of being an unhealthy profession, and make it more popular than it now is. At Aldershot the rates of mortality have been as low as five and a fraction, or excluding casualties, 4·6 per 1,000, which certainly is a very low rate indeed. I now pass on to the subject of volunteer corps. There are many gentlemen present who will quarrel with me for having this year taken no Vote for the training of yeomanry corps. My reason is, that at a time when the Estimates were becoming so large thought I ought to reduce everything that could be reduced without prejudice or injury to the public interests; and, as these corps have been out regularly and been brought to a high state of efficiency, I thought it better to omit the Vote for their training this year. It will be observed that I have introduced a sum for the payment of adjutants for training rifle and artillery corps. It is important to give as regular and as military an organization as we can to those bodies. It is impossible to over-estimate the value of the feeling these corps have displayed. There are great difficulties, however, in their way. I see one in particular with regard to which I think it is wise to raise a warning voice—namely, the ambition on the part of volunteer corps to excel in point of numbers, to make their corps as large as they can, irrespective of their permanence. I have seen it asserted that those corps should be composed of all classes; that people should stand in them shoulder to shoulder, irrespective of rank. Nobody can object to that. Certainly the Government would never in any way oppose such an arrangement. But there is something to look to beyond that. The question is, will such corps be permanent? I believe that corps, left to extraneous support, will not stand the test of time. You will sometimes find two or three gentlemen put their hands in their pockets, and in the excitement of the moment associate themselves to equip men who are not able to equip themselves. Now, I believe it will be found that there is a great defect in corps where all the men are not able to equip themselves. When the first excitement dies away, the zeal of those who have contributed to the funds will vanish, their subscriptions will diminish, and the numbers of the corps will diminish too. On the other hand, when a man finds his own outfit, Government providing him, of course, with arms, he will naturally become fond of the corps to which he belongs, and of the exercises of the soldier; and the corps supplied with such men will be a permanent one. I may refer to another error which ought to be avoided. The money subscribed is frequently not expended in a way that is advantageous. Sometimes it is laid out on uniforms that are too expensive, sometimes on bands, and in other ways not beneficial for the corps. There is a doctrine which I see often put forward—namely, that solidity is not a thing which is required in troops, and that loose order is at once the most effective and the most easily acquired. Now, speaking in the presence of military men, I apprehend that the duty of irregular troops is more difficult both to learn and to do well than that of regular troops. When persons talk of loose order they think it means less drill; but, on the contrary, it implies more drill. A man can stand with his shoulder against the shoulder of his neighbour, and may be kept in that way from straying out of his place. But when men have to act separately, when they have to take advantage of the ground, to have an instinct, not only of what the enemy but of what their own comrades are doing; when they are not all attempting to maintain the same regularity of proceedings, but each has to be master of himself and of the position in which he is individually placed, depend upon it a much more thorough knowledge of military matters is required than is necessary for going through the ordinary movements of an infantry corps. Therefore, those who take an interest in these corps will do wisely in insisting as much as possible on every kind of drill. The drill need not be complicated or difficult, but it ought to be systematic, and the men should be made perfectly acquainted with the movements they do learn. It is sometimes said, if the volunteers can shoot well, that is enough. But there is one great instance to the contrary which I think almost settles the whole question. I have always heard from the highest military authorities, not connected with this country, that the best skirmishers in the world are the French tirailleurs. Yet this pre-eminence of theirs is combined with the character of being the worst shots. They know how to cover themselves, how to get out of the way of the enemy's fire, and how to act against him with effect; and Russian and Austrian officers assure us they are about the very best skirmishers in the world. If that, then, be the case, I only hope that the appointments we have made of inspectors with that experienced and energetic officer, Colonel McMurdough at their head, will be of great assistance to these volunteer corps. I now come to the manufacturing department, and the Votes for the wages of labour and cost of materials. I will shortly state what has been done in this respect. At Woolwich, the old Royal Gun Factory has been closed. I had great hesitation in taking that step; among other reasons, because of the very able and distinguished officer at the head of that establishment, Colonel Eardley Wilmot, for whom I have a high regard. But no considerations of private feeling or of disadvantage to any individual can weigh for an instant against the interests of the public service; and it seemed to me that the Royal factory at Woolwich, to cast guns that can be cast elsewhere just as well, and possibly, for aught I know, just as cheap, was a mistake. On the other hand, we have been anxious to press forward as rapidly as we could the creation of the matériel which must be manufactured by the Government, because we cannot get it from any private firm. We have thought it best to go to the trade for what the trade can make, and to confine ourselves to producing what the trade cannot produce. We have, therefore, enlarged the factory, and obtained additional machinery to a large amount; and we hope by this means, and by the aid of Sir W. Armstrong's works at Elswick, to have, between the 1st of January last and the end of the next financial year, something not very far short of 3,000 rifled guns. We are also anxious, as soon as possible, to issue Armstrong guns for the navy, and we hope soon to be able to place a considerable number on board of Her Majesty's ships. The last gun made by Sir W. Armstrong and sent to be tried, was a 12-pounder. The following was the result:—Forty consecutive rounds were fired from the new 12-pounder field gun of 8 cwt., with the minimum charge of 11 lb. 8oz. of slow powder. Experiment shows that we have been wrong for some time in using powder of so quick a detonating nature for artillery practice, and especially for rifled cannon, which require slower powder than that suited to other arms. At seven degrees of elevation in five rounds, the range being from 2,465 to 2,495 yards, the difference in the range was 65 yards, and the greatest difference in width three yards. Then at eight degrees of elevation, the range reaching 2,797 yards, with 60 yards of difference between the five shots, and only one yard of difference in the width. Again, at nine degrees of elevation the range comes up to 3,000 yards and upwards, with 85 yards difference between the five shots, and three yards as the greatest difference in the width. In point of fact, almost all of these shots but three or four would have struck within a 9-feet target. The rapidity and accuracy with which small objects are hit at a great distance in the practice made at Shroebury, is something marvellous. We have to-day an account in the newspapers of the success of a gun, in which I have long taken a great interest, and with respect to which I have been in constant communication with Mr. Whitworth. The effect of that gun seems excellent. People may be much excited if they see it surpass Sir W. Armstrong's weapon. It has not, in fact, yet surpassed Sir W. Armstrong's gun, which may, however, shoot a little short. But recollect that Sir W. Armstrong has not yet made a gun with a view to the special object of range. He has always made shell guns, and a very great range is got by a small bore. Sir W. Armstrong has never yet tried firing at an enormous distance alone, but has sought to send a shell that will do the greatest destruction to the enemy; and he observed to me a few days ago, speaking of the Whitworth gun, "That gun will, no doubt, beat mine in range, if it is made for range; but I can make one for range also, and you will then see whether my gun is equal to Mr. Whitworth's." And that is perfectly fair. But we have this assurance, that Sir W. Armstrong's gun has now been tested for a long time; we know its durability. There is one of his guns now at Shroebury that the experiments were first made with. Some guns have burst after 200 rounds have been fired with them; but this gun has fired more than 2,000 rounds; and if you put your finger to the rifling, you will find it just as sharp and perfect as when it left the factory. Then you have the test of lightness and durability. The durability of the Whitworth gun has, of course, yet to be proved, though the material should guarantee that quality. There is great alarm lest Sir W. Armstrong's gun is beaten, and people ask, "What are you to do in that case with all his guns?" But we have Mr. Whitworth's testimony that the Armstrong gun is undoubtedly of the right construction; and the difference between them lies not in the make, but in the manner of rifling them. The question is rather one of the shape of the rifling and of the projectile, than a question of construction; and whichever of the rival inventions is the better we are perfectly safe. We have got a weapon which has not been surpassed, if indeed it has been equalled, and which, moreover, is capable of being adapted to the new process. But Sir W. Armstrong is not the man to be daunted by a difficulty, and there is no doubt that, whatever happens, we shall have from him the best and most admirable weapon that can be made. May I be allowed, on behalf of a valuable public servant, to contradict, as I have been asked to do, a statement which has gone forth respecting the Armstrong guns sent to China? It has been said that the wood of which the carriages were made was so rotten that the screws fell out. Now, these carriages were duly made of the best teak which the carriage factory at Woolwich could produce. I will not speak of the evidence of the men, but the captain of the ship, who had no interest in the matter, said there was no sign of decay about the limber; that the whole weight of the limber pressed upon an iron bar, which was not meant to bear it; and of course it gave way. I may state, as we are now on the subject of arms, that the Enfield rifle is now in the hands of all our regular troops, and of all the embodied militia. It is also available for all the disembodied militia, a considerable number of whom have applied for it, and for volunteer corps. It is available, too, for all pensioners the moment they apply for it, and likewise for the Irish Constabulary, should application be made for it from that quarter. The Enfield is now produced at the rate of 2,000 muskets a week, so that we shall have a good stock on hand, and therefore we stand very well on these points. I go back to the subject of Woolwich, because it involves a very important question. Attention has been called to the fact that it is the only great arsenal and dépôt we have; and it has been urged that not only should Woolwich be fortified, but that another dépôt should be established. I have no doubt we might select some central place for stores, but I do not wish to see another arsenal made. We have already the arsenal of Sir William Armstrong at Elswick; that of Mr. Whitworth at Manchester; we have another on the Mersey, another at Birmingham, and also those of Low Moor and Gospel Oak. There is, in fact, no country in the world so rich in arsenals as England. So great is our repute in this respect, that foreign Governments—the French, the Austrian, and the Russian Governments—all send over here to have munitions of war of all kinds constructed, including rifled guns. Many persons, indeed, have felt greatly alarmed at those proceedings. They say, in fact, that we in England are making weapons that may some day be turned against ourselves. Now, I, for one, do not share in that feeling. In the first place, those foreign Governments, in sending to this country for their munitions of war, are in reality giving practice, skill, and perfection to our arsenals, and not to their own; and the result would be, if a war were to arise, that they would be without the means of augmenting their matériel, and we should step into their shoes and find ourselves immensely benefited by the facilities they have afforded us in this respect. My view is, that we want a central dépôt, but not an additional arsenal. The great mass of the items in the large Vote for Miscellaneous Stores have reference to other munitions of war, including shot and shell. In former years the manufacture of stores in the manufacturing departments at Woolwich for supply to meet outstanding demands, for home and foreign service, were two, three, and even four years in arrear, but by the great exertions which have been made during the past year, these arrears will be all, or nearly all, cleared off, and the demand of the year 1860-61 alone to be met. The amounts are very large, but they make provision for all the different materials that are necessary for the construction of our rifles at Enfield and great guns at Woolwich. I pass over all the Votes in which there are reductions, with the remark that wherever I could fairly make a reduction I have done so. Those reductions have not been large, but I have honestly done my best in that respect. Perhaps I had better say here that Vote 12, for fortifications, has been inserted in a lump sum; but when I come to the Vote I shall only ask the Committee to agree to a small sum on account. Vote 14 is for barracks, and there is one item of it to which I attach some importance—namely, that which provides for a new range at Fleetwood, with the view to the establishment of a school of musketry for the north of England similar to that which exists for the south at Hythe. The great increase in the resort to Hythe of the members of volunteer corps and the militia for practice has rendered that place, as a school of musketry, altogether unequal to the demands upon it; and therefore it is in contemplation to establish another in the north of England, which will be the means of saving a great deal of expense now incurred in moving troops from the northern parts of England and from Scotland to Hythe for the purpose of musketry practice. The Vote also includes a considerable extension of the practice ground at Shoeburyness and a new range at Graves-and for the use of the troops. We have also made provision for gas-works, and for the erection of a gymnasium at Aldershot; for the erection of a new hospital at Woolwich, which is much required, and which will give an increase in the barrack accommodation at that place; and for an experiment which is about to be tried at Colchester, as to whether or not we cannot build huts of brick of a more durable character than the wooden huts now in use, and yet cheaper than barracks. The calculations for this purpose look very well on paper, and I have every confidence in the judgment of Captain Galton, who has undertaken the erection of the huts. It is also in contemplation to increase the barrack accommodation at Nottingham and York, with the view to lessen the inconvenience of troops being broken up and scattered in detachments, a system which is now generally condemned. Provision is also made for the erection of new barracks at Chelsea, and when they are erected, the Portman Street Barracks will no longer be the opprobrium of the metropolis. It is also the intention of the Government, in the case of small, inconvenient, and unhealthy barracks, which are often surrounded by buildings of a worse character, to sell those barracks,—an arrangement by which there can be no doubt the country will derive great advantage on the score of economy, as well as of the increased health and comfort of the troops. I have come now to the end of everything which appears to require explanation. On the Royal Military College I make no observation, because the plans for its improvement and organization, though they may be expected when carried out to have a beneficial effect on that institution, came in too late to receive due consideration. The Votes for the non-effective services require no comment, as they show a slight decrease. In conclusion, these Estimates, I am conscious, are of enormous magnitude, but I trust the Committee will believe that the Government have done their ut-determination in this country to see its defences put on a safe and sound footing that the Committee will not hesitate to Vote the necessary Supplies, and what is more, that the community at large will approve the conduct of their representatives.

"That a sum, not exceeding £4,499,636, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the charge of the Pay and Allowances of Her Majesty's Land Forces at Home and Abroad, exclusive of India, which will come in the course of payment from the 1st day of April 1860, to the 31st day of March 1861, inclusive."

Mr. W. WILLIAMS expressed his opinion that before the Vote was granted time ought to be given for the consideration of these enormous Estimates. He had intended to move a reduction of this Vote, but, as he did not expect to receive any great amount of support, he should not waste time by proposing any Amendment.

Sir JAMES FERGUSSON said, that he had been much gratified by the general statement of the right hon. Gentleman, and he felt assured that the Committee would cheerfully vote the amount asked for, inasmuch as the carrying out of the proposed works would render the national defences far more secure than they had hitherto been, although they might regret that such an immense expenditure was necessary, at a time when the Government assured them that arrangements were in progress which would lead to a settlement of European affairs upon a more peaceful basis. He was glad to find that the increase of the army was to be in rank and file, and not in officers. The right hon. Gentleman had instituted a comparison between the number of officers in the English and in foreign armies, but it must be borne in mind that so many officers were not required in the English army, because we possessed such an excellent body of non-commissioned officers. There was, however, one class of officers which predominated in the British army, as compared with Continental armies; he meant the class of field officers. The English army was the only army in which a battalion was called a regiment. In foreign armies several battalions were included in a regiment, and the consequence was a large increase in the field officers as compared with foreign armies. He rose, however, for the purpose of saying a few words on the subject of the militia. The right hon. Gentleman seemed to have mistaken what fell from him earlier in the evening on that subject. What he asked the right hon. Gentleman was, whether it was his intention to embody from time to time regiments of militia? It never occurred to him that a militia should be a sort of supplementary army. On the contrary, it should be retained, except upon emergencies, as a local force. He hoped, however, attention would be paid to filling up the regiments of militia, for at present commanding officers were refused permission to strike off absentees, so that the establishment in most regiments was thirty or forty per cent below the number borne upon the books. He would also ask whether it was intended to arm the militia with rifles before issuing them to the volunteer corps.

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT: They are armed with them, or they can be had upon application.

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON: He could assure the right hon. Gentleman that great difficulty was found in getting new and improved rifles. It was true that the militia were promised rifles, but they were of the pattern of 1853, and not the new and improved pattern which was to be supplied to the volunteer corps. He thought that the militia being of a more permanent character than the volunteers, they ought to be furnished in the first place with arms of the best description. He knew in his own regiment they were promised rifles, but they had not got them. It was only by supplying the militia with good rifles, so that they could go through a course of good musketry drill, that they could attain their full efficiency. Another point to which he wished to called attention was a remark which had fallen from an hon. Member on the subject of the Staff. He earnestly hoped that the Staff would be made as efficient as the other branches of the service, so as to be worthy of the army itself. He could not, however, allow the kind of slur which had been passed upon the old Staff to pass unnoticed. He considered that when the British army was in the trenches before Sebastopol, taking into account the limited number of men at its disposal, it was a wonder how that Staff had accomplished so much as it did, and the censure lavished upon it was wholly undeserved. He would only add that he felt great satisfaction at the promises held out of increased barrack accommodation, which would considerably improve the health of the men, a subject in which no one took more interest than the officers themselves.

MR. HORSMAN said, he wished to know when the Report of the Commissioners appointed to inquire into the state of the national defences would be laid before Parliament, and when the country would be made acquainted with the determination of the Government consequent upon that Report. He understood that it was intended to recommend that a sum of £10,000,000 should be expended upon the improvement of our defences, and therefore it was a question of great importance.

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT said, he did not think the Commissioners would thank him if he were to publish nakedly the proposals they had made, without giving the House and the country the advantage of knowing the arguments and opinions by which they were supported. He could assure the right hon. Gentleman that he only received the signed and complete Report on Saturday last, and it was impossible for any department to have a more important and grave subject of consideration. Not only defensive, but financial questions were involved, and the best military science was required to decide as to the proportions to be maintained between works and men. It was altogether a subject of great interest, and, while conscious of the great desire which the right hon. Gentleman felt to press his own views, he (Mr. S. Herbert) must ask him not to urge upon the Government to bring forward a premature and crude scheme, but to allow time for a deliberate and careful investigation; so that when they laid a proposal before the House, they might do so with the greatest weight and authority. [MR. HORSMAN:—When shall we have the Report?] He thought nothing would be more unsatisfactory than to throw the Report upon the table without at the same time giving some indication of the views of the Government and the military authorities. In answer to the hon. and gallant Member for Ayr (Sir J. Fergusson), he could only say that the pattern of 1853 was the class of the arms now in use. As fast as the rifles came in, the War Office issued them, always keeping, of course, a sufficient stock on hand. The volunteers were promised a short rifle in substitution of the long one whenever enough were in store; but some corps had come to the conclusion, which he thought was a sound one, that the long Enfield was a more accurate and better weapon. As to the militia regiments, some of them had already got the rifles, and no time would be lost in sending down arms when applied for. He admitted that the state of the disembodied militia was very alarming, the nominal force being greatly above that actually available. The reason why commanding officers were not allowed to strike off the names of absentees was that this, it was found, only added to the number of fraudulent enlistments and desertions. He trusted, however, that by adopting some portions of the Report of the Commission of last year this evil might in some degree be rectified, though he did not pretend that it could be altogether cured. Some legislation would probably be required on this subject, and he should shortly state in detail the proposals of the Government.

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, he had listened attentively to the statement of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War, and could not refrain from availing himself of that opportunity of entering a very respectful, but most earnest protest against the enormous extravagance of our national expenditure, and more particularly with reference to the established instruments of our national defences. Year by year these Estimates increase with so little apparent hope of diminution, that within a short period the effective of the British army had more than doubled, and yet when any attempt is made to introduce or recommend an improved supervision of our public expenditure, as was the case the other night with the Motion of my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Wise) it is sure to be met with a cold supercilious sneer, which even the Chancellor of the Exchequer the other evening condescended to endorse. It is true the Bill, as the French would say, is tres bien dorée with exquisite refinement, and our senses are lulled into forgetfulness by the eloquent appeals which are addressed to us; but it won't do any longer—we want something more than eloquence to induce us year by year to go on voting these immense sums of money which not only affect the rich and wealthy, but which tend to tax the poor man's food, and without reason and justice enhance the burthens we all must share. Therefore, it was, that although he was as anxious as any man in the House, whether military or civilian, to see the comfort of the army, as well as its discipline, placed upon the most efficient footing; yet he thought the time had come when the House should determine not only to protest, but to act in this matter with that spirit and decision which the circumstances of the case absolutely require. Eloquence alone won't do. The House has now had the opportunity of considering the three financial statements which have been so recently submitted to it, namely, the financial statement, the Navy Estimates, and now the Army Estimates; and with reference to the first of these three, if anything could induce the House, even were it otherwise disposed, to vote all the provisions of the Budget, it was the eloquence and power with which the Chancellor of the Exchequer tickled our imaginations and insinuated himself into our pockets. Then, again, as regards the Navy Estimates, if anything could persuade the House to accept without a murmur the official statement of the Secretary for the Admiralty, it was the straightforward frankness and professional skill and ability with which my noble Friend (Lord Clarence Paget) handled his subject. And now, if anything could induce us to forget our sufferings and burdens, and accord a willing approval to every item of these Army Estimates, it is the clear and interesting statement, and the grace with which the right hon. Gentleman has detailed the wants and requirements of the service. But these are the financial field-days of Parliament; it is not very difficult to dress up a statement in gaudy attire, calculated to make us look upon it for the time being with kindness and sympathy even to applaud the performance; but, alas, this is soon over; the stern realities of life soon bring us to our senses, and here we are, at peace with all the world, with a deficit of near £10,000,000 to meet our current expenditure, and with Estimates for the army and navy amounting together to nearly £30,000,000. Perhaps the House would allow him to state one or two facts on this subject. The Army Estimates of 1859-60 showed a decrease in comparison with 1858-9 of £9,695; whereas in the present year (one of peace, be it remembered) Parliament was called upon to vote an increase of £1,982,000. Last year the Navy Estimates showed an increase of £961,810 in comparison with 1858-9; whereas this year there was a net increase over those of 1859-60 of £1,025,000. This was a most serious and almost an appalling state of things. Can we any longer tolerate such an abuse of extravagant expenditure? The right hon. Gentleman had alluded to an estimate of population as bearing on this question, but nothing could be more fallacious than any such test. He had taken some pains to ascertain the sums spent by the Powers of Europe upon their national defences, from which it would appear that France and England were consuming about one-half of their national revenue; Russia, one-third; Austria, as every one knows, is entirely crippled, and in a state of financial bankruptcy; Prussia, about one quarter of her revenue; Belgium, one-third; Sardinia, at least 40 per cent of her resources; Holland, one-fifth; Switzerland, one-tenth; and as to Spain, it was almost impossible to form any estimate of the expenditure of her organization, when we know she took about three months to go about fifteen miles. The right hon. Gentleman had referred to the French Budget. Now in the Budget of 1861, the effective of the French army, like that of the year previous, was 392,000 men, and 83,000 horses. Her total military expenditure amounted to £13,800,000, about £260,000 more than the French Budget for the previous year, while the English Army Estimates were £14,842,000 without the militia, showing an excess over the French Estimates of £1,042,000. This proved the extravagance of our expenditure. The French army contained 56,000 men and 58,000 horses more than the effective of the British army, and yet we spent £1,042,000 more than our neighbours. In 1835-6, the effective of the British army was 80,000 men; in 1850, 99,000; while this year the number was 143,000 men, exclusive of India. Now, it was very remarkable that in 1850 the British soldier cost at the rate of £41 per man, whereas in the present year, taking the whole of the charges for the land force and the number of rank and file, the cost was about £46 per man—£5 more than in 1850. This surely was a fact which required the attention of his right hon. Friend. Notwithstanding our present costly armaments, the Report of the Committee of Public Safety, just alluded to by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Horsman), declared that £10,000,000, if not £20,000,000 would be required to place the country in an efficient state of defence. Now, after the enormous sums of money annually granted by Parliament, it was too bad to come down in a time of peace and ask for such enormous additions to the Estimates. It was constantly affirmed that up to 1850 the state of the country was most satisfactory, and never in a better state of defence. We voted 14 to 16 millions a year, and it was all well; but all of a sudden afterwards they have been constantly told, up and to the present time, that all was wrong, that the country was absolutely undefended, and although Parliament had, in consequence, voted money without grudging, and although we have a larger regular force than ever, yet still we are not only unprepared but absolutely unprotected. He must say that they ought to give credit to those to whom credit was due for the defenceless condition in which the country was stated to be, and the country, at this important crisis of its political history, had a right to demand some explanation of those who for the last fourteen years had, almost without interruption, held political power in this country. He said that they were at peace with all the world; but, at all events, he was correct in saying that they were at peace with all Europe. He would not look to China—they had been asked not to mention that subject—but, though he did not allude to it, the House must feel the confident assurance that as long as the present President of the Board of Trade was in the Cabinet, there could not be any fear of a war with China. He knew that the right hon. Member for Ashton was no longer the Member for Birmingham, and no longer sat in those cheap seats below the gangway, but occupied a more luxurious and dignified position on the Treasury Bench; but still he was quite sure that the right hon. Gentleman considered all the emoluments and patronage of his office as mere dirt in comparison with the maintenance of his political morality. It was impossible, then, so long as the right hon. Gentleman was in the Cabinet, considering the powerful way in which he attacked in this House the noble Member for Tiverton on precisely a similar subject, that there could be any serious disturbance with China. While they were at peace with all the world they were voting away £30,000,000 for warlike purposes. He believed, indeed, that there had been some little uneasiness with respect to France, perhaps more so than for the last ten or twenty years. He recollected that a very few months ago the whole country was seized with panic and rang with rumours of invasion and attack, which even Ministers of State and the Minister for War condescended to promote. Now in common with so many people of all classes and all parties in the country, quite irrespective of politics, he entirely disapproved of the system of getting up excitement in the country by means of these rumours of attack ; and if really any danger existed, surely the Government ought to have duly warned the country instead of endeavouring to shunt upon the shoulders of the people a responsibility which properly belonged to them in their capacity of Ministers, and he believed that those Ministers were worthy of the gravest censure, who, with groundless and inconsiderate zeal had promoted these panics of invasion and attack which, to say the least, were quite unbecoming the dignity and character of our country. He would just ask the House to turn over to Vote No. 5, which had been so lightly touched upon by the right hon. Gentleman. There was a great deal more than met the eye in that Vote. The right hon. Gentleman the Minister for War said he would not take a Vote this year for that old-established force, the Yeomanry, though he was obliged to take £68,000 for the purpose of adjutants' forage, and so on ; but let the House consider that these Volunteer Corps would cost the country ten times more than £68,000. Here was a lot of country attorneys and easy-going provincials costing the country a great deal of money, with a loose way of drill, as he had no doubt it was. He had the utmost contempt for that, for he liked smartness in a soldier. In 1804, when the Volunteer Corps were enrolled, they cost the country £1,000,000 ; and Mr. Pitt obtained soon afterwards £500,000 more for them. Let the House take care that the same thing did not occur now ; for if support were given to these Volunteer Corps, the House might find that they were costing the country a great deal more than they were worth. It would be a fine thing to see these gallant young men come forward if there were danger, but there was no danger. The other day he met a stout young friend of his, who was a volunteer rifleman. He told his friend that he was too stout ; but his friend replied that it was capital fun. " Capital fun ! " he exclaimed, and mentioned to his friend that he had been in Switzerland, and had seen the volunteer riflemen there crawling along on their bellies by the hedgesides for miles, and that he recollected being out during the war of the Sonderbund with a corps of volunteers who passed the whole night in the trees. Nevertheless, his young friend rejoined that it was capital fun—that they had their afternoon parade and patriotic lunch, and were going to have a ball, in full dress uniform, for the ladies, an expensive band, a dinner, and in fact all kinds of conviviality quite unsuited to the rigid habitudes of the army. Now, if there existed any danger he would ask the Committee to increase the regular army and navy, for he concurred in the opinion of the noble Lord the late Commander-in-Chief in Scotland (Viscount Melville), that they could not trust to these men. He honoured him for the manly and fearless way in which he had expressed his opinion. He observed that that noble Lord was no longer the Commander-in-Chief in Scotland, but he hoped that his resignation had nothing to do with the expressions he had used with regard to the volunteer force. One reason in his (Sir R. Peel's) mind for preferring an increase in the army and navy to these Volunteer Corps was based upon grounds the very reverse to what Earl Grey said somewhere in the country. The noble Earl stated that the reason he supported this volunteer force was, because it was an anti-military movement. Such an idea was quite unworthy the noble Earl's position and the office he formerly held, and it was precisely because he (Sir Robert Peel) looked upon the movement as an anti-military one that he so thoroughly disapproved of it. But was there any necessity at the present moment for these Volunteer Corps ? What did the Earl of Derby say in 1852 when asked whether he would countenance them ? The noble Lord said—and this was a manly way of looking at the matter instead of humbugging about it—" that his Government was not prepared to give aid to the formation of Volunteer Rifle Corps, and he (Lord Derby) conceived that the conclusion which had been come to by the (then) late Government (that of Lord John Russell) not to give aid to rifle corps, was a sound and reasonable decision. Were the circumstances of the country different now ? He imagined they were not ; but at any rate there was the old established force of the country—the militia, with which the institution of the country had been familiar since the days of Charles II., and which might be increased, if need be, instead of being disembodied. This question of national defences had always been one of great difficulty with Ministers. He well recollected that in 1852 the noble Member for the City of London brought in a Militia Bill, and the noble Lord the Member for Tiverton came down with his Amendment, and without the slightest desire to displace the noble Member for London, nevertheless ousted that noble Member from office on this very question of national defences. It seemed to be different now. The Government had thought right to give full swing to the Volunteer Rifle movement, and here we are at the present moment under the influence of the provisions of the Act of the 44th Geo III., c. 54. He hoped the Committee would allow him to read—he would not, using the language of the hon. Member for Birmingham, say the “rubbishing trash,” but—the extravagant talk uttered throughout the country for the purpose of keeping alive the fever in favour of the Rifle Corps movement. At Melton Mowbray the chairman of a meeting said—“The time has come when every Englishman will be found employing his leisure hours, whether in town or country, in practising with his rifle.” Another gentleman proposed a fox-hunting corps, on the ground that the French dragoons or cuirassiers would not be able to follow them. There was a meeting at Stockwell, at a place called the Swan—an inn, he supposed—in which a gentleman, called in the newspaper report Mr. D. Seymour—he hoped not his hon. Friend the Member for Poole—expressed the opinion that the volunteer movement was a sort of millennium. Heaven forbid that it should last quite as long as that! Mr. Seymour delivered his oration at the beginning of December, and he calculated that at that time there were 400,000 volunteers in the country, and that in a few days the number would reach 1,000,000. Surely the Minister for War did not mean to spend £10 upon each man in so vast a host. Upon the same day there was a meeting of the Pimlico Fencibles. The chairman, more moderate than the millennium gentleman, thought the enrolled volunteers then numbered 150,000, while The Times of the same date had no doubt that in the aggregate they were more than double what they had been three months before, when the number was calculated at 22,000. An hon. Friend of his towards the close of the year made a most amusing speech at a place called Eye. The poet had well said—

“Where ignorance is bliss 'tis folly to be wise;” for the enthusiastic rifleman, addressing the Suffolk yokels and bumpkins, made their hair stand on end by stating that there were hundreds of thousands of troops on the other side of the Channel waiting to come across. Really, when such extravagant language was used to excite a national zeal for Volunteer Corps, the sooner a stop was put to it the better. Schools were turned to strange purposes now-a-days, and he was not surprised that a rifle meeting had been held in St. Peter's School, Pimlico. One of the speakers, waxing very eloquent indeed, declared that he hoped to see the day when every man in England, like the Swiss, would have a rifle hung behind his door. [Cheers.] No doubt, there were a great many riflemen in Switzerland, but those who cheered should recollect that we paid upwards of £30,000,000 for our army and navy. For his own part, he should like to see the stalwart youth of England turning their attention to some legitimate and useful pursuit, instead of hankering after firearms and knickerbockers. But the climax was still to come. At the same meeting in Pimlico, a Mr. Denman informed his auditors that in 1797 a body of 1,400 French troops landed in Pembrokeshire, but were immediately dispersed by the red petticoats of the Welsh women seen on a distant hill. He must say that Mr. Denman did not offer a very flattering suggestion to the gallant Pimlico Fencibles. “But,” continued the orator—uttering an anachronism which the Pimlico fencibles failed to observe—“Mr. Fox declared that England did not recover from the effects of that descent for twenty years.” It was certainly high time to “show up” meetings at which such speeches were made. Perhaps the Committee would derive a little amusement from the names of some of the rifle corps. The leaders of the movement, judging from their absurd nomenclature, seemed to have gone mad. It was a fact. Certain gentlemen, who had evidently been reading Carlyle's Life of Frederick the Great, were advertising daily in The Times on behalf of a corps, to be called the Six Foot Guards. There were corps composed of the stokers and pokers of the railways. He had already mentioned the Pimlico Fencibles, but what did the Committee think of the Westminster Volunteers of St. John the Evangelist? What in the world St. John the Evangelist had to do with rifle corps he could not for the life of him understand. It was really too bad that so venerable a name should be associated with a band of idle striplings playing at soldiers. There was the Volunteer Corps of the Aldermen and Corporation of London, and last, but not least, there was the Rifle Corps of the Inns of Court. He admired the patriotism of lawyers, but nothing could well be more absurd than the idea of a lot of barristers from the Inns of Court bundling out of chambers with the view of meeting the Cuirassiers of the Imperial Guard in deadly conflict. Serjeant Parry seemed to be an active member of the corps. No doubt that distinguished legal luminary would earn a grade, and become Sergeant-Major Parry. The Serjeant was kept in countenance by Dr. Ball of the Divorce Court or Ecclesiastical Court—a capital name for a soldier—Counsellor Butt, and his old friend of the time of the French Conspiracy Bill, Lawyer Bodkin. These gentlemen, and many more of the same kidney, leaving the study of Coke and Blackstone, were devoting their days and nights to Plutarch's Lives, Cæsar's Commentaries, and The Rifle, How to use it. How heavy lawyers expected to be able to crawl along hedges upon their bellies and climb up trees, he could not comprehend, and he hoped they would not be very much offended if he applied to them the somewhat apt quotation "In medio tutissimus ibis," which, being literally translated, meant "You are a good deal safer in the Middle Temple." It appeared that some of the riflemen had attained great proficiency in shooting; and the other day General Hay, addressing a body of Rifle Volunteers, told them that the French troops as compared with them were mere skirmishers, complimented them upon the accuracy of their shooting, and told them they were really becoming too expert. At Hythe the first prize was carried off by a genuine Cockney. Upon being asked how he had acquired his extraordinary skill and precision, "Oh!" said he, as reported in the columns of The Court Journal, "I live in London, and have had considerable practice in shooting at the cats of my Brompton neighbours." It was not, perhaps, of much consequence in the depth of winter, but no man could tell what a scene London would present at the height of the season. Everybody would be shooting at his neighbour's cat; there would be the stokers of the Railway Rifles poking at the funnels of the North Western, and we should have the Finsbury Filibusters fluking over Cripple-gate. He trusted, however, that before that time a stop would be put to the volunteer movement. In order to get up the excitement, one gentleman said, "Let us get up a Rifle Derby by subscribing £10,000. Switzerland does it; why should it not be done here? You have the Epsom Derby and Lord Derby's Toxopholite. Why not have a Rifle Day at Epsom with Dorling's correct card of the volunteer sportsmen?" But this was not the way to deal with this subject. If there was danger to this country, why did not the Government come forward and say so, and instead of the Minister of War subscribing £10 to the movement, let him give his official salary of £5,000 at once, as one instalment, and call on the country; and they would find the movement general in defence of the institutions of old England. He had followed this movement from its commencement; and if there were any danger of attack the Royal Family, who had the greatest interest of all in the welfare and stability of the country, would be amongst the first to come forward and back up the movement. At present the Royal Family had not patronized it beyond giving their names to a patriotic ball; whereas if danger threatened, the Sovereign of these realms, as of old, would rally the public feeling and exhibit a spirit which would vibrate with one unanimous impulse throughout the length and breadth of England; he believed they would exhibit a spirit that would indeed animate the country. He entirely disapproved of the Vote; and he hoped that when the time came for it to be considered the House would make a gallant stand against this dribbling away of the resources of the country. He had no doubt that in case of attack these men might be very useful. And let it be understood that, in speaking of these volunteers and the collection of large bodies of inhabitants armed for purposes of defence, it is the system and the time of its application that the country appeared to disapprove of, and not, of course, that individual patriotism and zeal which, if necessity required, and indeed under any circumstances, was worthy of the warmest public commendation; but we can never make regular soldiers of the volunteers under the system of loose drill which the Minister of War recommends; and to his (Sir Robert Peel's) mind, it would be infinitely preferable to increase the standing army, enormous though its present proportions are, and to enrol men who, by the force of discipline, would be able to become familiar with the strategy of military tactics, and who would be ten times better able to execute the operations of their general, than we can ever hope to expect from a junction of the Railway Rifles with the Finsbury Filibusters. Therefore he entirely disapproved of this movement, got up under false rumours and the influence of panic. He was prepared to increase the resources of the country and its means of defence; but he believed that the army and the navy, animated by the character of their officers, and by the spirit of patriotism and zeal of the men, were sufficient for all emergencies, for all reasonable purposes of defence, protection, and safety. He wished Gentlemen would get up and induce the Government to reduce these Estimates, and give the House some assurances as regards the future. He believed that he spoke the sentiments of the House, and of the people out of doors, when he said the country was willing to drain themselves to any extent for the defence of the land and for the maintenance and the discipline of the army and navy; but he believed that the resources of the country were being squandered, and he boldly stood up in his place to protest against what he believed to be a most extravagant expenditure of the public money.

COLONEL PERCY HERBERT said, that as a military man he entirely differed from the hon. Baronet (Sir Robert Peel) as to the value of the volunteer movement. The rifle corps, though the hon. Baronet might please to call them Pimlico Fencibles and Finsbury Filibusters, were all volunteers, whilst the French army, though all conscripts, were an actual charge upon the revenues of the State. One question which he wished to put to the right hon. Gentleman was, whether he had turned his attention to the deficient constitution of the line regiments? At present the establishment consisted of 950 men in 12 companies; but this was a very extravagant number in time of peace, and quite inefficient in war. Considering the large proportion of officers to this small number of men, this was a very extravagant establishment for the army.

MR. H. BERKELEY said, he could not but thank the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the War Department for the care he had taken of the volunteer movement. He was silly enough to take a very great interest in the affair from the commencement. The hon. Baronet was a yeomanry officer. [SIR ROBERT PEEL: I was once.] He thought the ire of the hon. Baronet might have been turned upon him, for sometimes he had to bear reproaches for his having doubted the efficiency of the yeomanry.

SIR ROBERT PEEL: I am so entirely of the hon. Gentleman's opinion that I left the corps in consequence.

VOL. CLVI. [THIRD SERIES.]

MR. H. BERKELEY said, he thought the volunteers were very properly disciplined, and if they took pains with themselves they would prove as useful a corps as any from their greater attention to drill, and their practice of the weapons of the day. They went through their evolutions with great spirit, and a more efficient and useful body of men could not be found in any country. He further thought the volunteer movement, useful as being a constitutional movement, tending to put down large standing armies. They might now look for a reduction of the army establishment in time of peace, but this could not be done unless the people were accustomed to the use of arms. They tend to put down those periodical panics arising from fear of an invasion which were the disgrace of the money market and the country. The hon. Baronet had said that this movement had not been encouraged by the Royal Family. But was not the hon. Baronet aware that a Royal Duke was a colonel of one of the London corps? Surely there was some encouragement in this; or let him look at the Levée, intended for the reception of volunteer officers alone. This alone would prove that Her Majesty looked with favourable eyes upon the movement. For himself, he thought that every one who wished well to his country would wish well to the Rifle Volunteers.

COLONEL KNOX said, he entirely agreed with his gallant Friend (Colonel Herbert) as to the expediency of increasing the strength of our infantry regiments. The Staff was much under number, and it would be impossible to keep regiments efficient in the field unless their numerical strength was augmented. When the army went out to the Crimea they were 1,000 strong, but they left nothing behind—no dépôt; and it was only by extraordinary exertions that men could be got together in sufficient numbers to be sent out to replace the casualties. As to barrack accommodation, he wished to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War when the promised barracks in London, the site for which he believed was fixed, would be built? He also wished to know whether the Vote formerly taken for barracks, and not expended, was to be brought forward again, or diverted from that object to make up deficiencies in other matters. As to the volunteer force he would have liked to see it continue self-supporting, as at first proposed, and he hoped the Secretary of State for classes of the French people will be violently opposed to it, and so serious will be the objections felt, and so great the difficulty of recurring to the ordinary mode of legislation in France, that the Emperor, with all his power and appliances, would be unable to pass these reductions through the French Legislature; and it is therefore suggested that you should assist him, and make that matter of treaty which you yourselves have declared ought not in principle to be made matter of treaty. Then, in spite of your own principle and the ill-will created in France, you will enable the Emperor of the French, in accordance with a special law on the subject, by the execution of the Treaty, to give to his acts the power of law, that law being one which he would be unable to pass through the Legislature in the ordinary way. If there be any truth in these statements, the mode adopted certainly appears a singular way of conciliating the people of France, and of commending the Treaty to their approval. I wish now to be informed by the noble Earl opposite what steps the Government propose to take to give effect to the 20th Article of the Treaty. I think I have succeeded in showing that it is absolutely necessary that the assent of Parliament should be given to the Treaty, not impliedly, but positively and absolutely, and by legislative enactment, not dealing with particular parts of it, but reciting the whole Treaty and enacting the assent of Parliament thereto. In that way only can it be applied. I should be glad to hear from the noble Earl that the Government have made up their mind to adopt this course, for then there would be ample time for both Houses of Parliament to consider the Treaty in all its bearings; and I can assure the Government that there is no desire on my part, or on the part of those noble Lords near me, to act with any factious spirit or cause embarrassment to the Government. The first question which presents itself to my mind, as matter for the gravest doubt, is whether it was wise, with respect to any financial arrangements, to bind ourselves hand and foot for ten years; and the next question that occurs is whether, however desirable it may be to extend and increase—and I hope to see them increased and extended—our commercial relations with France, the present is the proper moment to make these alterations, when we have an enormous deficit in the revenue to meet, and when, to obtain the anticipated advantages of this Treaty, we must largely increase and, in point of fact, make permanent a system of taxation which has hitherto been reserved for periods of emergency and war, but which if you impose at 10d. in the pound in time of peace, you are establishing as a portion of the ordinary revenue, never to be got rid of, and are thus depriving yourselves of a most powerful engine for raising an extraordinary revenue in time of any great and sudden emergency. I object to some articles in the Treaty on their own merits, and to others not on their own merits, but because I conceive, that even should the agreeable anticipations of the Chancellor of the Exchequer be borne out, this is not the moment to enter into these stipulations; and if it were, I consider that the substitute you propose to provide the requisite revenue is most objectionable in time of peace, and should be reserved for cases of war or extreme emergency. The noble Earl concluded by moving—

“That there be laid before the House, copies of so much of the Journals of the two Houses of Parliament as relate to the Proceedings in respect of the Commercial Treaty with France in 1787.”

THE EARL of HARDWICKE was understood to say, that during the late war with Russia two vessels belonging to a Danish port were seized and confiscated as carrying cargoes contraband of war, such cargoes being coals.

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, the charge against the Government of having shrouded their proceedings with regard to the Treaty in secrecy may be retorted against the noble Earl; for on this occasion secrecy appears to have marked his own conduct to a very noticeable degree. On Friday the noble Earl comes down to the House, and gives a notice regarding the Treaty which no one could have regarded but as the notice of a casual inquiry as to the intended mode of proceeding. But, if the noble Earl intended to open up the whole question of the principle and details of the Treaty and of the policy that had dictated it, and to favour your Lordships with a speech an hour-and-a-half in length, criticising it, it would have been just as well for the noble Earl to have given such a notice as would have been convenient to the Government and the House; for I dare say that many Peers are absent who would have liked to be present had they imagined that the noble Earl meant to make a long speech. Judging, however, from the brilliant audience in the side galleries, the noble Earl's secret appears to have become known to some parties. I admit that the questions put by the noble Earl are perfectly fair and Parliamentary, and the Government have no desire whatever to withhold the fullest information, not only upon the course of proceeding they propose to adopt, but as to all the facts of the case. The noble Earl at the outset of his speech stated that he was not going into the merits, yet the whole hour and a half over which that speech extended was occupied in criticising and objecting to it. He (Earl Granville) denied that the charge of secrecy brought by the noble Earl against the Government was maintainable. It was obvious that in cases of this sort it would lead to inconvenience, and embarrass negotiations, if public notice were given that a Treaty of Commerce was being negotiated; but in this instance it was impossible for the Government to give notice, for they were not only not committed to the Treaty, but up to the date of the despatch from Lord Cowley which has been mentioned to-night the Government was not in the slightest degree committed to any negotiation whatever. They knew, indeed, that a distinguished public man had been in communication with influential members of the French Government, and had found a great disposition on their part to remove the commercial restrictions which existed between the two countries. But Mr. Cobden at that time had no authority from us—he never pretended that he had—to negotiate a treaty; and it was not until Count Walewski made a formal request on the subject, that Lord Cowley and Mr. Cobden were empowered by the Government to commence negotiations. Although the noble Earl discussed the Treaty at considerable length, I observed that during the whole of his speech he carefully avoided committing himself on the question of reciprocity. Whether he is in favour of reciprocal treaties, as he was a short time ago, or whether he has adopted those more liberal opinions which are now in vogue, I am at a loss to know. The noble Earl next entered into some criticism as to the wording of the correspondence, the object and bearing of which I confess I am at a loss to understand; but with regard to the mode in which the despatch was addressed to Lord Cowley and Mr. Cobden, I do not see how it could very well be addressed otherwise than it was. The noble Earl proceeded to accuse the Government of having departed from the precedent set by Mr. Pitt in 1787, and of having interposed unnecessary delay in producing the Treaty; but the noble Earl omitted to state that Mr. Pitt's treaty was known a considerable time before the meeting of Parliament, whereas it was impossible to produce the present Treaty immediately after the meeting of Parliament, for the simple reason that it was not ratified. The only delay which occurred after the ratification was caused by the illness of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and arose from a desire on the part of the Government to have all its provisions and bearings explained at the same time. The noble Earl, when describing the course pursued by Mr. Pitt, adverted to the debates which took place in both Houses of Parliament, and even quoted some of the observations of Mr. Fox. I frankly confess that it is a matter of great regret to me, who have always entertained a traditional and historical respect for Mr. Fox, and also, I may add, for the late Earl Grey, who was one of the most practically liberal of men on all the great principles of civil and religious liberty, to find that in the debates of 1787 upon subjects of commercial policy, they were as completely in the wrong as they possibly could be. The noble Earl has told us that Mr. Fox opposed Mr. Pitt's treaty because it was made with our "natural enemies" the French. Some members of the Opposition went even further, and objected to the treaty, because, if carried, it would compel Parliament to act upon the objectionable doctrine of free trade with Ireland. The debates of 1787 show that the greatest men are not well informed upon every subject, and that—as Whig historians have admitted—Mr. Fox and Mr. Grey were inferior to Mr. Pitt with respect to the principles of commercial legislation. But certainly this is no ground for quoting their opinions against the course which Her Majesty's Government propose to take upon the present occasion. The noble Earl was quite correct when he said that the first step taken by Mr. Pitt's Government with the view of obtaining Parliamentary sanction to the treaty with France was to submit it to a Committee of the whole House; but the noble Earl did not point out the difference which exists between the two cases. Mr. Pitt's treaty and the measures which he founded upon it related only to France, and did not affect our general Customs' duties, whereas our treaty and the corresponding repeal and remissions of duties are applicable, not to France alone, but to the whole world.

classes of the French people will be violently opposed to it, and so serious will be the objections felt, and so great the difficulty of recurring to the ordinary mode of legislation in France, that the Emperor, with all his power and appliances, would be unable to pass these reductions through the French Legislature; and it is therefore suggested that you should assist him, and make that matter of treaty which you yourselves have declared ought not in principle to be made matter of treaty. The debates of 1787 show that the greatest men are not well informed upon every subject, and that—as Whig historians have admitted—Mr. Fox and Mr. Grey were inferior to Mr. Pitt with respect to the principles of commercial legislation. But certainly this is no ground for quoting their opinions against the course which Her Majesty's Government propose to take upon the present occasion. The noble Earl was quite correct when he said that the first step taken by Mr. Pitt's Government with the view of obtaining Parliamentary sanction to the treaty with France was to submit it to a Committee of the whole House; but the noble Earl did not point out the difference which exists between the two cases. Mr. Pitt's treaty and the measures which he founded upon it related only to France, and did not affect our general Customs' duties, whereas our treaty and the corresponding repeal and remissions of duties are applicable, not to France alone, but to the whole world.

We cannot, therefore, follow precisely the course adopted by Mr. Pitt. The noble Earl says, that Mr. Pitt embodied in the Resolutions he submitted to the Committee all the important clauses of the treaty. That is not strictly correct. What Mr. Pitt embodied in his Resolutions were those clauses of the treaty which affected our Customs' duties, with the addition of that "most favoured nation" clause which in 1787 was without precedent, but which has since been repeatedly adopted without any reference to Parliament whatever. With regard to the intentions of the Government, they propose to proceed in strict accordance with what was stated in "another place" last week. Our wish is to give the most ample information to Parliament, to afford ample opportunity for discussion, and to obtain its assent to the propositions of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and then to ask the assent of Parliament to the whole Treaty in the regular way. In the House of Commons a discussion will be taken in the first instance upon all those Customs' duties which either directly or indirectly are connected with the Treaty. If the Resolutions are passed, the House will then be asked to agree to an Address to the Crown on the subject of the Treaty. When that is done—though I am not sure it is in accordance with any modern Parliamentary precedent to submit Customs' Resolutions to this House—the Resolutions and Address passed by the Commons will be communicated to your Lordships, and your Lordships may then proceed, in the same way as in 1787, to consider the Resolutions, and to concur in the Address to the Crown. The noble Earl wants us to go even further than Mr. Pitt, and, relying upon the 20th Article, he calls upon us to embody the whole of the Treaty in an Act of Parliament. But the 20th is not the only clause which relates to this point. The 14th, which follows a series of engagements on the part of Her Majesty, states that "the present Treaty shall be binding for the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland so soon as the necessary legislative sanction shall have been given by Parliament." Then follow several Articles in which the Emperor of the French makes certain engagements to Her Majesty. It seems to have occurred to the French negotiators at this point that, while the French Government was bound firmly enough, the British Government was not bound except in a certain eventuality—namely, unless they were authorized by the assent of Parliament. Hence the following Article:—

"The present Treaty shall not be valid unless Her Britannic Majesty shall be authorized by the assent of Her Parliament to execute the engagements contracted by Her in the Articles of the present Treaty."

Observe the words are "the assent of Her Parliament," not, as in the 14th Article, "the legislative sanction" of Parliament. In the latter case Parliament means Queen, Lords, and Commons; in the former it means the two Houses only—which cannot pass an Act of the Legislature. I submit, then, that we shall meet all the requirements of the Treaty by agreeing to an Address to the Crown, and by passing the Customs' Bill, which must be introduced to legalize all that is inconsistent with the present law. The noble Earl divided the Treaty into two parts—one commercial, the other political; but I must confess I do not know where the political stipulations of the Treaty are to be found. The noble Earl, I am aware, referred to Clauses 3 and 11. As to Clause 3, I certainly regret that the French Government should have desired its insertion. It does not add the slightest force to existing legislation, and was only admitted in order to prevent all possible misconstruction of the previous clauses. I regret the introduction of that third clause, because it is to a certain extent injurious to our interests, and also because it is, undoubtedly, infinitely more injurious to their own. Its effect will only be to stand in the way of their reaping the full advantages of free trade by taxing themselves in a circuitous manner. But, said the noble Earl, if you had only retained your navigation laws, what a powerful lever you would have had now to bring the French to reason. When we repealed the navigation laws, we repealed them for our own interest. I am disposed to believe that we could not have retained those duties even if we would, but I think that when we found it was for our own interest to repeal them the Government were right to do so at once, even though France was not ready to make any agreement on the subject. I am thankful and delighted that we did repeal those duties at that time instead of waiting till now. As to the 11th clause, relating to the export of coal, it has already been fully discussed by your Lordships, and I think the noble Earl has not been able to make out any case against it. And I do not like to weary your Lordships by going over the same ground again. That clause

VALUATION OF RATEABLE PROPERTY (IRELAND) BILL.—SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Mr. LAING explained that the cost which this measure would throw upon the Consolidated Fund did not exceed £5,000 a year; but from the greatly improved valuation returns, a direct benefit equal to at least £50,000 or £60,000 would be derived.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

VOLUNTEER CORPS.—QUESTION.

In answer to a question put by Lord VIVIAN,

EARL DE GREY and RIPON said, it was the intention of the Government, as far as it was possible, to unite the volunteer companies into battalions, but it was not their intention to require those companies which were scattered about the rural districts to leave their homes and meet together for battalion drill when it might be inconvenient to them to do so. If any of the companies were willing to meet together to have a few field days in the year, that would be a private arrangement between the different companies, but Her Majesty's Government would not compel them to unite for battalion drill. The object of the Government was simply this:—If the volunteer force were called out for actual service, they must be formed into battalions, and the Government, therefore, thought it desirable that they should be got together, whenever it was practicable, for battalion practice under a recognized commanding officer. It was the intention of the Government, as he had stated the other night, to appoint adjutants to the volunteer corps, to be paid by the Government. The noble Lord argued that the Government might appoint the adjutants and sergeants of the permanent staff of the disembodied militia for this duty. But it was not a part of the bargain with these adjutants and sergeants that they should perform this duty, and he doubted whether the Government could compel them to discharge it. It was therefore thought better to appoint officers specially devoted to this purpose. If ever an emergency should arise which rendered it necessary to call out the volunteer corps, the militia would also be required at the same moment, and, as the adjutants could not be in two places at once, the militia, when they wanted their officers, could not have them without denuding the volunteers of them. What the volunteers most wanted were drill and organization under good officers, and the best assistance the Government could give them was to provide them with good military officers, which they considered much better than clothing and paying them. As to paying the volunteer artillery so much for drill, as the noble Lord recommended, it must be recollected that the artillery volunteers, like the rifle corps, were engaged upon such terms that upon fourteen days' notice they could retire from the service. The Government might expend a great deal of money, for example, upon a particular individual, and then, when they wanted his services, he might retire from the corps. If the volunteers were remunerated the whole system upon which the army was paid must be altered; and this the Government were not prepared to recommend.

DELHI PRIZE MONEY.

PAPER MOVED FOR.

LORD BERNERS moved that an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty for

"Copy of Despatch, in July, 1858, signifying the Approval of the late Board of India Directors to the Regulations proposed by the Governor General on the Subject of the Delhi Prize Money, and all subsequent Correspondence which might tend to explain the Delay that has taken place in satisfying the just Expectations of the Army which effected the Capture of the City."

His Lordship also inquired the Cause of Delay in distributing the Medals and Clasps granted by Her Majesty for the Capture of Delhi, announced in the House of Commons, March 25, 1858, by General beneficial to our country, declined to accept of any delay, and resolved to take the only right and wise course—that of making the remissions at once, without waiting for any corresponding remissions on the part of France. As to this question of one-sidedness in the Treaty, it is very strange to observe some of the most eminent statesmen in France deploring the formation of the Treaty in the strongest possible language, as all for the good of England and absolutely ruinous for the best commercial and manufacturing interests of their own country; and at the same time to hear it said in England, though not in quite such strong language, that the Treaty is all for the advantage of France and that the bargain is a very bad one for ourselves. It is a logical impossibility that both these opinions can be correct. For my own part, if I were a Protectionist—I recollect indeed it having been said by one of your Lordships that the animal was only to be got at by digging down into a deep substratum of the earth; but I am not sure of that, for I believe that a few specimens may be found on the surface of the earth in a state of suspended animation—but if I were a Protectionist I might logically hold that a treaty of this kind would be injurious to both countries; but as a free-trader from the beginning of my public life, as one who has watched the glorious effect of every restriction removed from commerce, I believe we shall find the result of this Treaty most beneficial to both of the nations concerned. The noble Earl spoke of Mr. Cobden's having been brought forward to bear all the obloquy of the arrangement, and of Lord Cowley having washed his hands of the business. I can assure your Lordships that such a conception can only arise from the modest language which Lord Cowley uses when speaking of his exertions in order to give all the credit to Mr. Cobden; but on the other hand Mr. Cobden wishes it to be known that he received the greatest possible advantage from the experience, sagacity, and judgment of Her Majesty's Ambassador at Paris. I do not consider this the establishment of free trade in France, but only the beginning of free trade, and when the noble Earl says that this measure of free trade is avowedly forced upon the French people against their will, I say that is not a fair way of putting the question. [The Earl of DERBY was understood to explain that what he had said was, that the Emperor of the French had taken the present course because he would have found great difficulty in passing the Treaty through the Legislative Chamber.] I think the noble Earl will not deny that upon the whole the Emperor of the French has a pretty clear perception of what is agreeable to the nation he rules over, and there is the greatest possible difference between doing what is distasteful to the whole people and finding a difficulty in dealing with certain Chambers in which the influence of great protected interests—as had sometimes happened in this country—is sure to be loudly heard. And your Lordships may depend upon it that if the Emperor had not seen that the Commercial Treaty, when it comes into operation, will be of great advantage to the people of France, and be popular among the great mass of the consumers, he would not have proposed such a negotiation. I entertain no doubt that the more free trade is adopted in France, the more it will be extended, and the more the necessity of breaking down the artificial restrictions that now exist upon French commerce will be seen. For my own part, I feel the greatest satisfaction that this Treaty has been negotiated under Her Majesty's present Government.

EARL GREY: My noble Friend (Earl Granville) does not, it appears to me, estimate fully the importance of the question put by the noble Earl opposite. That question is one of great importance—namely, in what manner this Treaty is to be brought under the consideration of Parliament. In order to explain my views, I trust that your Lordships will permit me, as shortly as I can, at an hour which I know is inconvenient, to point out what I understand to be the difference between the course which Her Majesty's Government propose to take and that which was taken by Mr. Pitt. In 1787 Mr. Pitt moved for papers relative to the convention, and then in Committee of the Whole House he moved Resolutions affirming the main provisions of the Treaty. My noble Friend says it is not necessary to do that, because in 1787 Mr. Pitt proposed to legislate with reference to France only; whereas in the present year the reductions of duty are general, and apply to every country in the world. Let me point out that my noble Friend has fallen into a mistake, and a very important one. The Resolutions moved by Mr. Pitt in Committee on the commercial treaty were not the foundation of any legislation at all. If your Lordships refer to the Journals it

"The present Treaty shall not be valid unless Her Britannic Majesty shall be authorized by the assent of Her Parliament to execute the engagements contracted by Her in the Articles of the present Treaty."

Now, when I first read this Article, I thought that it was inserted for the purpose—certainly a very proper and desirable purpose—of giving to this and the other House of Parliament the fullest opportunity of discussing the Treaty in all its provisions and all its parts; and to enable us to enter on that discussion without the apparent inconvenience of a want of consideration for the dignity of the Crown, if Parliament should discuss the propriety of assenting to that which Her Majesty had already personally ratified. That difficulty was altogether, of course, avoided, if in the Treaty itself Her Majesty had stipulated merely that she would recommend to Parliament the terms of the Treaty, and that it was not to be valid unless Parliament signified its assent. But, on looking into the correspondence, I find that the Article is to be understood, not in the English but in the French sense; and I find the reason assigned by Lord John Russell for its insertion. The noble Lord says:—

"It might probably be arranged that these proposals should be made to Parliament, and that the Treaty should be communicated to Parliament, at the same time that the Emperor should, under the French law, announce to the Legislative Body the conclusion of that engagement. But if the conditional form of the stipulation on the side of Her Majesty's Government should appear to the Government of France to require any corresponding form on its own side, then the engagements made by France might, in the body of the Treaty itself, be made contingent on the adoption of the proposals by Parliament."

But whatever may be the object or intention of this Article, the fact is, that it not only gives to Parliament an ample opportunity, but confers upon it the absolute right and duty of discussing and giving absolute assent to the Treaty as it now stands. My Lords, I am not on this occasion about to enter into the merits of the Treaty. The object for which I rise is to obtain from Her Majesty's Government the assurance that the most ample opportunity will be given to Parliament, in conformity with the 20th Article, of considering and discussing the Treaty in all its details. Nor am I at all concerned to say whether or not the Treaty is in accordance with the theoretical principles of free trade. That question was very ably discussed on the first night of the Session by a noble Earl whom I see opposite (Earl Grey), who entered very fully into his views on that subject. and who said, in his judgment, the Treaty was entirely at variance with the principles of free trade. But whether it be at variance with those principles or not, there is no question that it is entirely at variance with the principles laid down by some of the leading members of Her Majesty's Government some three or four months ago. Nay, my Lords, your Lordships will recollect—for it is not so long ago—that on the 21st of July last Mr. Bright, a very distinguished Member of the other House of Parliament, suggested to that House the course of policy which he would recommend to be pursued with regard to France, not with reference, however, to any commercial advantages, but with reference to the preservation of peace, and with the view of obviating the necessity of continuing our great armaments. This is what Mr. Bright said:—

"I would not commission Lord Cowley to make a great demonstration of what he was about to do; but I would make this offer to the French Government, and I would make it with a frankness that could not be misunderstood; if it were accepted on the other side it would be received with enthusiasm in England, and would be marked as the commencement of a new era in Europe. I would say to the French Government, 'We are but twenty miles apart, the trade between us is nothing like what it ought to be, considering the populations of the two countries, their vast increase of productive power and their great wealth. We have certain things on this side which now bar the intercourse between the two nations. We have some remaining duties which are of no consequence either to the revenue or to protection, which everybody has given up here, but they still interrupt the trade between you and us. We will reconsider these and remove them. We have also an extraordinarily heavy duty upon one of the greatest products of the soil of France—upon the light wines of your country.'"

He goes on to say:—

"The only persons whom the French Emperor cannot cope with are the monopolists of his own country. If he could offer to his nation 30,000,000 of the English people as customers, would not that give him an irresistible power to make changes in the French tariff which would be as advantageous to us as they would be to his own country?"—[3 Hansard, clv., 202.]

I must do Mr. Bright, therefore, the justice to say that he does not propose a Commercial Treaty. He recommends that the overture should be made for the sake of peace, and in the belief that France would be disposed to make corresponding advances. How stands the question as stated on that occasion by the noble Lord the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, description of silk goods, in which the artistic skill and taste of the French give them an advantage, our silk manufacturers cannot compete with their French rivals. But there are silks of a plainer and stronger pattern, in which our mechanical skill and the perfection of our machinery give our manufacturers a great advantage; and if these goods were admitted into France, an advantageous business could be done in this description of goods, and their admission into France at the same time that finer French goods are admitted here, would afford employment to many of the hands likely to be thrown out of work by the inability of our manufacturers to sustain the competition with France in fabrics of this description. In like manner it would be for the advantage of France that the admission of those British silks which may supersede some of their own, should take place at the same time that a great increase of employment was afforded to another branch of the French silk trade by the opening of our market. Thus, it would be for the interest of both countries that an interchange of their silk goods should take place in a manner which the provisions of the Treaty will not admit. Our manufacturers will, I think, have much to say in support of this view of the subject and against the provisions of the Treaty as it stands. I do not say whether the case they will be able to bring forward will be capable of being made out. This is not the right time for entering into that question, but I do say that the parties ought to be heard. All I now ask is that this and the other House of Parliament should have an opportunity of fully considering these questions, and of discussing how far it is right to accept the arrangements made by the Government in the negotiations with France before we actually make the concessions that are asked of us. If you had followed the course pursued by Mr. Pitt, the difficulties now experienced would have been obviated. If that precedent had been followed, Resolutions to carry the Treaty into effect would have been moved by the Government in a Committee of the House of Commons upon the Treaty, and not upon the Customs Act. In a Committee on the Treaty, Resolutions pointing to its amendment might have been moved, and, if adopted, would have afforded grounds for moving an humble Address to Her Majesty asking Her to reopen the question with France, and to endeavour to obtain such modifications of it as are necessary.

This course, I say, would have been open to either House of Parliament to pursue, if the precedent of Mr. Pitt had been followed. But the effect of the course taken by Her Majesty's Government is to deprive Parliament of this opportunity of deliberation. The House of Commons, in a Committee on the Customs Acts, cannot consider any Motion tending to a revision of the Treaty—it can only decide whether it will or will not consent to the reductions of duty promised to France which will be proposed to it; and if it adopts the Resolutions proposed for that purpose as soon as they are reported to the House and agreed to, they will come at once into operation, so that when it afterwards proceeds to consider the Treaty, and when the Treaty is brought before this House, as we are promised that it shall be, the time will be past for discussing it with advantage, since all the advantages accorded to France will already have been granted, and it will be impossible to recall them without extreme inconvenience to our own trade. The noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Derby) has expressed his opinion that a distinct Act of Parliament is necessary to give effect to the Treaty in consequence of the manner in which one of the clauses is worded. On comparing the words of this part of the Treaty with those of the corresponding provisions in that of 1787, I admit there is some awkwardness in the expressions now used, but still I do not think they have the effect the noble Earl supposes. The assent of Parliament which the Treaty requires for its coming into operation will, I think, be sufficiently given by the passing of the Acts for reducing the several duties which it stipulates for repealing. At all events, if there is the slightest doubt upon this point, it can be removed by a convention between the two Governments declaring this to be all the Treaty was intended to require.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL thought his noble Friend (Earl Grey) exaggerated the difference that existed between the mode of dealing with this Treaty and the mode adopted by Mr. Pitt. The difference of treatment arose out of the different natures of the two transactions. The two transactions were essentially different in their nature, and there was no change in the mode of dealing with the present one that was not made absolutely necessary by the difference that existed. The Resolutions moved by Mr. Pitt had reference to a Treaty that related exclusively to France. Now, the present Treaty had a general decision upon its merits. I cannot imagine the reason why so much mystery should have been observed with regard to the share which Mr. Cobden has had in this matter; and yet up to the very moment when the Treaty was laid before Parliament Mr. Cobden's name had never been mentioned in connection with its negotiation. The correspondence with regard to the Treaty is of the most meagre character, and indicates an amount of haste in the framing and execution of the Treaty which I must say is not creditable. On the 23rd of December, Lord Cowley writes to Lord John Russell to say that confidential communications had been going on for some weeks past between Mr. Cobden, on the one hand, and M. Rouher, the Minister of Commerce, on the other, having for their object, with regard to exports from Great Britain, the suppression of the prohibitive system which prevails in France in respect to certain articles of British production and manufacture, as also a modification of the tariff in regard to others; and, with regard to exports from France, the admission into the United Kingdom of various articles of French manufacture free of duty, and the reduction of other duties now levied on French productions. Lord Cowley goes on to say:—

"Count Walewski having requested to see me, I waited upon his Excellency yesterday, when he informed me that he had had a long conversation with Mr. Cobden, which might lead to very important results, if, as he had reason to believe, Mr. Cobden had the countenance of Her Majesty's Government. I should see, however, from the sequel of what he had to say to me, that before going any further it was absolutely necessary for him to know accurately the views and intentions of Her Majesty's Government."

On the 17th of January, only one week before the meeting of Parliament, Lord John Russell sends a letter which certainly, in point of form, is somewhat singular, beginning,—

"My Lord and Sir.—Having received from Earl Cowley an intimation that in an interview which he had had with Count Walewski on the 22nd ult., that Minister stated the bases on which, according to the views of the French Government, a treaty of commerce might be concluded with England, I have now to acquaint you that Her Majesty has been pleased to appoint you jointly the Plenipotentiaries to negotiate such a treaty."

With this power given on the 17th of January, 1860, accompanied with the directions which Lord John Russell thought it necessary to send, I find Lord Cowley writing to Lord John Russell on the 23rd of January, acknowledging the receipt of his letter of the 17th, by which powers were conferred on Mr. Cobden and himself to act as joint Plenipotentiaries, and stating that the Treaty had been that day signed. I must do Lord Cowley the justice to say that in this letter he washes his hands completely of the matter. He speaks in the most complimentary terms of Mr. Cobden, and the share that gentleman took in the matter; he intimates that he (Lord Cowley) had nothing to do with the Treaty; that it was really not his Treaty; that he was present at its negotiation as Her Majesty's Plenipotentiary, but that, in point of fact, he had nothing to do with it, and merely assumed the character of a sleeping partner. He says:—

"Since the receipt of that despatch, Mr. Cobden and I have been daily for several hours engaged with Messrs. Baroche and Rouher, the French Plenipotentiaries, in the performance of the duties intrusted to us. The way had been so completely cleared by Mr. Cobden's previous active exertions that the task which I have had to perform has been comparatively light."

Powers to negotiate having been conveyed on the 17th of January, and everything having been completed by the 23rd, the Treaty was ratified on the 31st. I say there has been an appearance of haste in the concoction of the Treaty, and an apparent desire to take Parliament by surprise as to its articles, and I shall be glad to hear from the noble Earl opposite any explanation to show that those impressions are not justified. I think, however, it may be useful to compare the course pursued by Her Majesty's Government upon the present occasion with the course pursued under nearly similar circumstances by Mr. Pitt in 1787, upon the occasion of his negotiating a treaty of commerce and navigation with France. The objects which the present Government have in view in making this Treaty were precisely the same as Mr. Pitt had in view in 1787. In the Speech from the Throne on the latter occasion the Treaty is referred to in terms which I presume the present Government would not object to have applied to their own Treaty. The King said:—

"I have concluded a Treaty of Commerce and Navigation with the Most Christian King. I must recommend you to take such measures as you may think proper to carry it into effect. I trust you will find the provisions contained in it such as will offer an encouragement to industry, and lead to an extension of lawful commerce in both complaints made by the inhabitants of Weymouth of some irregularities on the part of sailors; since these complaints sailors had not been allowed to leave the neighbourhood of the ports at which their ships were lying. The captain alluded to by the hon. and gallant Gentleman had not been reprov'd; but the general order would remain in force.

AGRICULTURAL DISTRESS (IRELAND).

QUESTION.

MR. LANIGAN said, he would beg to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether Her Majesty's Government have been informed of the distress that at present prevails among the agricultural labouring class in Ireland, who are left unemployed in consequence of the unwillingness and reluctance of the Tenant Farmers in that country to employ labour or invest capital in the permanent improvement of their Farms as long as Landlords possess the power of eviction without compensation; whether there are any funds at the disposal of Government to meet such a case; and whether there is any intention of introducing such a Bill this Session as will have the effect of removing the cause of this distress?

MR. CARDWELL said, he fully concurred with the hon. Gentleman in thinking that any measure for the improvement of the tenantry in Ireland would be most beneficial to the country generally. He was happy to assure him that a vast improvement in the agriculture of Ireland had recently taken place, and he hoped it would be attended with a corresponding improvement in the condition of the tenantry. He had already given notice of his intention to bring in a Bill to facilitate those improvements, and he trusted that it would prove successful in effecting the objects which it had in view.

CASE OF GIOVANNI PORPA.

QUESTION.

MR. T. DUNCOMBE said, he rose to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs if he has inquired into the truth of the allegations contained in the Petition of Giovanni Porpa, a naturalized British subject, presented on the 26th day of January last, complaining of wrongs inflicted upon him by the Neapolitan Government; and, if proved to be true, whether he has taken any steps to obtain the Petitioner redress?

Lord Clarence Paget

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, he had been informed by Lord Malmesbury that the Petitioner, though naturalized in England, was a born subject of the King of Naples; in accordance, therefore, with the usual custom in such cases, the answer to the Petition was, that nothing could be done to take the case out of the jurisdiction of the Neapolitan tribunals. He had not made any further inquiries into the allegations of the Petition.

THE NEW BRONZE COINAGE.

QUESTION.

MR. W. EWART said, he would beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when the new bronze coinage, to be substituted for the copper coinage, is likely to be issued?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he should appeal to the indulgence of his hon. Friend, inasmuch as he had not had an opportunity of consulting with the Master of the Mint, owing to the great pressure of business. He could, however, tell him that the cause of delay was to be found in that most delicate part of the operation—namely, the execution of the design by the artist. He was most unwilling to interfere with the intention of accelerating the work, as the result might be the production of a design which possibly would not be considered satisfactory. He would, however, inquire into the subject in a few days. He was not aware of any other reason why they should not proceed immediately with the execution of the work.

TRADE WITH JAPAN.—QUESTION.

MR. CLIFFORD said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs if he has any objection to lay on the table of the House any Copies or Extracts of communications received from Mr. Consul-General Alcock relative to the establishment and temporary suspension of trade in Japan?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, he had no objection to the production of the correspondence.

WINE AND BEER LICENCES.

QUESTION.

MR. EDWIN JAMES said, he would beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether he is prepared to state the extension of time equivalent to that very short period of which Mr. Fox so bitterly complained in 1787. Now I must ask your Lordships to recollect that in the treaty of 1787 there was no such article as the 20th Article in the present Treaty—nothing specifically requiring the assent of Parliament to be given to the articles of the treaty, except in so far as such consent must be necessary to carry out the financial portion of the treaty. But Mr. Pitt's course was this:—He first moved three Resolutions affirming the main commercial stipulations of the treaty, and those Resolutions were separately discussed in the House of Commons. The Motion was made on the 12th of February. The first Resolution was adopted on the same day, the second was adopted on the 15th, and the third on the 16th; and the whole Resolutions were reported on the 19th. I find, then, that these Resolutions, involving the commercial points, having been reported, Mr. Pitt thought it necessary to move an Address to the Crown thanking His Majesty for having concluded the treaty, and signifying approval of its provisions. When these Resolutions and the Address had been adopted by the House of Commons, the next step taken by the Government of that day was to communicate them to your Lordships' House. I beg your Lordships to consider the great importance, in a matter of this kind, of your being able to exercise your deliberate judgment without being told that "you have no power practically to deal with this question, because it involves money considerations, and you have no power to make amendments." It is of the utmost importance that you should have a full opportunity for discussing this Treaty in its financial and political bearings wholly independent of the other House. When those Resolutions were communicated from the House of Commons, a species of protest was entered by Lord Stormont, and a Motion made to the effect that the Address and Resolutions of the House were not to bind the House in its legislative capacity, even with regard to measures which might be founded upon the Resolutions and the Address—that they were to be equally at liberty to discuss each and every portion of the Treaty as much as if the Resolutions and the Address had not been agreed to at all. Now, what was the objection made to that Motion? Not that it was improper, but that it was wholly unnecessary, as it could not be for a moment supposed that by agreeing to those Resolutions the House precluded itself from any further deliberation or decision upon the subject. Let me remind your Lordships who were the men who took part in those great and protracted debates—men great and eminent, although some of the opinions expressed may now appear to be unreasonable, and more particularly the language of Mr. Fox, which tended to excite hostility between the two countries, declaring the impossibility of our being on good terms with France, and that it was our duty to keep aloof from them. Mr. Fox held those doctrines, which I think were wrong; and in the discussions which took place it appears to me that Mr. Pitt had much the best of it. Those discussions are well worthy the consideration of any of your Lordships who can spare time to refer to them; and in many respects those discussions are particularly applicable to the present occasion. Among those who took part in those debates, and among whom there was no difference of opinion as to the propriety of the course that was adopted, and the necessity for giving the fullest consideration of Parliament to the provisions of the treaty, were Pitt, Fox, Burke, Windham, Francis, Grenville, Wilberforce, and last, but not least, my late venerable and respected Friend, Earl Grey, who upon that occasion, as Mr. Grey, made his first Parliamentary effort. The course which Mr. Pitt and the Government of that day took, after having given full time for the consideration of the provisions of the treaty, was to move Resolutions, and then to send them to the House of Lords, with an Address to the Crown approving of the treaty, in order that there might be a joint Address to the Crown from both Houses. Afterwards, undoubtedly, there was considerable objection taken to the course which Mr. Pitt pursued; because, when he came to deal with the commercial legislation which was found necessary, he introduced a very large and very extensive measure for the consolidation of the Customs and Excise duties; he repealed most of the existing duties, and re-enacted the whole of them in a consolidated form—requiring, I think, a series of about 3,000 resolutions, which were then moulded into one single Act. It was, therefore, complained, with some justice, by the House of Lords, that the duties affected and those not affected by the Treaty were all mixed up together, and that it was impossible to take them into consideration with a view to their bearing upon the en-gements entered into between the two countries. Now I might have been spared from thus trespassing upon your Lordships' time if the Government had earlier been a little more communicative as to the course they intended to take. Up to the present moment we have not had the slightest indication of the process which they think necessary for obtaining the opinion of Parliament on the contemplated arrangements. On the contrary, so far from dealing with the Articles of the Treaty, as soon as the budget speech had been made a Motion was submitted that the House should go into Committee on the whole Customs' duties with a view to consider the commercial and financial policy involved. I am not about to discuss a question which I believe is at this moment undergoing discussion in the other House—whether it was right first to consider the financial portion of the question or the Treaty—whether the political should precede the commercial; but of this I am quite clear—that the course which Her Majesty's Government ought to have pursued was to deal with those articles of the revenue which were necessarily affected by the Treaty, and to take them into consideration in connection with the general bearing and scope of the Treaty; that the proper course would have been not to go into Committee upon the Customs' duties, but to go into Committee for the purpose of considering the provisions of the Treaty. In that manner the attention of the House would have been directed seriatim to the commercial and political considerations involved, and they would, as in 1787, have had an opportunity of pronouncing an opinion upon all parts of the question before proceeding to adjust the commercial system of the country so far as it must be affected by this Treaty. I would ask, then, whether it is the intention of the Government to follow the course pursued by Mr. Pitt; whether they will propose Resolutions respecting this Treaty, and then communicate those Resolutions to your Lordships' House; and whether they in-branches of the Legislature in a joint Address, ion to the terms of the e Friend (Earl Granville) perhaps the views of the et capable of some little I may be permitted to urse should be pursued, , meet the requirements of the present occasion.

I have already pointed out that as to the Treaty of 1787 there were no specific articles requiring the assent of Parliament, failing which assent the Treaty would have been null and void. Now, I ask any lawyer whether the only mode in which the assent of Parliament can be given is not through the medium of an Act of Parliament?—And, consequently, it is not enough to pass Acts of Parliament affirming the commercial and financial portions of the Treaty, but you must have an Act reciting the Treaty, and in virtue of the 20th Article declaring the assent of Parliament thereto. Even with regard to those articles which are simply financial, it does not follow, because the House of Commons sanctions a reduction of the wine duties, and your Lordships concur, that therefore you consent to make the reductions of those duties a matter of stipulation binding for ten years, and from which, whatever inconvenience result to your revenue, you have no power of receding. The reduction of duties is one thing; to compel you to reduce them by virtue of a Treaty is another and quite a different question. There are, however, articles of this Treaty which are of a very different character, and which do not bear in the slightest degree upon commercial questions, but partake more especially of a political nature. I should be very sorry indeed to see the assent of Parliament given to the 3d and the 11th Articles. If you were to proceed in any way upon the principle of reciprocity—if you were to require for your commerce advantages corresponding with those conferred upon French commerce—the first object which you ought to have attained was the equalization of the duties upon shipping, thereby giving fair play to the most important industry of this and the other country. But the 3rd Article of this Treaty does not pass over the question of the Navigation Laws; it impliedly recognizes and sanctions the permanence of those differential duties on the side of France which it is impossible to maintain with any pretext of fair and equitable dealing towards this country. Then there is the 11th Article, by which you stipulate with a foreign nation, which has nothing to give you in exchange, that under no circumstances will you prohibit or impose any duties on the export of one of our most important products—coal. Why, it is a mockery to say that this is reciprocity. Here is the stipulation:—

“ The two high contracting Powers engage not

But it is notorious that France has no coal to export. It is notorious that she is mainly dependent, and in time of war would be still more dependent, on us for coal for warlike purposes. I am not speaking now of a case in which we might be at war with France. Of course, under such circumstances, any treaty would be broken through; but at this moment it is an undecided point whether coal may not be considered as contraband of war. My noble Friend (the Earl of Hardwicke) reminds me that in the case of the Baltic war, the Government, which consisted of many Members of the present Ministry, actually declared that coal was contraband of war, and as such prohibited its export. What, then, will happen, supposing, not that we are at war with France, but that France is at war with some other Power? By this Treaty, we being neutrals between two belligerents, we should be bound not to prohibit the export of coal, although it may be contraband of war. Your vessels, going out laden with coal, may be seized by one of the belligerents, and what is the course you must pursue? Either you must submit to the seizure of your vessels, though the terms of your Treaty prevented you from prohibiting the export of their cargoes, or you must avenge yourselves of the insult offered, maintain your perfect right to export coal in pursuance of the Treaty, and, in that way, very probably may be led into hostilities, and become a principal in the war instead of a spectator. Whether, however, coal be contraband of war or not, to preclude a Government from prohibiting the export or imposing duties on any article is a condition which never ought to have been introduced into any Treaty, more especially when the article is one of such vital and essential importance as coal. Now, there is a very curious point connected with this question. In his original letter of the 23rd of December, Lord Cowley says—

"British coal imported overland to be admitted at the same rate of duties as Belgian coal. Seaborne coal to be subjected to the present duty for five years, when they would be assimilated to coal introduced overland."

Now, what does the Foreign Secretary say on the subject of coal?

"An allusion is, indeed, made by Count Walewski to British coal; but such is the market for that commodity both in this country and abroad that no public interest would be excited upon the question whether the duty charged on it in France is to be high or low, or whether the remission is to be immediate or postponed. Indeed, there still remains more or less of a disposition, which formerly was strong, to view the export of coal with jealousy, or even to subject it to fiscal restriction."

Your Lordships will observe that the offer of France is to take in your coal at, comparatively speaking, low duties; to which the answer of the Foreign Secretary is, that it matters very little whether the importation of coal into France is subject to high or low duties, for the trade in this article with other countries is so great that the addition of the French market would make but little difference to us, and that there is even in England a feeling of jealousy as to the export of coal at all. Notwithstanding that such was the view of the noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs, the stipulation in the Treaty is to the effect that we shall on no account prohibit or put a duty on the export of coal. I am not going now to discuss the various Articles of the Treaty. There will be a more ample opportunity for considering the merits of the Treaty, the amount of reciprocity obtained by it, and the benefits which our commerce is to derive from it. I do not intend in the slightest degree to undervalue or depreciate the advantages—on the contrary, I rate them very high—of extending and increasing our commercial relations with France; but if this be effected by treaty at all, let it be done by a treaty which bears some appearance of equivalent benefit and reciprocity. The noble Secretary for Foreign Affairs, in a passage to which I have referred, laid down very distinctly, when arguing against a treaty, the danger there would be in the case of a treaty of the French being apt to consider that their interests were sacrificed to those of England. On the other hand, it has been impressed on us that the great object of this Treaty is, not to obtain harmony and good understanding between the two Governments, but harmony and good understanding between the two peoples, and to prevent the chance of their ever quarrelling. Now, it appears a strange mode of attaining that object to make a treaty which, according to the confession of the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary, would lead the French people to believe that their interests were sacrificed to ours. And what is the ground put forward for this being made a matter of treaty? Why, that the changes will be most unpopular in France, that large of this important business by the Government—inadvertently, I make no doubt—has been so arranged that, although we have before us two most important propositions—although we are called upon to consider some of the most considerable questions that can be raised, I will be bound to prove to the House that on no occasion have the opportunities for discussion been so abridged and limited. I think I shall further show that on one important portion of those topics, not only have they been abridged and limited, but absolutely superseded. Believing that this has been unintentional and inadvertent on the part of the Government, but feeling that it has not only placed the House in a very inconvenient position, but may lead to consequences very injurious to the public service, I have thought it my duty, by the Motion which I have placed on the table to give the House an opportunity of interfering and remedying that which, on reflection, I think to be an evil of no slight magnitude.

Now, Sir, I hardly know that I can more clearly illustrate the false position in which the House is placed at this moment than by referring to the first two Amendments of which notice is given in the Orders of the Day. The first Amendment is by the hon. Member for Sunderland (Mr. Lindsay) with reference to those differential duties on shipping which are retained by the Commercial Treaty. Well, if the hon. Gentleman had brought forward that question no doubt the House would have had an opportunity of deliberating upon a very important article of the Commercial Treaty; but when the division was called for, and when a division was taken, no matter on what side the decision might have been, by the rules of the House, which prevent a second Amendment on the question of going into Committee on the Customs Acts, no other single Article in the Treaty of Commerce could possibly have been brought before the House. Suppose, as I understand would have been the case, the hon. Member for Sunderland, according to the usage of the House, and in unison with the courtesies which regulate our proceedings on both sides of the House, though bringing forward a subject of importance but of limited interest, had deferred to my hon. Friend the Member for Essex (Mr. Du Cane), who has challenged a much wider and completer issue, and that, too, at the request of a powerful party, and suppose my hon. Friend the Member for Essex had brought forward his Motion this Evening, then this House would have had an opportunity of expressing an opinion on the Budget of the Chancellor of the Exchequer; but after the decision on that question, assuming for a moment that it would have been negatived, it would have been impossible for any other Member either to bring forward an Amendment on any Article of the Treaty of Commerce, or again to refer to any subject connected with the Budget. Now, is that a state of the business of the House that is satisfactory? Ought the House to be placed in such a position on such an occasion, in a Session when the Government is bringing forward propositions of such importance—measures the magnitude of which can scarcely be exaggerated? So far I can form an opinion at the present moment—and I beg that the House will calmly and completely keep their mind on this point—and I have spared no means in the brief interval to avail myself of that learning which I do not myself possess on those subjects—the Treaty of Commerce with France which never has been before the House, never can be before the House. Surely, Sir, this is a point on which the House ought to arrive at a careful knowledge and a correct judgment. It will be for the Government to-night to prove that I am under an erroneous impression of the case. But my opinion is, that if we go into Committee on the Customs Acts, and if we pass all those Resolutions which are upon the paper to be proposed by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and which will affect all those remissions and reductions of duty which are contemplated in the Treaty of Commerce, that Treaty of Commerce can never appear before the House for its consideration and its judgment. It may be said—and was, indeed, said the other night—that the mere Resolutions of this House in Committee on the Customs Acts are not the law of the land, or are not conclusive, and that therefore the matter may be placed in another form before us. Well, Sir, let us see what is the value of that plea? It has been admitted by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in his recent letter to a Member of this House, that for all practical purposes, as regards this Treaty, the votes in Committee on the Customs Acts are conclusive. The Chancellor of the Exchequer in that statement only used language and availed himself of views which have always been accepted by the individuals in his position, and recognized by this House. What is the language of the noble Lord, the Se-

audience in the side galleries, the noble Earl's secret appears to have become known to some parties. I admit that the questions put by the noble Earl are perfectly fair and Parliamentary, and the Government have no desire whatever to withhold the fullest information, not only upon the course of proceeding they propose to adopt, but as to all the facts of the case. The noble Earl at the outset of his speech stated that he was not going into the merits, yet the whole hour and a half over which that speech extended was occupied in criticising and objecting to it. He (Earl Granville) denied that the charge of secrecy brought by the noble Earl against the Government was maintainable. It was obvious that in cases of this sort it would lead to inconvenience, and embarrass negotiations, if public notice were given that a Treaty of Commerce was being negotiated; but in this instance it was impossible for the Government to give notice, for they were not only not committed to the Treaty, but up to the date of the despatch from Lord Cowley which has been mentioned to-night the Government was not in the slightest degree committed to any negotiation whatever. They knew, indeed, that a distinguished public man had been in communication with influential members of the French Government, and had found a great disposition on their part to remove the commercial restrictions which existed between the two countries. But Mr. Cobden at that time had no authority from us—he never pretended that he had—to negotiate a treaty; and it was not until Count Walewski made a formal request on the subject, that Lord Cowley and Mr. Cobden were empowered by the Government to commence negotiations. Although the noble Earl discussed the Treaty at considerable length, I observed that during the whole of his speech he carefully avoided committing himself on the question of reciprocity. Whether he is in favour of reciprocal treaties, as he was a short time ago, or whether he has adopted those more liberal opinions which are now in vogue, I am at a loss to know. The noble Earl next entered into some criticism as to the wording of the correspondence, the object and bearing of which I confess I am at a loss to understand; but with regard to the mode in which the despatch was addressed to Lord Cowley and Mr. Cobden, I do not see how it could very well be addressed otherwise than it was. The noble Earl proceeded to accuse the Government of having departed from the precedent set

by Mr. Pitt in 1787, and of having interposed unnecessary delay in producing the Treaty; but the noble Earl omitted to state that Mr. Pitt's treaty was known a considerable time before the meeting of Parliament, whereas it was impossible to produce the present Treaty immediately after the meeting of Parliament, for the simple reason that it was not ratified. The only delay which occurred after the ratification was caused by the illness of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and arose from a desire on the part of the Government to have all its provisions and bearings explained at the same time. The noble Earl, when describing the course pursued by Mr. Pitt, adverted to the debates which took place in both Houses of Parliament, and even quoted some of the observations of Mr. Fox. I frankly confess that it is a matter of great regret to me, who have always entertained a traditional and historical respect for Mr. Fox, and also, I may add, for the late Earl Grey, who was one of the most practically liberal of men on all the great principles of civil and religious liberty, to find that in the debates of 1787 upon subjects of commercial policy, they were as completely in the wrong as they possibly could be. The noble Earl has told us that Mr. Fox opposed Mr. Pitt's treaty because it was made with our "natural enemies" the French. Some members of the Opposition went even further, and objected to the treaty, because, if carried, it would compel Parliament to act upon the objectionable doctrine of free trade with Ireland. The debates of 1787 show that the greatest men are not well informed upon every subject, and that—as Whig historians have admitted—Mr. Fox and Mr. Grey were inferior to Mr. Pitt with respect to the principles of commercial legislation. But certainly this is no ground for quoting their opinions against the course which Her Majesty's Government propose to take upon the present occasion. The noble Earl was quite correct when he said that the first step taken by Mr. Pitt's Government with the view of obtaining Parliamentary sanction to the treaty with France was to submit it to a Committee of the whole House; but the noble Earl did not point out the difference which exists between the two cases. Mr. Pitt's treaty and the measures which he founded upon it related only to France, and did not affect our general Customs' duties, whereas our treaty and the corresponding repeal and remissions of duties are applicable, not to France alone, but to the whole world.

very constitution of the country—and that Article not a financial or a fiscal one—escape the due consideration of the House of Commons? I say that alone, the argument from the 11th Article is one which I think is unanswerable for the end I have in view—that of bringing this Treaty before the House of Commons—for it never has been from the beginning brought before us. But it has been held by very great authorities, men who have been eminent in this House and illustrious in another House of Parliament, that notwithstanding Her Majesty has been advised to take a course illegal and unconstitutional, nevertheless the engagement is a complete one so far as the foreign Power is concerned, on the part of Her Majesty; and that if Her Majesty is able, by reductions and remissions of duties assented to by Her Parliament, to carry Her engagements into effect, Her Majesty will be bound by the 11th Article of the Treaty. If that be the case—and I give no opinion on it—how much more necessary is it that we deliberately, orderly, and methodically consider all those questions of reduction and remissions of revenue; because it might happen that it would be only by a refusal of the House of Commons to remit or reduce duty that the Sovereign could be extricated from an unconstitutional position, and one of great peril and danger. According to this view—and I give no opinion as to its justice—it is equally necessary that this Treaty should be placed before the House. The noble Lord the First Minister said the other night, “Of course the House will be asked to give their opinion on the Treaty.” Now, Sir, I want to know in what way we are to give that opinion, assuming, as I have throughout all these observations assumed, that the course of conducting business indicated by Her Majesty’s Government is pursued, and that we go into Committee on the Customs Acts, and pass all these remissions and reductions of duty necessary to enable the Queen to complete her engagements with the Emperor of the French? I want to know from the noble Lord if all those reductions and remissions are made, in what way Her Majesty’s Government proposes to bring the Treaty of Commerce with France before the cognizance of this House, and to subject it to the constitutional control and criticism of this House. That is a question which I hope will be answered to-night. Will the noble Lord the First Minister give notice of an Address to the

Queen after all these reductions and remissions have been made? Does the noble Lord propose to give notice of an Address to the Queen assuring Her Majesty that we shall lose no time in taking measures which will enable Her Majesty to fulfil her engagements with the Emperor of the French? In the first place, it will be very difficult—I believe it is perfectly unprecedented under any circumstances—for the House of Commons to address the Queen on a treaty when Her Majesty has not been advised to condescend to address the House of Commons. It may be said that it was impossible in Her Majesty’s Speech to announce the fact of this Treaty of Commerce being ratified. But in a similar case—in the treaty of commerce which was negotiated at Utrecht—I find that it was negotiated while Parliament was sitting, and could not be announced from the Throne at the opening of the Session; but then a Message from Her Majesty Queen Anne was brought to the House to inform it of what had occurred; and that course led to communications which were in every respect constitutional and according to Parliamentary custom. But we need not go back to that distant period. It is only but yesterday—it is in the experience of two-thirds of the Members of the present House of Commons, though it happened under a preceding one—that our most gracious Sovereign entered into a treaty with the King of Sardinia while Parliament was sitting, and to carry which into effect She required the assistance of the Legislature. What then happened? The Minister brought down a Message from the Crown which invited a loyal and dutiful response. Sir, I think it would be very difficult for the noble Lord—all those remissions and reductions having taken place—to propose an Address to the Crown to inform Her Majesty that we were prepared to carry the Treaty into effect. But, the noble Lord may say, “It will then be full time for me to advise Her Majesty to address the House, and after you have concluded your Committee on the Customs Acts a Message from the Crown shall come down to you.” Sir, the relations between the Crown and this House are of a very peculiar and delicate character; and it should be our first study not to let them generate into mere formality. And for the Crown to send down a Message to this House, announcing that She had concluded a treaty with the Emperor of the French, and inviting our consideration to it, and calling on us to

might be objected to on the ground that, for the sake of giving ourselves a differential advantage over the French manufacturers, we ought to retain the power of putting an export duty on coal; but I believe no one here will be inclined to argue in that way. Then, again, it might be said that for fiscal purposes it might be desirable to tax the export of coal, and that we ought not to exclude ourselves from such a cause for ten years to come. That is a more plausible argument, certainly, than the other; but the difficulty which has been conjured up is quite imaginary. After the former humiliating failure to keep up such a duty, and after the strong evidence then adduced as to difficulties and complications to which it led, I think it is utterly impossible to impose an export duty on coal. I quite admit that under certain circumstances a moderate export duty for fiscal purposes may be as good as an import duty, but you must recollect what the subject is which you are going to tax in the present instance. You must bear in mind that it is a commodity of which we are the producers, and that any tax upon its export must act against our sale of it when it comes into competition with the production of Foreign mines in the markets of the world. As to the noble Earl's argument against the abandonment of a prohibitive duty on coal in the event of war, I have only to say that at the time of the Crimean war we did issue a proclamation prohibiting the export of contraband of war to countries north of Dantzic, but that we did not extend it to coal. There is no positive decision of our courts of law upon this point, but there can be no doubt that in certain cases where the destination and use of coal are obvious, coal is contraband of war. In Mr. Pitt's treaty there were two clauses specifying what was to be regarded as contraband of war and what not, and coal was distinctly specified as not contraband. Of course, at that time, nobody thought of coal being used for the propulsion of large vessels of war, and hence there was no reason why it should be held to be contraband. But I find that sail cloth, cables, anchors, and everything essential for the navigation of a man-of-war, such as were afterwards pronounced by Lord Stowell to be contraband of war, did not figure as such in Mr. Pitt's treaty. The noble Earl has also alluded to the difficulty likely to arise when two nations being at war we, as neutrals, should have to prohibit the exportation of coal to other countries. I believe no one will deny that there are, by the laws of nations, belligerent rights which may be exercised by States in anticipation of and previous to war—such as embargoes and the like. The Customs Act of 1853 gives power to the Crown to prohibit the export of various munitions of war. Now, either these are affected by a commercial treaty, or they are not. I apprehend no one here will assert that it would have been wise to omit from the French Treaty the "most favoured nation" clause, previously inserted by the late Government in the commercial treaty with Russia. The only difference between that clause and the 11th is that by the former you cannot prohibit the export of coal to France without prohibiting it at the same time to the rest of the world; and that, by the other, you cannot prohibit it at all. The noble Earl argued that when there was a prohibition, on our part, of the export of contraband of war, it must be extended, if the 11th clause held good, to all the rest of the world. But here the facts are quite the other way. During the Russian war the Government, acting on the advice not only of the law officers of the Crown, but also of the learned Lords of the Council, issued, as I before mentioned, a proclamation six weeks before the war commenced, prohibiting the exportation of all articles contraband of war—coals not included—to any ports north of Dantzic, leaving them perfectly free and open to the rest of the world. Now, is it probable—is it possible—that those nations, to some of whom we were bound by "the most favoured nation" clause, as it is called, would have uttered no murmur, raised not the slightest objection to the course we took, if they had not held, as I believe it ought to be held, that no such stipulation in a mere commercial treaty does infringe the belligerent rights of the States contracting? The noble Earl spoke of the one-sided nature of the Treaty, and in illustration referred to the fact that the English duties were to come off sooner than the French ones. The truth of the matter is, that France was perfectly willing, and, indeed, proposed that we should delay as long as herself the advantages or disadvantages of the Treaty, whichever the noble Earl may call them; but Her Majesty's Government, having once made up their minds that the changes which they were called upon to make would be highly negotiated in 1786 was negotiated in the month of September, at the latter end of the month, and in the month of October it was published throughout Europe. Parliament did not meet till the last week in January, 1787; and therefore for four months that treaty and all its provisions had been canvassed and analyzed, and had been in the mouths and the minds of men. In February—I think on the 2nd of February—Mr. Pitt, having a few days previously brought up the treaty by command (as the noble Secretary of State did the other night) gave notice that on the 12th of that month, February, he should call upon the House to take into consideration the treaty of commerce with France,—thus allotting ten days for the consideration of a document which for four months had been so completely studied by the country that many of its defects had been discovered, and Mr. Pitt had even negotiated a supplementary treaty by which those defects were remedied. And that is another hint of which the hon. Member for Finsbury may avail himself. Let the House remember that when the Parliament met, the Sovereign had announced the negotiation and ratification of the Treaty from the Throne, which is not our case this year. Mr. Fox immediately arose against this proposition of Mr. Pitt, and protested against ten days only being allowed. We have only ten days allowed, when the Treaty was not even ratified when the Parliament met. We have not had the advantage of the deliberation and criticism of four months. On the contrary, it is only by a miracle that, the financial statement having been made on Friday, we were not called on to decide it on the following Thursday. And I think that all that has occurred upon these large transactions thus far has fairly shown that I was not irrational when I pressed on the House the importance of delay, and the absolute necessity of giving us time to consider in what manner we had best deal with propositions of such a magnitude. Well, upon the 12th of February, Mr. Pitt called the attention of the House of Commons, which had on his Motion moved into a Committee of the Whole House—he called the attention of the Committee to the consideration of the French Treaty, in a very ample and able speech, in which he considered the instrument both commercially and politically, and he concluded his speech by moving a Resolution. Now, Sir, that Resolution, the first of twenty resolutions which Mr. Pitt had prepared:—and these resolutions—let me call the attention of the House particularly to this fact—these Resolutions were not Resolutions similar to those which the Chancellor of the Exchequer has placed on the paper in order that they may be moved in the Committee on the Customs Acts—they were general Resolutions:—Mr. Pitt himself impressed on the House not to be alarmed lest they should be entrapped into accepting details which they might afterwards regret. The Resolutions were drawn large and general, and they were not Resolutions, as I will show to the House afterwards, that could form the staple and elements of a revenue Bill. There were considerable debates, adjournments, and divisions on these Resolutions. Those Resolutions embodied the pith of the commercial treaty; for the commercial treaty of Mr. Pitt was limited entirely to commercial considerations and questions of navigation. If not so limited it would tell much better for my argument. But the twenty Resolutions of Mr. Pitt were discussed, amply discussed; divisions took place upon them, and towards the end of the month, the 20th, I think, of February, they were passed, they were reported to the House; and immediately after they were reported Mr. Pitt moved an Address to the Crown in answer to the passage in the Speech from the Throne—or rather, a follower of Mr. Pitt did it—pledging the House to enable His Majesty to carry that treaty into effect. And what then occurred? Why the Resolutions of this House and the Address were sent up to a body which appears to me to be entirely forgotten in this transaction; because when Her Majesty, in Her negotiations with the Emperor of the French speaks of the assent of Parliament, I can hardly suppose that Government considers that the Parliament consists of only the House of Commons. But Mr. Pitt sent the Resolutions and Address to the House of Lords for consideration, and took no further step in the business until the House of Lords had equally passed those Resolutions, after a formal but most memorable debate, distinguished, among other things, by a speech of the highest class from the first Marquess of Lansdowne, which may still be read with great profit, and which proved that he was a statesman of the highest order. And then, also, the House of Lords assented to an Address to the Crown, and the two Houses went up with their joint Addresses. And what then took place?

will be found that the Chairman of that Committee was not instructed to move for leave to bring in a Bill founded upon those Resolutions. The only proceeding founded upon those Resolutions was an Address to the Crown in favour of the provisions of the Treaty, in which this House was asked to concur. The reductions of duty under that treaty were afterwards included in a great number of other reductions of duties—embraced in 2,500 Resolutions—forming an entire alteration of the whole of our Customs, Exois, and Stamp duties. When the Resolutions relative to these duties were reported the Chairman was instructed to move for leave to bring in a Bill founded upon them, and these Resolutions, and not the others relative to the treaty, were the foundation of the whole proceeding. In the present year Her Majesty's Government do not propose to have a Committee of the Whole House on the Commercial Treaty; they intend to ask the House to go into Committee on the Customs Acts, and then they propose in that Committee to move Resolutions for the reduction of duties. Now, my Lords, how will this operate? By the usual practice of Parliament, Resolutions agreed to in Committee of the Whole House in favour of reductions of Customs' duties come into operation as soon as they are reported to the House. Take wine, for example, which is the most important concession under the Treaty. If the Resolution in favour of this reduction is agreed to in Committee of the Whole House on the Customs Acts, upon the Resolution being reported to the House the reduced duty comes into immediate operation. Therefore, when Parliament afterwards comes to consider the Treaty, it will find the most important part already carried into effect, and you cannot without disturbance of trade retrace your steps. In a Committee of the Whole House on the Commercial Treaty any question may be raised which any hon. Member may think important with reference to the Treaty; but in Committee on the Customs Acts any discussion upon the Treaty will be irrelevant and out of order, and no Resolution can be proposed whereby the sense of the House may be taken upon the various matters provided for by that Treaty. The effect of this course of proceeding, as contrasted with that taken by Mr. Pitt, is that Mr. Pitt's Government gave to Parliament an anterior opportunity of discussing the various questions contained in the Treaty before they proceeded to carry them into effect. Mark how the present course of proceeding will operate. I will not go into the merits of the present Treaty. I have already had two opportunities of expressing my opinion upon the general policy of that Treaty, and this is not a fit occasion for fully discussing the details. I may, however, point out to your Lordships some of the questions that must necessarily arise in discussing the policy of that Treaty—not questions of the reduction of Customs' duties, but well worthy, notwithstanding, of the consideration of Parliament. For instance, we shall have it suggested to us that it is not politic for this country to bind itself for ten years not to impose any duty on coal exported to France. From the language that has been held in this House that opinion appears likely to receive considerable support from some of your Lordships. Is it not very probable that we shall also have our silk and paper manufacturers saying, "It is not equal justice that we should be bound for ten years to give French silk and paper manufacturers access to our coal, to cheapen their produce, while France either lays a heavy duty on or entirely prohibits the exports of various important articles or raw materials"? France, for instance, prohibits the export of rags; and imposes a duty on the export of raw silk, and our paper and silk manufacturers may very well contend that it is not just to furnish coal to facilitate French manufactures, while France does not allow these important materials for ours to be exported to us. We may not feel any great objection to the export of coal to France; but when France obtains a right of free access to our coal for ten years, English shipowners ought, think, to have a fair share of the carrying trade of so bulky an article. The third Article of the Treaty, however, maintains all the differential duties now in force in favour of French shipping, and the differential duty upon coal imported in English bottoms remains nearly, if not quite, prohibitory. The brandy manufacturers, too, may say that they consider the original duty of 10*s.* proposed by the Government on the 17th January to be a fairer one than that of 8*s.* 2*d.* agreed to in the Treaty. Is it not probable that the English silk manufacturers will represent to your Lordships that, while they are exposed to a very considerable inconvenience in the introduction of French silks free of duty, they are forbidden to enjoy the equally free introduction of their silks into France? In a certain

description of silk goods, in which the artistic skill and taste of the French give them an advantage, our silk manufacturers cannot compete with their French rivals. But there are silks of a plainer and stronger pattern, in which our mechanical skill and the perfection of our machinery give our manufacturers a great advantage; and if these goods were admitted into France, an advantageous business could be done in this description of goods, and their admission into France at the same time that finer French goods are admitted here, would afford employment to many of the hands likely to be thrown out of work by the inability of our manufacturers to sustain the competition with France in fabrics of this description. In like manner it would be for the advantage of France that the admission of those British silks which may supersede some of their own, should take place at the same time that a great increase of employment was afforded to another branch of the French silk trade by the opening of our market. Thus, it would be for the interest of both countries that an interchange of their silk goods should take place in a manner which the provisions of the Treaty will not admit. Our manufacturers will, I think, have much to say in support of this view of the subject and against the provisions of the Treaty as it stands. I do not say whether the case they will be able to bring forward will be capable of being made out. This is not the right time for entering into that question, but I do say that the parties ought to be heard. All I now ask is that this and the other House of Parliament should have an opportunity of fully considering these questions, and of discussing how far it is right to accept the arrangements made by the Government in the negotiations with France before we actually make the concessions that are asked of us. If you had followed the course pursued by Mr. Pitt, the difficulties now experienced would have been obviated. If that precedent had been followed, Resolutions to carry the Treaty into effect would have been moved by the Government in a Committee of the House of Commons upon the Treaty, and not upon the Customs Act. In a Committee on the Treaty, Resolutions pointing to its amendment might have been moved, and, if adopted, would have afforded grounds for moving an humble Address to Her Majesty asking Her to reopen the question with France, and to endeavour to obtain such modifications of it as are necessary.

This course, I say, would have been open to either House of Parliament to pursue, if the precedent of Mr. Pitt had been followed. But the effect of the course taken by Her Majesty's Government is to deprive Parliament of this opportunity of deliberation. The House of Commons, in a Committee on the Customs Acts, cannot consider any Motion tending to a revision of the Treaty—it can only decide whether it will or will not consent to the reductions of duty promised to France which will be proposed to it; and if it adopts the Resolutions proposed for that purpose as soon as they are reported to the House and agreed to, they will come at once into operation, so that when it afterwards proceeds to consider the Treaty, and when the Treaty is brought before this House, as we are promised that it shall be, the time will be past for discussing it with advantage, since all the advantages accorded to France will already have been granted, and it will be impossible to recall them without extreme inconvenience to our own trade. The noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Derby) has expressed his opinion that a distinct Act of Parliament is necessary to give effect to the Treaty in consequence of the manner in which one of the clauses is worded. On comparing the words of this part of the Treaty with those of the corresponding provisions in that of 1787, I admit there is some awkwardness in the expressions now used, but still I do not think they have the effect the noble Earl supposes. The assent of Parliament which the Treaty requires for its coming into operation will, I think, be sufficiently given by the passing of the Acts for reducing the several duties which it stipulates for repealing. At all events, if there is the slightest doubt upon this point, it can be removed by a convention between the two Governments declaring this to be all the Treaty was intended to require.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL thought his noble Friend (Earl Grey) exaggerated the difference that existed between the mode of dealing with this Treaty and the mode adopted by Mr. Pitt. The difference of treatment arose out of the different natures of the two transactions. The two transactions were essentially different in their nature, and there was no change in the mode of dealing with the present one that was not made absolutely necessary by the difference that existed. The Resolutions moved by Mr. Pitt had reference to a Treaty that related exclusively to France. Now, the present Treaty had a general operation, affecting all other countries, and not France only. It affected the wines, not of France merely, but of Spain and Portugal and the rest of Europe; and it would, therefore, be impossible to follow literally the precedent of Mr. Pitt in regard to it. Moreover, the Resolutions which would be proposed in the other House of Parliament, were Resolutions which would affect the importation into this country of numerous articles from all parts of the world. There might be many faults found with the Treaty, but he thought his noble Friend very greatly underrated the magnitude of the change in regard to France. He believed the change effected by France under this Treaty was infinitely greater in degree and more important in principle than any change we stipulated to make in our own country. We were only taking one step forward and that a short one, in the same path on which we had been proceeding since 1842; whereas France was taking a step involving a far greater change than was taken by Mr. Huskisson when he commenced his commercial reforms. The noble Earl opposite referred to the third Article relating to shipping. No one could deny that it would have been more satisfactory to this country if the Treaty had also been a navigation treaty—but it did not profess to be so; it was a commercial treaty only. We could not under this Treaty, and did not ask France to alter her navigation laws. France offered to us certain changes in her commercial code which were beneficial to us, and we accepted them: but we did not insist upon other changes which would have been more beneficial to the French than to ourselves. With regard to the export trade in coal, the House would perhaps be surprised to find that last year the export of this article to France alone exceeded the whole amount exported in 1842 to the whole world; and of this trade more than two-thirds was carried on by English coasting vessels. He did not believe, as had been alleged, that the stipulations of this Treaty would in any way interfere with our rights as a belligerent power, should we unfortunately be engaged in war, or in the least degree fetter our action previous to war breaking out. Great pains had been taken to connect the increase of the income tax with the operation of this Treaty; but he denied that the Treaty had anything more to do with the increased income tax than had our large naval and military expenditure, which was not objected to by any party in that House. It was incorrect and unfair to speak of the operation of this Treaty and the increase of the income tax as being specially connected with each other. That, however, was a point which ought to be argued at great length; and he only said, in the meantime, that he could not assent to the interpretation that the two questions were inseparably connected.

THE EARL OF HARDWICKE said, that the main objection which he made to the course pursued by the Government was, that they had tied this country for ten years to come not to make any change whatever in reference to those duties which bore on the intercourse of shipping. One point seemed to have been entirely omitted in this debate in reference to the condition of the shipping of the two countries, and it was this, that at present the produce of Asia, Africa, and America, could only be imported into France in bond for re-exportation; but if this Treaty were passed, the Emperor could admit these goods from Asia, Africa, and America in French ships for consumption, by protecting them by differential duties. This would give a great advantage to France, and place her in a position so vastly superior to that which she had hitherto held, that the interests of our own country must suffer extremely.

PASSES TO SAILORS.

QUESTION.

SIR CHARLES NAPIER said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether a circular has been issued forbidding Officers to give passes out of the Sea Port Town; and whether the Captain of — asked permission to give passes, and was reproved for so doing?

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, the order had been issued in consequence of

of this important business by the Government—inadvertently, I make no doubt—has been so arranged that, although we have before us two most important propositions—although we are called upon to consider some of the most considerable questions that can be raised, I will be bound to prove to the House that on no occasion have the opportunities for discussion been so abridged and limited. I think I shall further show that on one important portion of those topics, not only have they been abridged and limited, but absolutely superseded. Believing that this has been unintentional and inadvertent on the part of the Government, but feeling that it has not only placed the House in a very inconvenient position, but may lead to consequences very injurious to the public service, I have thought it my duty, by the Motion which I have placed on the table to give the House an opportunity of interfering and remedying that which, on reflection, I think to be an evil of no slight magnitude.

Now, Sir, I hardly know that I can more clearly illustrate the false position in which the House is placed at this moment than by referring to the first two Amendments of which notice is given in the Orders of the Day. The first Amendment is by the hon. Member for Sunderland (Mr. Lindsay) with reference to those differential duties on shipping which are retained by the Commercial Treaty. Well, if the hon. Gentleman had brought forward that question no doubt the House would have had an opportunity of deliberating upon a very important article of the Commercial Treaty; but when the division was called for, and when a division was taken, no matter on what side the decision might have been, by the rules of the House, which prevent a second Amendment on the question of going into Committee on the Customs Acts, no other single Article in the Treaty of Commerce could possibly have been brought before the House. Suppose, as I understand would have been the case, the hon. Member for Sunderland, according to the usage of the House, and in unison with the courtesies which regulate our proceedings on both sides of the House, though bringing forward a subject of importance but of limited interest, had deferred to my hon. Friend the Member for Essex (Mr. Du Cane), who has challenged a much wider and completer issue, and that, too, at the request of a powerful party, and suppose my hon. Friend the Member for Essex had brought forward his Motion this Evening, then this House would have had an opportunity of expressing an opinion on the Budget of the Chancellor of the Exchequer; but after the decision on that question, assuming for a moment that it would have been negatived, it would have been impossible for any other Member either to bring forward an Amendment on any Article of the Treaty of Commerce, or again to refer to any subject connected with the Budget. Now, is that a state of the business of the House that is satisfactory? Ought the House to be placed in such a position on such an occasion, in a Session when the Government is bringing forward propositions of such importance—measures the magnitude of which can scarcely be exaggerated? So far I can form an opinion at the present moment—and I beg that the House will calmly and completely keep their mind on this point—and I have spared no means in the brief interval to avail myself of that learning which I do not myself possess on those subjects—the Treaty of Commerce with France which never has been before the House, never can be before the House. Surely, Sir, this is a point on which the House ought to arrive at a careful knowledge and a correct judgment. It will be for the Government to-night to prove that I am under an erroneous impression of the case. But my opinion is, that if we go into Committee on the Customs Acts, and if we pass all those Resolutions which are upon the paper to be proposed by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and which will affect all those remissions and reductions of duty which are contemplated in the Treaty of Commerce, that Treaty of Commerce can never appear before the House for its consideration and its judgment. It may be said—and was, indeed, said the other night—that the mere Resolutions of this House in Committee on the Customs Acts are not the law of the land, or are not conclusive, and that therefore the matter may be placed in another form before us. Well, Sir, let us see what is the value of that plea? It has been admitted by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in his recent letter to a Member of this House, that for all practical purposes, as regards this Treaty, the votes in Committee on the Customs Acts are conclusive. The Chancellor of the Exchequer in that statement only used language and availed himself of views which have always been accepted by the individuals in his position, and recognized by this House. What is the language of the noble Lord, the Se-course Her Majesty's Government intend to pursue with reference to the granting of Licences for the sale of Beer and Wine by retail to the keepers of refreshment houses as indicated by Resolution No. 15, to be proposed in Committee of Ways and Means, and whether he still intends to propose that Resolution to the Committee?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, I believe the substance of my reply to the question is already within the knowledge of the hon. and learned Member, inasmuch as he introduced a deputation that waited on me this morning in Downing Street and discussed this important question in his presence. Perhaps it will be convenient if I now state the form in which the question rested when the deputation left me. It represented a large meeting chiefly composed of licensed victuallers, and it was stated on the part of many of them that they thought no change is required in the present law regulating the sale of wine, spirits, and beer. Another portion of that meeting, however, did not appear to be exactly of this opinion; they proposed that it should be compulsory on all victuallers licensed to sell spirits to take out a wine license also. A third portion of the meeting appeared disposed to go still further. They thought it a fair proposal that wine licences should be granted to persons not holding spirit licences, provided they were granted at the discretion of the Magistrates. I stated that I could not agree, and, as at present advised, was not likely to agree with those who think that when we are endeavouring to create an immense extension of the trade in wine, we can leave the law affecting its sale and access to it by the consumer in the present most unsatisfactory state. I assured these gentlemen that, though I could not pretend to enter into any discussion of that general proposition with any expectation of arriving at a different conclusion, yet, as to the various modes of enlarging the means of sale, that was a matter of detail entirely open to further discussion; and I should be very glad to be assisted by the practical knowledge of those who represented the body of victuallers. I also pointed out to them that the Resolution referring to wine licences is one on which no Vote of the House can be taken till a very advanced stage of the discussion of the financial statement, and I promised them that before the Government asked the House to come to any conclusion affecting the present state of the law on the sale of spirits and wine, I would take care that the Bill containing all the new regulations should be laid on the table, and if after examining the question in all its details with the assistance of the parties interested, I found there was any essential difference between their views and those of the Government, I undertook that they should have full notice of the intentions of the Government before the House came to any decision that could compromise them. I also took the liberty of suggesting to them that as they were not now agreed they should endeavour to come as nearly as possible to some general conclusions on the subject.

THE SUEZ CANAL.

QUESTION.

MR. GRANT DUFF said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether any correspondence passed between Her Majesty's Government and the Government of the Emperor of the French, from the 1st of August, 1859, to the commencement of the present Session, with reference to the occupation of Perim or the Suez Canal; and, if so, whether there would be any objection to lay it upon the table of the House?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, there had been no correspondence between Her Majesty's Government and that of France relative to the occupation of Perim. A correspondence, however, had taken place between the two Governments with respect to the Suez Canal, but it had come to nothing. A despatch had subsequently been written from Constantinople to the Ambassador of the Sultan in London, and certain propositions had been made to Her Majesty's Government, asking them whether they, in conjunction with the Government of France, would be prepared to guarantee the security of the Suez Canal, supposing it could be made. The answer of the Government had been that they declined to enter into any such guarantee.

TREATY OF COMMERCE WITH FRANCE.

Order of the Day for the House to go into Committee on the Customs Acts, read,

Mr. T. DUNCOMBE rose to put a question to the Government, which, he said, related to a subject in which the public took a great interest. The House had been informed that the Treaty of Commerce with France was to be a dead letter until it had been ratified by the British Parliament; and what, under those circumstances, he was anxious to ascertain was whether, supposing any alteration or modification of the financial Resolutions which had been laid on the table with respect to the Customs Acts should take place, the Government would have the power, or whether they would, by negotiation, endeavour to render those alterations and modifications conformable to the terms of the Treaty—whether, in short, the House was called upon to take the Treaty as it stood—in other words, to accept “the Bill, the whole Bill, and nothing but the Bill,” or to reject it altogether?

MR. DU CANE said, that since he gave notice on Friday last, of the Resolution which stood on the paper in his name, he found that notice had been given by his right hon. Friend the Member for Buckinghamshire, to bring under the consideration of the Committee another Resolution, containing a proposition in which he (Mr. Du Cane) entirely concurred, and which embodied a question which he felt assured the majority of the hon. Members could not fail to perceive, if discussed at all, ought to be disposed of before any Resolution immediately affecting the financial proposals of the Government. He should, under those circumstances, with the permission of the House, postpone his Resolution until that of his right hon. Friend had been discussed. He wished the House, however at the same time, to understand that he was by no means desirous to retreat from the position which he had taken up with respect to the financial propositions of the Government, and that it was his intention to submit his Resolution to the House as soon as was conformable to its rules after the proposition of his right hon. Friend had been disposed of.

AMENDMENT.

Motion made and Question proposed, “That the Speaker do now leave the Chair.”

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, in the observations which I shall offer to the House to-night it is not my intention to give any opinion on the policy of the provisions of the Treaty of Commerce with France. Still less, Sir, will it be my desire to make any reference to the financial statement which has recently been made by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. And if for a moment I am obliged to refer to that statement it shall be only for a moment, and because I feel that I am bound to place myself right with the House, and without reserve, and with the utmost frankness, to explain to them the cause why, apparently, at the last moment on Friday night, I seemed to interpose between the House and the Amendment of my hon. Friend the Member for Essex (Mr. Du Cane), which Amendment I cordially approve, and which, when brought forward, I shall entirely support. After the financial statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer had been made, I felt it my duty to consider, on the following day, in conjunction with those with whom I have the honour to act in public life, the propositions of the Minister. Those propositions, after having given them the most mature consideration, appear to us of a most dangerous character. Sir, when a Minister announces a great increase in the expenditure of the country, in the face of a large and avowed deficit—when, under these circumstances, he proposes, by dealing with certain branches of our revenue, to increase that deficiency, and only to make up the balance of the year by having recourse to a tax which the country for many years has been led to believe would terminate in the present year, and which, even under the altered circumstances of the case, they had a right to expect would at least be reduced, it did appear to us that it was impossible for us, with the opinions which we have always maintained on the subject of finance in this House, and especially in reference to that impost, the income tax—it seemed to us, I say, impossible that we could shrink from submitting our opinions upon the question on the present occasion. Well, how was that to be done? No doubt, when dealing with a scheme so complicated and comprehensive as that of the Government, we might have seized occasions, and have availed ourselves of particular points in it, when by joining with some interests affected, or some peculiar body which was menaced, we might in all probability have increased our strength, and might certainly have embarrassed, and perhaps have partially defeated the Government. But then came the question, was that course worthy of a great party? If we believed that the general principles of the financial scheme of the Government were erroneous, was it not our duty to fix upon some broad, distinct, and straightforward objection, and upon that to take the opinion of the House? And that was our unanimous opinion. It was not in our minds becoming in us to join ourselves with the discontented wine merchants, with the paper manufacturers, or with those publicans whose complaints we have been listening to this evening, or with the many bodies who believe that their interests are menaced by the propositions of the Government. On the contrary, Sir, it was our opinion that an issue should be joined similar to that proposed by the Amendment of my hon. Friend the Member for Essex, and that upon some broad, clear, and distinct ground the judgment of the House should be taken. I have made these observations on the financial statement of the right hon. Gentleman, not that I wish to introduce the slightest controversy on this occasion on its merits, but to explain to the House the course which we who sit upon these benches have taken. Having arrived at that conclusion, I will not disguise from the House it was to us a matter of great regret that we found ourselves obliged to precipitate a conclusion owing to the peculiar manner in which the public business this year has been placed before us by the Government. We were obliged, I say, to precipitate a conclusion which, according to our own feelings, ought to have been postponed until much of the preliminary discussion involved in the important topics which the financial statement embraces should have taken place. In the course of that discussion probably many circumstances would have been changed and alterations would have occurred which would have modified in many respects the conclusion arrived at and the expression of opinion to which I have referred. But when we saw the great haste with which those important subjects have been brought under the consideration of the House when our attention was directed to the almost inextricable confusion with which matters and measures that have no necessary connection with each other have been mixed up, and the great difficulty which must attend a hurried consideration of affairs, so varied and so complicated, we felt that such a state of things rendered it really impossible for us to take any other course than that indicated by the proposed Resolution of my hon. Friend the Member for Essex. And, Sir, that being the way in which the important measures which the Government have brought forward have been introduced to the House, it seems impossible, if this issue is to be raised, that it could be postponed beyond the question of Mr. Speaker leaving the chair to go into Committee on the Customs Acts. And although we deprecate and deplore the inconvenience, and, as we believe, the great public impropriety of the House being called upon, before the preliminary debates which would have arisen, to come to a conclusion upon the whole financial scheme of the Government, still it was inevitable from the mode in which the public business had been arranged by the Ministry.

Well, Sir, that being the state of the case, there arose accidentally on Friday night last what I may call a conversation on the subject of the French treaty of commerce. Towards the conclusion of it I rose and made an inquiry of Her Majesty's Government on a subject which had been several times referred to as very perplexing. I asked in what manner the Government intended to introduce the Treaty of Commerce with France to the consideration of the House? I am bound to say that the answer of the Government on that occasion was so ambiguous, so hesitating, that, upon further reflection and research in the course of the evening, it appeared to me to be so impracticable, that I felt it my duty, though with great unwillingness on my part, to place that Notice on the paper which hon. Gentlemen are aware of. Sir, so little had that Amendment on my part the character of a party Motion that I had not, from the state of the House, an opportunity of conferring with any of the Gentlemen with whom I am in the habit of acting, except with my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Belfast (Sir Hugh Cairns) I should willingly—most willingly—have seen the task undertaken by some independent Member of the House; but time was urgent, the subject was pressing, and so it has devolved upon me to call the serious attention of the House to what I believe is the unprecedented and peculiar position in which it is now placed—one which, I think, will be found, on calm discussion, to be a position by no means favourable to the privileges of this House and to that freedom of discussion which we are accustomed to view with such pride and jealousy. Probably there have been few Sessions of Parliament in which measures of such great importance have been introduced to the notice of the House of Commons as the present; yet the management of this important business by the Government—inadvertently, I make no doubt—has been so arranged that, although we have before us two most important propositions—although we are called upon to consider some of the most considerable questions that can be raised, I will be bound to prove to the House that on no occasion have the opportunities for discussion been so abridged and limited. I think I shall further show that on one important portion of those topics, not only have they been abridged and limited, but absolutely superseded. Believing that this has been unintentional and inadvertent on the part of the Government, but feeling that it has not only placed the House in a very inconvenient position, but may lead to consequences very injurious to the public service, I have thought it my duty, by the Motion which I have placed on the table to give the House an opportunity of interfering and remedying that which, on reflection, I think to be an evil of no slight magnitude.

Now, Sir, I hardly know that I can more clearly illustrate the false position in which the House is placed at this moment than by referring to the first two Amendments of which notice is given in the Orders of the Day. The first Amendment is by the hon. Member for Sunderland (Mr. Lindsay) with reference to those differential duties on shipping which are retained by the Commercial Treaty. Well, if the hon. Gentleman had brought forward that question no doubt the House would have had an opportunity of deliberating upon a very important article of the Commercial Treaty; but when the division was called for, and when a division was taken, no matter on what side the decision might have been, by the rules of the House, which prevent a second Amendment on the question of going into Committee on the Customs Acts, no other single Article in the Treaty of Commerce could possibly have been brought before the House. Suppose, as I understand would have been the case, the hon. Member for Sunderland, according to the usage of the House, and in unison with the courtesies which regulate our proceedings on both sides of the House, though bringing forward a subject of importance but of limited interest, had deferred to my hon. Friend the Member for Essex (Mr. Du Cane), who has challenged a much wider and completer issue, and that, too, at the request of a powerful party, and suppose my hon. Friend the Member for Essex had brought forward his Motion this Evening, then this House would have had an opportunity of expressing an opinion on the Budget of the Chancellor of the Exchequer; but after the decision on that question, assuming for a moment that it would have been negatived, it would have been impossible for any other Member either to bring forward an Amendment on any Article of the Treaty of Commerce, or again to refer to any subject connected with the Budget. Now, is that a state of the business of the House that is satisfactory? Ought the House to be placed in such a position on such an occasion, in a Session when the Government is bringing forward propositions of such importance—measures the magnitude of which can scarcely be exaggerated? So far I can form an opinion at the present moment—and I beg that the House will calmly and completely keep their mind on this point—and I have spared no means in the brief interval to avail myself of that learning which I do not myself possess on those subjects—the Treaty of Commerce with France which never has been before the House, never can be before the House. Surely, Sir, this is a point on which the House ought to arrive at a careful knowledge and a correct judgment. It will be for the Government to-night to prove that I am under an erroneous impression of the case. But my opinion is, that if we go into Committee on the Customs Acts, and if we pass all those Resolutions which are upon the paper to be proposed by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and which will affect all those remissions and reductions of duty which are contemplated in the Treaty of Commerce, that Treaty of Commerce can never appear before the House for its consideration and its judgment. It may be said—and was, indeed, said the other night—that the mere Resolutions of this House in Committee on the Customs Acts are not the law of the land, or are not conclusive, and that therefore the matter may be placed in another form before us. Well, Sir, let us see what is the value of that plea? It has been admitted by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in his recent letter to a Member of this House, that for all practical purposes, as regards this Treaty, the votes in Committee on the Customs Acts are conclusive. The Chancellor of the Exchequer in that statement only used language and availed himself of views which have always been accepted by the individuals in his position, and recognized by this House. What is the language of the noble Lord, the Secretary for Foreign Affairs, on this subject? Why, in his despatch to the negotiators of this Treaty, what the noble Lord there says is—

“ And with respect to all those articles which are to be set free from duty, and removed altogether from the Tariff, those articles shall become free on the day succeeding that on which the Resolution in Committee of the House of Commons, affirming the proposed freedom from Customs' duty shall have been duly reported and agreed to by the House itself.”

No doubt the noble Lord was perfectly justified in giving those instructions to the negotiators; but, if that be the case, what opportunity would we have on the Customs Act, subsequently introduced, to consider this Treaty? All those who had voted for the reduction or remission of duty in Committee, would scarcely oppose an Act which carried their own reductions into effect; and all those who had opposed—whom we assume to be the minority—must, in their opposition in Committee on the Customs Acts, be confined merely to subjects which are contained in those Customs Acts. Therefore I maintain that if the Customs Acts were passed, all that assent of Parliament, which is provided for in the 20th Article of the Treaty, would be perfectly fulfilled and satisfied. But it is a mistake to suppose that the 20th Article of this Treaty requires the sanction, or, as the hon. Member for Finsbury calls it, the ratification, of the House of Commons. The House of Commons has no right, under the Constitution, to sanction or ratify treaties. And if Her Majesty exercises her prerogative subject, in any particular, to be enabled by this House to fulfil her engagements, and is by the House enabled to fulfil those engagements, the treaty becomes a complete treaty; and there is no doubt it would be accepted as a complete treaty by the Power with which it was negotiated. In effect, Article 20, which has been so much adverted to in this House, is to defend Her Majesty, if She found herself in a position in which She is not able to fulfil her engagements with the foreign Power with which She has negotiated. If this be the case, and if the only mode in which the Treaty can be brought before the House, is by the remission or reduction of Customs' duties in Committee, and afterwards by the passing of the Customs Acts, I ask the House, how are we to deal with these considerable questions which may arise on this Treaty, which have nothing whatever to do with questions of the remission or reduction of Customs' duties? I would refer again to the 11th Article of the Treaty, which greatly interests—I may say agitates the public mind of this country—the one which refers to the prohibition of the exportation of coal, in which the Queen engages not to prohibit the exportation of coal. There has been a great deal of discussion and excitement in various places on this subject; but the question was never, in my mind, completely and clearly put before the country, till it was stated on Friday night by my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Belfast (Sir Hugh Cairns.) With great respect for the noble Secretary opposite, I could not infer from his observations that he fairly understood the question; because the noble Secretary referred to a treaty with Russia, which had been negotiated by Lord Malmesbury; and the noble Lord (Lord J. Russell) seemed to conclude that the case of that treaty was a complete parallel with that of the one before us. But, Sir, the treaty to which the noble Secretary referred contains only an engagement on the part of Her Majesty and the Emperor of Russia not to enforce, the one against the other, any prohibition of importation or exportation, which shall not at the same time be applicable to all other nations. That is not the case which the 11th Article of the present Treaty deals with. Nothing can prove that more clearly than that the negotiators have absolutely inserted in this very Treaty of Commerce, a proviso to that effect, which conclusively shows that the contingency contemplated in the 11th Article, which has so alarmed the country, is totally different from that identity of circumstances assumed by the noble Lord with the treaty negotiated by Lord Malmesbury. What is this 11th Article? My hon. and learned Friend called the attention of the House to the fact that the Parliament of this country had entrusted to the Sovereign the right of prohibiting the exportation of coal. Under the 11th Article of this Treaty the Sovereign has agreed with a foreign Power not to exercise that right which has been entrusted to Her by Her Parliament, for the space of ten years. Is not that a grave question? I give no opinion on the policy of the Government with respect to that act. I give no opinion on the law of the question. I am to-night not wishing to mix myself up with any controversies of any kind; but I ask the House, ought a treaty including such an Article as this, so nearly concerning the privileges of this House, and touching the very constitution of the country—and that Article not a financial or a fiscal one—escape the due consideration of the House of Commons? I say that alone, the argument from the 11th Article is one which I think is unanswerable for the end I have in view—that of bringing this Treaty before the House of Commons—for it never has been from the beginning brought before us. But it has been held by very great authorities, men who have been eminent in this House and illustrious in another House of Parliament, that notwithstanding Her Majesty has been advised to take a course illegal and unconstitutional, nevertheless the engagement is a complete one so far as the foreign Power is concerned, on the part of Her Majesty; and that if Her Majesty is able, by reductions and remissions of duties assented to by Her Parliament, to carry Her engagements into effect, Her Majesty will be bound by the 11th Article of the Treaty. If that be the case—and I give no opinion on it—how much more necessary is it that we deliberately, orderly, and methodically consider all those questions of reduction and remissions of revenue; because it might happen that it would be only by a refusal of the House of Commons to remit or reduce duty that the Sovereign could be extricated from an unconstitutional position, and one of great peril and danger. According to this view—and I give no opinion as to its justice—it is equally necessary that this Treaty should be placed before the House. The noble Lord the First Minister said the other night, “Of course the House will be asked to give their opinion on the Treaty.” Now, Sir, I want to know in what way we are to give that opinion, assuming, as I have throughout all these observations assumed, that the course of conducting business indicated by Her Majesty’s Government is pursued, and that we go into Committee on the Customs Acts, and pass all these remissions and reductions of duty necessary to enable the Queen to complete her engagements with the Emperor of the French? I want to know from the noble Lord if all those reductions and remissions are made, in what way Her Majesty’s Government proposes to bring the Treaty of Commerce with France before the cognizance of this House, and to subject it to the constitutional control and criticism of this House. That is a question which I hope will be answered to-night. Will the noble Lord the First Minister give notice of an Address to the Queen after all these reductions and remissions have been made? Does the noble Lord propose to give notice of an Address to the Queen assuring Her Majesty that we shall lose no time in taking measures which will enable Her Majesty to fulfil her engagements with the Emperor of the French? In the first place, it will be very difficult—I believe it is perfectly unprecedented under any circumstances—for the House of Commons to address the Queen on a treaty when Her Majesty has not been advised to condescend to address the House of Commons. It may be said that it was impossible in Her Majesty’s Speech to announce the fact of this Treaty of Commerce being ratified. But in a similar case—in the treaty of commerce which was negotiated at Utrecht—I find that it was negotiated while Parliament was sitting, and could not be announced from the Throne at the opening of the Session; but then a Message from Her Majesty Queen Anne was brought to the House to inform it of what had occurred; and that course led to communications which were in every respect constitutional and according to Parliamentary custom. But we need not go back to that distant period. It is only but yesterday—it is in the experience of two-thirds of the Members of the present House of Commons, though it happened under a preceding one—that our most gracious Sovereign entered into a treaty with the King of Sardinia while Parliament was sitting, and to carry which into effect She required the assistance of the Legislature. What then happened? The Minister brought down a Message from the Crown which invited a loyal and dutiful response. Sir, I think it would be very difficult for the noble Lord—all those remissions and reductions having taken place—to propose an Address to the Crown to inform Her Majesty that we were prepared to carry the Treaty into effect. But, the noble Lord may say, “It will then be full time for me to advise Her Majesty to address the House, and after you have concluded your Committee on the Customs Acts a Message from the Crown shall come down to you.” Sir, the relations between the Crown and this House are of a very peculiar and delicate character; and it should be our first study not to let them generate into mere formality. And for the Crown to send down a Message to this House, announcing that She had concluded a treaty with the Emperor of the French, and inviting our consideration to it, and calling on us to grant Her Majesty the means to carry it into effect, when Her Majesty must have been duly informed by Her Ministers that we had parted with all those privileges of Parliament which secured our constitutional control over treaties, would be a course which I think no Minister would be justified in advising his Sovereign to follow, and would be at the same time a mockery to the Crown, and I need not say an insult to the Commons of the United Kingdom. A great Minister, whom I shall have to quote in some subsequent remarks, has touched, I think, with great eloquence and truth upon the true union which may be effected between the prerogatives of the Crown and the privileges of Parliament upon this important subject of treaties. He said, "It is the happy circumstance of our constitution that it gives to the Crown the sole prerogative of negotiating and concluding treaties, but it gives the judgment, the revision, and the execution of those treaties to the privileges of the people." But I want to know how we can have judgment, how we can effect revision, and how we can exercise control over the execution of a treaty, if we have already parted with those privileges, the possession and the exercise of which form, as it were, the privy between the House and the prerogatives of the Crown? There is yet another course by which the noble Lord might contemplate bringing the Treaty of Commerce with France before the consideration of the House of Commons. The noble Lord might say, or might have thought, that it was in his power to give notice on a particular day—the Committee on the Customs Acts being concluded—to give notice that on a particular day he would call upon the House to consider the Treaty of Commerce with France. Well, now suppose the noble Lord gave that notice, how would he act upon it? He could not go into Committee to consider the Treaty, because already he has wasted all the reasons which authorize the House to go into the Committee. There is nothing for the House to decide upon as regards a Committee. In every financial and fiscal question a Vote would have been arrived at. But could the noble Lord then propose a Resolution that the House sanction the Treaty? I apprehend that if the noble Lord were to take such a course he would clearly be taking a course that would outrage the prerogative of the Crown. He could not ask the House of Commons to sanction a treaty already ratified by his Sovereign; and, therefore, if the noble Lord gave that notice, I cannot conceive, if he has exhausted his Committee on the Customs Acts—I cannot conceive what he would find to do when the House met to listen.

These, Sir, are the main reasons which have induced me to come to the conclusion that if the House persists in the present order of public business this Treaty of Commerce with France will really never be submitted to its constitutional control; and I want the House, this evening, to see whether there are not some means by which we can extricate ourselves from a position so difficult, and for the House I should say so humiliating, as that which we now—unintentionally I doubt not, on the part of the Government—appear to me to occupy. I think there are such means, simple and efficacious, by which we can extricate ourselves from this unsatisfactory position, and which, in my opinion, the House ought to adopt. I think we can do no better in the present state of affairs than follow those precedents with which the wisdom and experience of our predecessors have furnished us. There are several precedents which apply to the present state of public business of the House; but I don't want to weary the patience of the House to-night with the details, for this reason, because there is one precedent which from its nature is so apt and memorable, which affords an example so complete, and the actor in which was so illustrious, that I am quite aware that if the House will give their consideration to that precedent, and to the course of proceeding which was pursued by Parliament in that prime period of its reputation, they will obtain a guide not only in the present position of these questions, but in any combination of difficulties which may arise from probably the prolonged debates on the questions now before us. I have already referred to that precedent in the conversation on Friday, but very hastily and very imperfectly. If the House will permit me I will now put succinctly, but I hope clearly, before the House what took place with respect to the treaty of 1786; and it appears to me that in a right appreciation of those circumstances we shall find means by which we may disembarass ourselves of all those difficulties which we have already felt, and which if we do not take that course will, in my opinion, daily increase. The House will recollect that the treaty of commerce between England and France negotiated in 1786 was negotiated in the month of September, at the latter end of the month, and in the month of October it was published throughout Europe. Parliament did not meet till the last week in January, 1787; and therefore for four months that treaty and all its provisions had been canvassed and analyzed, and had been in the mouths and the minds of men. In February—I think on the 2nd of February—Mr. Pitt, having a few days previously brought up the treaty by command (as the noble Secretary of State did the other night) gave notice that on the 12th of that month, February, he should call upon the House to take into consideration the treaty of commerce with France,—thus allotting ten days for the consideration of a document which for four months had been so completely studied by the country that many of its defects had been discovered, and Mr. Pitt had even negotiated a supplementary treaty by which those defects were remedied. And that is another hint of which the hon. Member for Finsbury may avail himself. Let the House remember that when the Parliament met, the Sovereign had announced the negotiation and ratification of the Treaty from the Throne, which is not our case this year. Mr. Fox immediately arose against this proposition of Mr. Pitt, and protested against ten days only being allowed. We have only ten days allowed, when the Treaty was not even ratified when the Parliament met. We have not had the advantage of the deliberation and criticism of four months. On the contrary, it is only by a miracle that, the financial statement having been made on Friday, we were not called on to decide it on the following Thursday. And I think that all that has occurred upon these large transactions thus far has fairly shown that I was not irrational when I pressed on the House the importance of delay, and the absolute necessity of giving us time to consider in what manner we had best deal with propositions of such a magnitude. Well, upon the 12th of February, Mr. Pitt called the attention of the House of Commons, which had on his Motion moved into a Committee of the Whole House—he called the attention of the Committee to the consideration of the French Treaty, in a very ample and able speech, in which he considered the instrument both commercially and politically, and he concluded his speech by moving a Resolution. Now, Sir, that Resolution, the first of twenty resolutions

which Mr. Pitt had prepared :—and these resolutions—let me call the attention of the House particularly to this fact—these Resolutions were not Resolutions similar to those which the Chancellor of the Exchequer has placed on the paper in order that they may be moved in the Committee on the Customs Acts—they were general Resolutions :—Mr. Pitt himself impressed on the House not to be alarmed lest they should be entrapped into accepting details which they might afterwards regret. The Resolutions were drawn large and general, and they were not Resolutions, as I will show to the House afterwards, that could form the staple and elements of a revenue Bill. There were considerable debates, adjournments, and divisions on these Resolutions. Those Resolutions embodied the pith of the commercial treaty; for the commercial treaty of Mr. Pitt was limited entirely to commercial considerations and questions of navigation. If not so limited it would tell much better for my argument. But the twenty Resolutions of Mr. Pitt were discussed, amply discussed; divisions took place upon them, and towards the end of the month, the 20th, I think, of February, they were passed, they were reported to the House; and immediately after they were reported Mr. Pitt moved an Address to the Crown in answer to the passage in the Speech from the Throne—or rather, a follower of Mr. Pitt did it—pledging the House to enable His Majesty to carry that treaty into effect. And what then occurred? Why the Resolutions of this House and the Address were sent up to a body which appears to me to be entirely forgotten in this transaction; because when Her Majesty, in Her negotiations with the Emperor of the French speaks of the assent of Parliament, I can hardly suppose that Government considers that the Parliament consists of only the House of Commons. But Mr. Pitt sent the Resolutions and Address to the House of Lords for consideration, and took no further step in the business until the House of Lords had equally passed those Resolutions, after a formal but most memorable debate, distinguished, among other things, by a speech of the highest class from the first Marquess of Lansdowne, which may still be read with great profit, and which proved that he was a statesman of the highest order. And then, also, the House of Lords assented to an Address to the Crown, and the two Houses went up with their joint Addresses. And what then took place?

Mr. Pitt left those Resolutions on the table, and brought forward his Consolidation Act, and when the House went into Committee upon the Customs Consolidation Act those Resolutions were submitted to that Committee on the Customs Acts, and there they were worked out and brought into practical effect. After the House had discussed the general principles, then they had an opportunity of entering into all the minutiae which a subject of that kind demanded.

Now, Sir, I know I shall be told—there were some impatient Gentlemen when I talked of precedents—I may be told, “You are referring to times past. What have times past to do with an age of progress like the present? Never mind precedents. Never mind Standing Orders. Go a-head with large and comprehensive measures. You are not to suppose that the authors of such schemes are to be subject to such rusty regulations.” But had Mr. Pitt, in 1787, when he introduced the Treaty of Commerce with France to the consideration of the House, had he no large and comprehensive measures of reform—of financial reform? Why, considered with reference to the state of this country at that time—its revenue, its population, and its general resources—the measure of Mr. Pitt, brought forward for the consolidation and reform of our Customs and Excise, may be looked upon as by far the greatest reform of the kind that ever has been carried. Why, Sir, we hear a great deal now of simplification of the tariff, as if it was some new idea, the offspring of this enlightened age, and only discovered in Manchester. We are told now that a reform of 200 or 300 articles in the tariff is one of the marvellous actions of our day. Why, the House may form an idea of what Mr. Pitt’s labours were when he dealt with a tariff that had not been revised for generations—I must almost say for centuries—I must remind the House that the Committee had to go in his days into the consideration of no less than 3,000 Resolutions to carry his policy into effect. Mr. Pitt, therefore, had his large and comprehensive measure; but he did not mix it up in any way with his commercial treaty. On the contrary, having given the House of Commons of his day a constitutional opportunity of considering the treaty, having moved and passed in Committee the twenty Resolutions that were necessary to carry it into effect, no sooner had he obtained that result than he introduced his

Consolidation of Customs and Excise Bill; the House went into Committee, the Resolutions were referred to the Committee, and then the Committee had the opportunity of considering the financial and fiscal portions of his policy. Now, let the House observe this, that in the exposition with which Mr. Pitt introduced that treaty of commerce with France in 1787, there was not the slightest allusion to the effect which that treaty would have on the revenue of the country, though its effect must have been considerable. There was not the slightest allusion to his great and comprehensive measures of fiscal and financial reform, although it was his purpose to submit to the Committee upon that great Bill the Resolutions which had been passed in the Committee on the commercial treaty. In February, Mr. Pitt introduced his commercial treaty. In March, Mr. Pitt introduced his great measure of financial reform. And what did he do in April? Why, at the right time, Mr. Pitt proposed his Budget. And I ask the House now, why are we to be treated differently from the Commons in 1787? Why should we not have the commercial treaty, the comprehensive measure of financial reform, and then the Budget, brought forward in their natural order, and submitted to us in that manner which would give us frequent and ample opportunities for that matured debate and that criticism which questions of such importance, and of such complicated character demand? Well, now, Sir, I ask the House, why should we not follow in the present instance the same course as the Government of 1787? That is a question which I think ought to be answered; and if we follow that course, it appears to me that we shall remove all the difficulty which Members on both sides must feel, and we should have thus sufficient opportunities of debate and discussion, of which, in the mode in which those important questions have been introduced to us, it seems inevitable we shall be deprived; and that above all we shall have this treaty brought under our cognizance and criticism, which, so far as I can judge, will not otherwise be the case.

Sir, I must say I am at a loss to understand what objection Her Majesty’s Ministers will make to the proposition with which I shall conclude. I should be exceedingly glad if I could obtain my purpose without asking the House to assent to my Amendment. The Amendment that I have put on the paper is one in accordance with the forms of the House, and I have no other object in it but to secure to the House an opportunity of constitutional discussion of this Treaty, and of asserting the privileges of this House, and of securing that right of debate which hitherto we have deemed so important.

I said that I would make no observation on the policy or provisions of this Treaty of Commerce, but I may be allowed to make one remark—first, upon the negotiator of the Treaty; and, secondly, on the form of the instrument in which the result of the negotiations is placed before us. And I do so because I cannot help feeling that they are in some degree the cause of the embarrassing position in which the House is placed upon this matter generally. Now, Sir, I am sure that the House will do me the justice of believing, and perhaps remembering, that I have never been slow in recognizing the great ability and the honourable and eminent position fairly gained in this country by the hon. Member for Rochdale. I have the satisfaction to state that I recognized his abilities before they were acknowledged by vanquished Ministers, and before he received the approbation of those sympathising statesmen of whom it seems, somehow or other, he is doomed never to be a colleague. But I cannot but feel, and I now give the reason of the sentiment to the House, that it was a most unwise selection on the part of the Government to appoint as their secret agent Mr. Cobden—for I may now use his name, seeing that it is appended as a signature to the Treaty itself—it was a most unwise thing to appoint Mr. Cobden as their secret negotiator. I should rejoice to see the hon. Member for Rochdale upon that bench in an honourable and recognized position, because then we should know that he was responsible for the policy which we believe Her Majesty's Government professes. But when I find him the secret agent for negotiating a Treaty of Commerce it is impossible for me not to trace in the Treaty something of the idiosyncrasy of the negotiator. Now, for example. There are objections to this Treaty—I do not make them myself now, because to-night I wish to avoid any controversy of the kind; but it has been objected that there is in the Treaty a wanton destruction of sources of revenue much needed at this particular time. But, then, it is perfectly consistent with the opinion of Mr. Cobden that he should recommend those sacrifices of revenue, because Mr. Cobden is never at fault in his opinions—openly, frankly, and honestly professed as they always are—Mr. Cobden is never at fault for a substitute for the revenue which he forfeits, and he finds that substitute in reductions of expenditure. But is that the opinion of her Majesty's Government? The Estimates on the table prove that it is not; and I am quite sure that if upon this subject they shared the opinions of the secret negotiator they would soon forfeit the confidence of the House of Commons. Then, again, there is another very important matter in this Treaty, upon which there has been considerable controversy, and upon which Mr. Cobden has a most decided opinion; and that is upon belligerent rights. It is the opinion of some that the rights of belligerents are very lightly treated under this Treaty; but it is perfectly consistent with Mr. Cobden's expressed opinions that he should not guard those rights which he has himself always denounced. Now, so far with regard to the character of the negotiator. Let me say one word now as to the form of the instrument. I will not enter into any controversy to-night, as to whether this is a reciprocity treaty or not. The subject is not exhausted, and I hope there will be an occasion to renew it, especially if Her Majesty's Ministers, as I trust they will, consent to the suggestions embodied in my observations. But if it be a reciprocity treaty then I must say that reciprocity was was never less adroitly managed. If, on the other hand, it is not a reciprocity treaty, then I can find no satisfactory cause why these negotiations should have taken this conventional form. I say, Sir, I can find no satisfactory cause: but I should be in error if I were to say that no cause or reason has been given. The noble Lord the First Minister, at the commencement of the Session, gave us a reason for these matters, under negotiation taking the form of a treaty, which, no doubt, he thought perfectly satisfactory. The noble Lord said it was owing to the peculiarity of the French Constitution, that peculiarity being this, that the Sovereign of France can enter into treaties of this nature without consulting his Legislative Chamber, interested though they are in transactions which so much affect the taxation and industry of the country. Now, Sir, during our conversation on Friday last, some notice was taken—and I regret the tone in which it was taken—of the Legislative Chamber of France. I make it a rule,

Sir, to speak with unaffected respect of the constituted authorities of foreign countries. I think we may take it as a general rule that they would not be constituted were they not adapted to the exigencies of the time and to the character of the people among whom they exist. But, Sir, with respect to the Legislative Chamber of France, I am surprised that any Gentlemen who are what are called "advanced Liberals" should either speak in disparagement of that body or exult that they have not had the opportunity of exercising its functions. The Legislative Chamber of France is elected by universal suffrage. The Legislative Chamber of France is chosen by ballot. The members of the Legislative Chamber of France are sent to their seats from electoral districts. And if they be salaried members, why, when advanced opinions are triumphant, it will be recognized that they have only anticipated the idea of a British Member of Parliament. But, Sir, possibly—I give no opinion upon the matter—the Legislative Chamber of France may be inferior to us in political sagacity or in legislative skill. It may be that its members have not that high sense of political liberty which flourishes in this country. Perhaps—at least it is my opinion and I have often expressed it—in the old countries of Europe political liberty and aristocracy are inseparable. But, Sir, this cannot be denied; that a body of men elected under such circumstances and chosen under such conditions must at least represent the opinions, or, at any rate, the prejudices of the multitude that placed them there. Sir, my hon. Friend the Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate) referred the other night with legitimate pride to the circumstance that the most powerful Empire in Europe, and the most flourishing community in the United States, still profess those opinions in favour of protection to native industry which in this House he has so long, so ably, and, all must admit, so honestly maintained. There is a country which, I hope, is not inferior either to Imperial France, or to that famous Confederation beyond the Atlantic, to which my hon. Friend referred, and that is the country of which we are proud to be members. We have not been faithful to those principles of protection to native industry which my hon. Friend still professes. England has repudiated those opinions which France and the United States still maintain. But although these two great communities still adhere to those opinions, I think it is some satisfaction to learn that whatever difference there may be among them respecting free-trade principles, it has come to light through these negotiations that there is the same sympathy for constitutional principles. Free-trade principles may be, and no doubt are, very good things, but I may be permitted to say that constitutional principles are better; and allow me to remind the House that they are much older. Now, this Treaty of Commerce before us appears to be an instrument which has been devised to silence the voice of one Legislature. Do not let it turn out that in carrying it into effect another Legislature is deprived of its privileges. That is what I wish to impress on the House to-night. I earnestly entreat Her Majesty's Ministers not to force us to any division upon this question. I ask them fairly to meet the points which I have placed before the House—that they will not merely by concurrence and co-operation, but by their leading agency, bring back the House to that path of public business from which they have, I think, so unfortunately deviated. I accuse the Government—I will not use the word "accuse," but I would impute to the Government in this matter nothing but inadvertence. It is, however, inadvertence which, if persisted in, will lead to great Parliamentary inconvenience, and ultimately, probably to great public injury. I maintain it is the right of the House of Commons that this Commercial Treaty with France should be submitted frankly by the Minister to our criticism and constitutional control. I maintain that if you persist in the course of business now recommended, all practical control over its provisions is lost. It is a question which concerns the privileges of this House, the freedom of debate, and all those considerations which, I trust, never will become party questions. I want Ministers to feel that they can take the line which I have indicated, not merely with honour but with dignity; for, Sir, I suppose the time has not yet come when an English Minister can feel that he is in a false position because he defers to the privileges of the House of Commons, and acknowledges the authority of Parliament.

"To leave out from the word 'That,' to the end of the Question in order to add the words 'this House does not think fit to go into Committee on the Customs Acts, with a view to the reduction or repeal of the Duties referred to in the Treaty of Commerce between Her Majesty and the Emperor of the French, until it shall have considered and assented to, the engagements in that Treaty,' instead thereof."

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, the right hon. Gentleman, in the Motion which he has proposed to-night, abandoning for the most part, though not with entire consistency, throughout his speech those most interesting and important topics of general interest which are connected with the financial propositions of the Government, has called our attention to a matter which, however important, is strictly a point of procedure; and I think, when we consider points of procedure, it is for the convenience of the House that we should, as far as possible, avoid general and collateral discussions. On that account, Sir, I must confess that I do not see the peculiar advantage of importing into this discussion on procedure the criticism which the right hon. Gentleman has tendered on the character and competency of Mr. Cobden. I did not think it was at all necessary for the purposes and for the dignity of this House that the right hon. Gentleman should commence his speech by an explanation—however interesting it might be to us who had not the privilege of being summoned last week to a particular assembly, held at the house of a noble Earl—of the grounds that had induced him to think better of the decision which was then apparently arrived at, and to explain the change of purpose and of procedure which has taken place on the other side of the House. On this head I must say I should have greatly complained of the right hon. Gentleman if we had been deprived of the prospect that is held out to us of a general and comprehensive debate on the Motion to be made by the hon. Member for Essex—than whom, if he will permit me to say so, there is no Gentleman on that side of the House, especially of his standing, to whom an important party Motion could better have been committed. I make no complaint of the right hon. Gentleman; I merely state the reasons why I shall pass by those portions of his speech. Neither shall I at this time enter into a discussion on the constitution of France, or the conditions on which the Deputies occupy seats in that Legislative Assembly. With the permission of the right hon. Gentleman, I shall venture to reserve any share I may take in that discussion, at any rate till we come to the second reading of the Reform Bill promised by my noble Friend.

I proceed to the question which has been raised by the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman; and, notwithstanding that the point is, I think, a narrow one, I at once admit that it is of great importance. And here I must beg to tender my thanks to the right hon. Gentleman. He says we have caused the Queen to commit an unconstitutional and illegal act, and that we are pursuing a course which may end in the invasion and abrogation of the privileges of the House of Commons. If this must be so, I must say that I never knew a better opportunity for a broad charge on the part of a leader of the Opposition; but such is the chivalrous conduct of the right hon. Gentleman, that, casting over us his protecting arm, he says—"I have no doubt at all this was done in pure inadvertence." That is really the finest example of the great duty to which some of us yesterday were particularly exhorted—I mean the duty of Christian charity—that I have ever seen exhibited in this House. I cannot accept the apology which the right hon. Gentleman has kindly made for us, any more than, on the part of the Government, I can accept the Motion which he has placed on the books, and which he thinks we might, not only with propriety, but "with dignity," accept. The dignity of the Government is a matter on which different Gentlemen in different situations may have different opinions; but I confess that if we have been guilty of a course involving the consequences mentioned by the right hon. Gentleman,—if we have gravely erred in our duty to the House of Commons, the best attitude which we can assume in seizing the helping hand which the right hon. Gentleman holds out to us, cannot be the attitude of those who claim an unsullied dignity, but is rather the situation of penitents dependent on an adversary for their existence. But I contend that the right hon. Gentleman is correct neither in his facts nor in his principles; and that the course which we have adopted is that which is dictated by general propriety, by a regard to the privileges of the House of Commons, and likewise by that which he has never mentioned, but which undoubtedly has been much in the minds of the Government—namely, a regard to the interests of those great branches of trade out of doors which are dependent on the result and despatch of our decision.

I will give an instance or two to show what I mean by my allegations. The right hon. Gentleman says the Resolutions introduced by Mr. Pitt were essentially large and general, and totally incapable of forming the foundations of a financial measure. Here, Sir, is an enormous book from which we do not often quote directly, on account of its unmanageable size, but it contains the Resolutions proposed by Mr. Pitt, and the House will judge how far they are large and general.

MR. DISRAELI: I alluded to Mr. Pitt's description of them.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I do not apprehend that Mr. Pitt is responsible for the publication of that day, whatever we may be for Hansard in ours. Here are the Resolutions: I think we may find in them a pretty large capital upon which to found a financial measure. I will take one as a fair example:—

"That it appears to this Committee to be expedient that the duty hereafter to be paid on vinegar of the produce or manufacture of the European dominions of the French King imported into this kingdom shall be at the rate of £32 18s. 10d. on every ten containing 252 gallons."

Now, there is a specimen of a large and general Resolution incapable of forming the foundation of a financial measure. Give me that Resolution or Resolutions analogous to it, on the duties which we propose to the House, and you will soon see whether they are capable of forming the foundation of a financial measure. It was also said by the right hon. Gentleman—and I do not wish to quote him otherwise than with the utmost accuracy—that the treaty of Mr. Pitt contains no provisions other than those of a commercial character or relating to commercial duties. Why, the very second article of that treaty is one providing what shall happen with respect to personal safety and the security of the subjects of each Power resident in the dominions of the other in the event of war. That is neither a stipulation of commerce nor one of duty; and I quote it because it appears to me that the right hon. Gentleman amidst his researches has not had sufficient time to examine the instrument which he has taken the trouble to criticise. He says that after Mr. Pitt passed the Resolutions in Committee on the treaty, they were submitted to a Committee on Customs Acts. I beg the pardon of the right hon. Gentleman—they were submitted, not to a Committee on Customs

Acts, but to a Committee on the simplification of the public accounts in their various branches, which, I venture to point out to the House, is quite another matter.

The next thing in which I think the right hon. Gentleman was entirely in error, and which requires but a single word from me, was with respect to the charge against the Government of having by their ill advice led the Crown to commit an unconstitutional and illegal act, by engaging not to exercise for a period of ten years the power which Parliament has put into the hands of the Crown with the evident intention that it should be exercised at any time during or beyond ten years, if sufficient occasion to justify it should arise—that is to say, we have stipulated not to prohibit the exportation of coal to France; whereas Her Majesty is authorized to prohibit by Proclamation or Order in Council the exportation, or even carrying coastwise, of arms, ammunition, gunpowder, military or naval stores, or any articles which may be deemed capable of being converted into munitions of war. And as that clause includes, or may, under certain circumstances, be held to include, coal as an article which is capable of being converted into munitions of war, the right hon. Gentleman says we have abandoned our right to prohibit the export of coal as a contraband article. I do not treat that as a mis-statement of fact, because it may be a matter of opinion, and the right hon. Gentleman has a right to entertain his own opinion on the construction of the Treaty; but so far as dependence can be placed on the view of the Government, on the intention of the negotiators, whose careful consideration the Treaty long received, or on the best advice which was at our command, or which we have yet had the opportunity of receiving, this Treaty has no bearing whatever on any rights that either of the Powers may possess with respect to contraband of war. The power to export or to prohibit the exportation of coal as contraband of war, is as clear and entire, in the view of the Government, as it was before the treaty was signed. ["Hear!"] I am glad to see that I am cheered by the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Belfast (Sir H. Cairns)—it is rather unfortunate that he was the only Gentleman whom the right hon. Member for Buckinghamshire had the opportunity of consulting last night, or the matter might have been settled.

collateral to the main issue, let me collect, if I can, into a short compass what I understand to be the main propositions of the right hon. Gentleman. He says that we have withdrawn the Treaty from the cognizance of the House, and that we have placed Parliament in such a position that it cannot exercise its due constitutional liberty of discussion; he says that we have done this in total abandonment of the precedent of Mr. Pitt; and he complains that we have committed a gross error by mixing up the Treaty with the financial arrangements for the year, which, he says, ought to be kept sedulously apart; and, lastly, he expresses his wish that we could agree with dignity to the present Motion. I am bound to say that I feel great difficulty on the score of dignity; but, likewise—without any reference to that consideration—I feel the most conclusive objections to the Motion which the right hon. Gentleman has made. In the first place, I do not know what that Motion means; and I am, further, so rash and presumptuous as to express a belief that the right hon. Gentleman himself is equally ignorant of its meaning. For it seems to me that he declines to go into Committee on the Customs Acts till the House has assented to the engagements of the Treaty. What does the Resolution mean? If the right hon. Gentleman asks me what I mean by assenting to “the engagements of the Treaty,” I can inform him. He entreats the House in the strongest manner, and with a most remarkable inversion of what, if not common sense, at least of what convenience dictates,—when you have one article of a general character, and another specific and precise in its terms, he asks you to take no notice of the article that can bear only one construction, and consider the article that, if it stood alone, might really raise some doubt as to the sense of the Treaty. We are told that the validity of the Treaty depends on the 20th Article, which says,—

“The present Treaty shall not be valid unless Her Britannic Majesty shall be authorized by the assent of Her Parliament to execute the engagements contracted by Her in the Articles of the present Treaty.”

But now turn to the 14th Article. It says,—

“The present Treaty shall be binding for the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland so soon as the necessary legislative sanction shall have been given by Parliament.”

That Article is perfectly specific; it defines

completely the nature of the sanction of Parliament—the only sanction Parliament can give—that is, its legislative sanction. It is the 14th Article that requires for the present Treaty what Mr. Pitt required for his—the legislative sanction of Parliament. And if the right hon. Gentleman observes the construction of the Treaty, he will find that the engagements of Great Britain are contained in the 5th, 6th, 7th, and following Articles, and that before the 14th Article the special engagements of Great Britain terminate. Then the 14th Article explains in precise and distinct terms how the Treaty shall become binding for Great Britain—that is, as soon as the sanction of Parliament is given to it—its legislative sanction—by the final passing of an Act, by which alone that legislative authority can be conferred. Then, after the 14th Article, come the special French engagements; then the 20th, which says that the Treaty shall not be valid—that is, not valid for France—unless Parliament shall authorize the execution of those engagements. What does the right hon. Gentleman mean by this Resolution? It says that the House ought not to go into Committee on the Customs Acts “until it shall have considered, and assented to, the engagements of the Treaty.” What engagements? Does he think the House of Commons ought to assent first to the engagement as to the Customs’ duties to be levied ad valorem in the French ports? I know not what idea the right hon. Gentleman has of the functions of Parliament and the Crown; but I deny his proposition. The power the constitution has reserved to Parliament is this—it has fully secured to the House of Commons the right of giving its legislative sanction to those parts of the Treaty which require that sanction to have any effect; next, the House has the power of expressing to the Crown its general opinion of any treaty, either as to the whole or as to part, by means of an Address; and, thirdly, it has the power, if it disapproves any treaty, of visiting the authors of it with condemnation. Does the right hon. Gentleman claim for Parliament any more than this? I cannot accede to his Resolution, for, if I interpret it grammatically, it asserts that the House is to pass a specific consent in detail to each Article in the Treaty. Does he mean this, or does he not? For although in his speech he diverged sufficiently into details, the right hon. Gentleman carefully avoided saying a single word in explanation of the Motion he has laid on the table of the House. Now, Sir, I contend that, so far from having withdrawn this Treaty from the cognizance of the House of Commons—so far from having abandoned the precedents of Mr. Pitt, we have founded our course of proceeding in every substantial particular upon those precedents, with due allowance for those changes of circumstances in the condition of the country, and in our own system of commerce, which have occurred since the time when Mr. Pitt was occupied with similar arrangements. What was the course taken by Mr. Pitt? He announced the treaty of 1786 in the Speech from the Throne, which was not done on this occasion. But the treaty of 1786 was signed four months before the opening of Parliament. And, considering that the right hon. Gentleman has held offices that have placed him in immediate contact with the trade and commerce of the country, I was a little surprised to hear him, on such a question, recommend a strict adherence to the letter of the precedents in the case of Mr. Pitt's treaty, in complete defiance of their spirit. Did it not occur to the right hon. Gentleman that a more absurd proposal could not be submitted to the House of Commons than that the Government should advise the Sovereign to execute a treaty of this kind—a treaty acting largely on the revenue, and still more largely on the trade and commerce of the country—and, by a mistaken adherence to former precedents, to allow an interval of several months to elapse between the publication of the treaty and that legislative sanction which alone can enable merchants and traders to act upon it? The right hon. Gentleman has vindicated the memory of Mr. Pitt. I hope the House does not suppose I wish to depreciate the great merits of that distinguished man; I entertain a strong sense of the extraordinary advancement in the general opinion and understanding of his time, and the great vigour displayed by Mr. Pitt in concluding that treaty. Let the opinion of the present operations with respect to our trade and commerce be what they may, we shall deserve little credit or honour compared with that due to Mr. Pitt, who, having to confront such a mass of prejudice, proposed to, and obtained the assent of, Parliament to so great a measure as his treaty with France. Well, Mr. Pitt mentioned that treaty in the Speech from the Throne; the present Treaty has not been so mentioned. Why not? Because it was not within our knowledge at the time

Her Majesty was finally advised on the terms of that speech that the Treaty had been signed, much less ratified. The right hon. Gentleman, therefore, out of veneration for Mr. Pitt, thinks we ought to have recommended to Parliament a treaty that had not been signed. Then the right hon. Gentleman says we ought to have made known this Treaty to the House of Commons by a Message from the Crown. On all points of Parliamentary lore we will freely submit to receive correction, if we have acted wrongly; but as to this Message from the Crown, such is not our impression. Of all the treaties of commerce we have made during the last century—treaties so numerous as to be almost innumerable—I do not recollect that any one was made known to this House by a Message from the Crown. There is, I admit, the case of the Treaty of Utrecht, which was so made known to the House of Commons; but it should be recollected that the commercial portion of that treaty formed part of a transaction involving a treaty of peace. And, with regard to treaties bearing on peace and war, and the vital condition of Europe, it is the practice that they should be made known to the House by a Royal Message. But whether we are right or wrong in having a treaty presented "by command" instead of by a Royal Message—which we should have heard with our hats off, and that is the main point of difference between the two modes—how, I ask, does the mode of receiving the Treaty bear on the liberty and discretion of the House in discussing it? What can the House do in a reply to a Message from the Crown that it cannot do upon papers presented to it "by command?" Really the question is puerile! If we cannot present an Address on papers presented, cannot we pass Resolutions upon them and on those Resolutions found an Address? And then we shall have the advantage of a double debate—a debate on each Resolution, and another on the Address itself. The right hon. Gentleman complains that the time allowed to the House to consider the Treaty has been too small and scanty, and refers to the complaints made by Mr. Fox with respect to the time allowed by Mr. Pitt for the consideration of his treaty. I shall be very curious to hear, in the course of these discussions, up to what point the right hon. Gentleman is anxious to enforce the opinions of Mr. Fox as to the French treaty; but they are not very relevant to the present case, as they were not acted on or admitted by the House. I frankly admit we have taken a view of the necessity of despatch in this case that differs very widely from the view of Mr. Pitt on the same point; and I apprehend, were Mr. Pitt living now, amid the present development of our commercial system, he would not trouble his brain about the time and dates of the intervals between the different stages of his treaty, but rather would have considered the exigencies of the great interests involved, and would have proceeded in conformity with the answer which his enlightened intellect would have supplied. What, I should like to know, is the use of quoting Mr. Fox in the matter? Mr. Fox did not demand delay because he was not ready to go on with the discussion as to the duty which should be imposed on a particular kind of wine, but because he said France was our natural enemy, and that the measure of Mr. Pitt was one which struck at the root of the constitution of this country—or rather at the root of the power of the Executive in the conduct of its relations with foreign Powers. Basing his opposition upon that ground, no doubt he was perfectly justified in asking for delay. Not so, however, the right hon. Gentleman opposite, who seeks to pursue the phantom of delay in imitation of Mr. Fox, though he is wanting in the motives which lent Mr. Fox's objection substance and meaning. Well, Mr. Pitt proposed a Committee of the Whole House on the commercial treaty with France; and Her Majesty's present advisers, after maturely considering the question whether they should take the same course, came to the conclusion that Mr. Pitt was perfectly right in the form which he gave to his proceeding, but that they would have been absolutely wrong if, under the influence of a blind superstition, they had adopted the same form under a state of circumstances entirely different. I may perhaps be treading on tender ground in dealing with the forms of this House, but the view we took of the matter was this, that Mr. Pitt's legislation was a legislation in favour of French produce; that the terms of his treaty were literally represented in the Resolutions which he submitted to the House of Commons, and that it was therefore competent to him to take the course which he adopted. But now let me ask whether the right hon. Gentleman thinks it would be consistent with the public welfare or convenience, or with what I may now call the universal opinion of the House—for the right hon. Gentleman has to-night avowed that Free Trade principles are very good principles—that we should have come before Parliament and proposed an exclusive legislation in favour of French products? Every hon. Member's good sense must supply him with the ready answer to such a question—that such a course would be quite impossible. Yet that was the only course which was open to us if we had proposed a Committee of the Whole House on the Treaty with France. We could not have asked the House to go into Committee on the Treaty, and then in that Committee enter into questions of commercial legislation which are beyond its scope. We could not ask you to go into Committee on the subject of French wines, and then call upon you to sanction a Resolution which never mentions French wines at all, but deals with the wines of all countries alike, making them all the subject of great remissions of duty. I now want to know who are they who act in reality in the spirit of Pitt? He was a statesman who endeavoured to push forward the commerce of the country by great and enlightened changes in her laws; and in order to effect that object he took a course which I believe to have been entirely in conformity with Parliamentary law and precedent. We are endeavouring—I shall not say to compare ourselves with him, for of Mr. Pitt it may indeed be said with truth, Nec viget quidquam simile aut secundum,—but, following up the work which he was among the first to begin, we, too, seek to accomplish something in the same direction. It was with that view that, as Mr. Pitt proposed to the House to resolve itself into that Committee that could deal with the matter, we propose to you that you should resolve yourselves into a Committee competent to deal with the subject-matter which we had to submit to your notice with the utmost freedom. We, in short, have sought to act in accordance with the spirit of Mr. Pitt's policy, and not regarding it from an antiquarian point of view, to snatch at its dry form as you in your blind superstition—[“Oh, oh!”] I ask your pardon, and will use a phrase less exceptionable—your pardonable error would have us do, wasting your ingenuity, and eloquence, and declamations in the endeavour to impress upon our notice what is, after all, but the mere letter of this ancient formula, in contempt of its spirit. I have pointed out to you the course which was taken by Mr. Pitt. The House of Commons at his invitation went into Committee on the French treaty: and what did he then propose? Precisely that which we are going to propose; he did not submit the engagements of his treaty for the assent of Parliament, for he knew his duty as a constitutional Minister too well to place the clauses of the treaty in the hands of the Speaker or of the Clerk at the table, and ask the House to come to a decision upon them. He did not hold the doctrine of the right hon. Gentleman opposite, that, although the Queen may make a treaty on paper, it rests with Parliament to ratify its provisions. [Mr. DISRAELI: I used the language of Mr. Pitt as given in Hansard.] Then I can tell the right hon. Gentleman that there is a wide difference between the language of Mr. Pitt and his acts, and I should very much doubt whether Mr. Pitt ever held a principle on which he did not act. It is not a little remarkable that he should have propagated such a doctrine as the right hon. Gentleman ascribes to him at the very moment when, having invited the attention of a Committee of the House of Commons to the treaty with France, he submitted to the consideration of that Committee no portions of the treaty except those which absolutely required legislative sanction. We, acting upon the spirit of his policy, held it to be our first duty, and without interposing any difficulty, to bring under the notice of Parliament the most vital and substantial parts of the present Treaty; for that, if the right hon. Gentleman had permitted us to take the course which we desired to follow, would have been the direct effect of our proceeding. Indeed, I doubt very much whether there is in this Treaty one single point requiring legislative sanction which is not embraced in the Resolutions of which I have given notice. If there be such an Article, it is one of doubtful construction—that with respect to trade patterns. Now, if I understand the right hon. Gentleman opposite—and I am very anxious to ascertain his meaning correctly—he seems to look upon it as a great offence that Ministers should advise their Sovereign to enter into a treaty, and include in its provisions matters requiring legislative sanction, and does not thereon ask the assent of Parliament. Let me remind him, however, that there have been Ministers so insensible to their duty as to have contracted engagements with foreign Powers requiring direct legislative sanction, and who—I suppose it was all through inadvertence—forgot to ask legislative sanction to those engagements at all. The last example of such conduct on the part of a Government which has occurred within my knowledge, was when a treaty was entered into between Her Majesty and a northern Power, by the 20th Article of which, the high contracting parties being desirous to secure each within its own dominion protection against fraud in the case of certain manufactured articles, Her Britannic Majesty engaged to recommend to Parliament to adopt the measures which might be required to accomplish that object; and I am sorry to be obliged to add that the Government which advised the Sovereign to enter into this engagement—and who were aware at the time, as we all knew, that the law was insufficient to effect the object—were so forgetful of their duty as never to have come to Parliament at all to ask its assent to the treaty, not only when they laid it on the table—for they did not send it by message—but at any period during their continuance in office. And, most of all, am I sorry to say that the Government which was guilty of that monstrous dereliction of duty was the Government which the right hon. Gentleman opposite led in the House of Commons. But, to return to the proceeding of Mr. Pitt with respect to the treaty, there are, I admit, some portions of it which, up to this moment, we have not imitated. They, however, lie in the future; and if the right hon. Gentleman will but have a little patience he will find that as up to this hour, so at every future stage of this Treaty, it is our earnest desire to conform to the spirit which has always regulated proceedings of this nature.

The right hon. Gentleman says, that in Mr. Pitt's case the House of Commons was called upon, after voting the Resolutions on the French treaty to express an opinion upon the treaty as a whole, and to state that opinion in the form of an Address. That is perfectly true, and the Government are, I apprehend, entirely free to take that course; but Mr. Pitt, be it observed, did not announce it to be his intention to take any such course to the House of Commons until they had given their assent to the great stipulations of the treaty in detail. Whether it was that he thought it would appear to interfere with the liberty of the House on each of those stipulations, or for what reason, I know not, but, so far as we are able to learn, the House was invited to vote upon the details of the treaty without even having been informed that it was the intention of the Government after the details had been adopted to take its opinion on the treaty as a whole; and, therefore, if we have erred on this point, it has been through a too rigid adherence to the precedent of Mr. Pitt. But as the right hon. Gentleman is so anxious to be assured that in some shape or other the House shall have an opportunity of expressing its opinion on the specific engagements of this Treaty, I have no hesitation in stating that it is the intention of the Government if the House shall think fit to adopt those specific enactments requiring legislative sanction, fairly to submit the Treaty to the House, and to ask the opinion of the House upon it as a whole. And, let me add, we do not intend to do it as supposing it to be necessary in order to fulfil the terms of the Treaty that require the legislative sanction of Parliament, because we hold distinctly that the only mode in which Parliament strictly can give its assent to a treaty is by giving effect to the stipulations it contains which require legislation. A Parliament cannot assent to a treaty. Parliament is a fluctuating body. The King never dies, but Parliament does; and you could not in any formal way bind Parliament to any terms of a treaty; Parliament might be dissolved to-morrow, and a directly opposite vote might be given by that which succeeded it. It is not, therefore, to enable Parliament to assent to the terms of the Treaty in any formal or judicial sense that we shall ask its opinion, but to add all the moral weight we can obtain to the instrument in order to make it fulfil all the great purposes for which it is intended.

I have detained the Committee longer than I had intended, and I have but one word to add on the charge of the right hon. Gentleman. He thinks he has lighted upon a great godsend when he finds that Mr. Pitt separated his treaty from his Budget, and he points out with exultation the regularity of Mr. Pitt's course. But he did not state it correctly. First of all, he says, there was a Committee on the treaty, then a Committee on the Customs Acts, (Mr. Pitt's proposal was to simplify the Customs Acts), and then, said the right hon. Gentleman, you had the Budget. Here, then, is the meaning of the commotion of the right hon. Gentleman. The real sin the Government have been guilty of is that they have combined Treaty and the Budget in one. Very good. What ought they to have done? It is very easy to point out inconvenience in any course that may be adopted in carrying out a great and complicated subject. [Mr. NEWDEGATE: Hear, hear!] But I want to know what course should have been taken by the wisdom of Parliament, as represented by that hon. Gentleman who has just cheered. What construction has been put on our procedure by the right hon. Gentleman who made this Motion? I understand him and the right hon. Gentleman who made the Motion to say that we ought to have separated the provisions of the treaty, and the discussions on them from the financial arrangements of the year—that is, in the beginning of February we ought to have released French wines from duty by resolution; we ought to have reduced the duty on French spirits by resolution, and we ought to have repealed a great number of other duties on articles coming from France. Are hon. Gentlemen opposite aware of the usage of this House, now confirmed for a considerable number of years, that when duties are reduced the reduced duties take effect immediately after the Resolution has been reported to the House? Surely, after the profound and deliberate consideration of the question of procedure by the right hon. Gentleman, that must have been taken into account. I presume he would not have inflicted on importers and traders the penalty of hanging up this matter for some months? Very well; the upshot of this procedure would have been—you would have legislated to reduce duties on French wines and spirits and on other articles by resolution; that resolution would have taken effect in the usual manner at the Custom House the morning after they were passed by the House; and for three or four months we should have had what must have gladdened the heart of the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Newdegate), but, perhaps, after his declaration to-night, would not have gladdened the heart of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Disraeli) by a perfect revival of differential duties in all their deformity or beauty—call it what you will; and French wines would have been admitted at 3s. per gallon, while Spanish wines would have been paying 5s. 8d., and French spirits would have been admitted at the reduced rate, while Dutch spirits would have continued to pay the highest duty. As this is, I believe, the first night the right hon. Gentleman has boldly declared that the principles of free trade are very good principles, I am very sorry at this his first essay on his mode of giving effect to those principles. In point of fact, Sir, our defence for mixing the Treaty and the Budget may be comprised in two sentences. We considered, in the first place, exclusive legislation entirely out of the question. That is one of the principles I want to see tested by the vote of to-night. That was our first principle; the second was one that had reference simply and exclusively to public convenience. We were about to propose to Parliament that it should give its sanction to a treaty with France that involved remissions of duty to an extent little short of £2,000,000, and a surrender for the year of revenue to an extent somewhat exceeding £1,000,000. Now, Sir, I want to know what would have been the position of the Government if they had come down to Parliament, not in this special year 1860, but in any year, stating we ask you to remit taxes to nearly £2,000,000, and to surrender revenue above £1,000,000, but we will not tell you yet what are to be the financial arrangements of the year. That is the justification of our combining the Treaty and the Budget; and I am certain that this House will not fail for a moment to see the sufficiency of that justification. Nay more, I venture to say this, had the right hon. Gentleman himself been Minister at the time; had he made this Commercial Treaty with France—for he is a great admirer of commercial treaties with France—had he been Minister, and had he made this Treaty, the force of circumstances, the force of reason, the fear of resistance, the fear even of ridicule, would have prevented him from proposing to the House to commit itself to proposals vitally affecting the revenue of the year, and at the same time telling the House of Commons that the financial arrangements were not to be considered in connection therewith. That is, I think, enough to show that under the form of raising a question of procedure and rectifying the mistake which the Government has committed, it is to be charitably presumed, the right hon. Gentleman says, through inadvertence, he proposes to us not only to rectify an error, but to commit an error of the grossest kind, and one which, if it ever entered into our intention to commit, the House of Commons would have speedily rectified in an unmistakable form, by expressing its sense of the folly of our proceedings.

SIR HUGH CAIRNS: Sir, if any Member of the House could, by the liveliness of his imagination, make us forget the actual facts of the case as they lie plainly before us, that man is the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer. But I would ask you for one short moment to return from the great fancy he has displayed and actually to consider what is the point to be answered by him, and which, I submit with confidence to the House, has not in any way been met. I listened with some patience to hear from the right hon. Gentleman what explanation he would give with regard to those clauses in the Treaty which do point to the power and interference of Parliament; and, although he read at the commencement of his speech the two clauses which refer to the interference of Parliament, I was somewhat amazed to hear at the end that all these clauses mean, with the exception of the reduction of Customs' duty, is to give some moral weight to the Commercial Treaty entered into with France, and that in point of constitutional law the House has nothing to do with the Treaty but to sanction the alteration of Customs' duties, I want to test that doctrine, and I shall do so within the shortest possible compass. There are two articles in this Treaty, and I will not go beyond them, on which I will join issue with the right hon. Gentleman. One of them, you may say, is a comparatively unimportant one, and, as the right hon. Gentleman himself admitted, is somewhat difficult to understand. Well, I should say, for the authors of the Treaty, it is rather early to admit that any of the articles are difficult to understand. One of the two articles relates to trade marks and copyrights of design. I say it is quite impossible you could give effect to an Article relating to copyrights of design without an Act of Parliament. This stipulation requires the sanction of the House of Commons; how can the right hon. Gentleman obtain that assent in Committee on the Customs Acts? But I come to what is a much more important Article, as to which I look for a very different answer from that just received. I took the liberty the other night of calling the attention of the House to that Article of the Treaty—the eleventh—with regard to coal. I pointed out that the Crown had a power, conferred by Parliament—an absolute power—to prohibit the exportation of coal, whether in time of war or the imminency of war; and that this power conferred by Parliament could not be surrendered by the Crown or be advised to be surrendered without the assent of Parliament. Now, what answer did the right hon. Gentleman make to that? He said, "We considered it very carefully; and we came to the conclusion that this part of the Treaty does not in any way touch the article of contraband of war, and therefore does not require the assent of Parliament." I ask, who ever talked of contraband of war? I certainly never said a word about it, nor did my right hon. Friend (Mr. Disraeli); and if the Chancellor of the Exchequer does not know the difference between contraband of war and the right of prohibiting certain exports, with great humility I would say, the sooner he studies it the better. Contraband of war has nothing on earth to do with this question; and, if the right hon. Gentleman has been advised that this article does not touch contraband of war, I entirely agree with the advice that has been given to him. In truth contraband of war is the common term used in reference to the proclamation made by a belligerent Power as to what articles it will seize if it finds them in neutral ships. But the right now under discussion is a right vested in the Sovereign by Act of Parliament, not a belligerent right. The Crown possesses it for two purposes—first, to prevent supplies of an important article from going to those who are or may become our enemies; and next, to enable the Sovereign in times of extremity, when naval stores may be essential to the salvation or the success of this country, to take care that we are amply provided with them. Do the Government mean to say that a power intrusted by Act of Parliament to the Crown can be surrendered by the Crown without the consent of the body which gave it? The Chancellor of the Exchequer certainly did not advance such a doctrine. He met the argument by merely saying—what nobody controverts—that the 11th Article of this Treaty does not touch contraband of war. Here, then, without going any further, are two engagements in this Treaty which I maintain it is the privilege of this House to consider, and give either its assent or its refusal to. The simple question I desire to ask is, when and in what form of proceeding that privilege is to be exercised? The Chancellor of the Exchequer has told us that the very next day after we agree to the Resolutions in the Customs Act, they will be acted upon by the authorities of the Custom-house; and it is a well-ascertained practice for this House never to withdraw from a Resolution which it has so passed. Why, that is our very case, and it is the plainest case in the world. You admit that wherever the assent of Parliament is necessary for the engagements in a Treaty, that assent must be given in some form or other. There are two articles here which require that assent. It cannot be given in a Committee on the Customs Act, but must be given in some subsequent proceeding. In the meantime, however, you are going into a Committee on the Customs Act, and to ask us to pass Resolutions which are immediately to be acted upon, and from which you cannot afterwards withdraw. The result is this,—if the House should afterwards refuse its assent to those parts of the Treaty which do not affect the Customs' revenue, you will have repealed the duties—you will have done the mischief, and you cannot go back. The House of Commons will have refused its assent to those engagements of the Treaty, which require its assent to give them effect, and yet you will have lost your revenue. The right hon. Gentleman says, "We ask you to go into Committee on the Customs Act, not as Mr. Pitt proposed to go into Committee on the French Treaty;" and his reason for that is that "the modifications of duty to be made in Committee are modifications on the produce, not of France, but of all countries." But the fact cannot be disputed that it is by treaty with France that you have bound yourselves to recommend to Parliament to repeal or reduce the duties on the manufactures and produce of all nations. Therefore, if you go into Committee on the French Treaty, according to the precedent followed by Mr. Pitt, the Treaty will be strictly within the province of the Committee, and the stipulation respecting the remission of duties, no matter what country the produce subject to them comes from, will be legitimately before it. And here I must say the Chancellor of the Exchequer can hardly remember his own Resolutions; for although he tells us that in the Committee on the Customs Act no mention is to be made of the French Treaty, but the whole question will be dealt with as a general reduction or repeal of the duties on the goods of all nations, I find that in one part of his Resolution he speaks of articles which are to be "free of duty under treaty." Yet he now says it would be foreign to the business of the Committee on the Customs Act to allude to the French Treaty, or to look upon the remission as applicable to French produce. The course taken by Mr. Pitt under similar circumstances is, I contend, the only convenient course that can be adopted in the present case to give the House the power of discussing these questions. He proposed that the Speaker should leave the chair, in order that the House might go into Committee on the French Treaty. No doubt Mr. Pitt in Committee moved only such Resolutions as he thought necessary to carry out the objects of the Government; but it was perfectly competent for every member of that Committee to discuss any term of the French Treaty, and propose any Resolution he pleased, approving or condemning it. That is exactly the difference between our position now and that in which Mr. Pitt placed the House. If we go into Committee to-night, or on any subsequent evening, on the Customs Act—and here I speak under Mr. Speaker's correction—it will not be competent for any Member to enter into the general policy of the French Treaty. I even doubt whether it will not be irrelevant to mention the Treaty at all; but it certainly will not be competent for—and the Chairman will not allow—any Member to propose a Resolution expressing an opinion on the whole or part of that Treaty. We demand, then, on the part of the House of Commons, some proceeding—no matter what, provided it is practical and convenient—by which we shall have this Treaty fairly presented before us, and that we may not be entangled—though I acquit the Government of any intentional desire to entangle us—into an approval of its stipulations in the shape of a Resolution on the Customs Act. I fully admit the importance to trade of expedition and certainty in this matter; but I demand what is even more important than the interests of trade—the observance and retention of one of the most valuable privileges of the House of Commons. If any undue delay has arisen the Government have themselves to thank for it; because if they had pursued a course that would have given this House the means and opportunity of expressing its opinion on this Treaty and all its details, they might to-night, in place of asking us to go into Committee on the Customs Act, have asked the House to consider a similar resolution to that proposed by Mr. Pitt on the French Treaty. The right hon. Gentleman says it is utterly contrary to practice to bring down any treaty with a foreign Power in the shape of a Message from the Crown, and such, he thinks, has not been the usage for many years past. I ask the Government, can they produce any example of the bringing down of a treaty of commerce to the House of Commons, which required its approval in order to give it validity, without accompanying that treaty either with a Message from the Crown, or without introducing it by the Speech from the Throne? The right hon. Gentleman produced nothing of the kind; and the only case which with all his diligence he could find was the treaty concluded with Russia in 1859, which, he says, was laid on the table of the House, and the provisions of which the Government so far forgot that it did not ask the House of Commons to give effect to one of the articles which required its intervention. The 20th Article of the Treaty with Russia, to which the right hon. Gentleman referred, is as follows. And here again the right hon. Gentleman has fallen into an entire mistake:—

“The High Contracting Parties being desirous to secure, each within its own dominions, complete and effectual protection against fraud for the manufactures of the other, have agreed that any piracy or fraudulent imitation in one of the two countries of the manufacturers' or tradesmen's marks originally affixed, bonâ fide, to goods produced in the other, in attestation of their origin and quality, shall be strictly prohibited and repressed. Her Britannic Majesty engages to recommend to Her Parliament to adopt such measures as may be required to enable Her to give the more complete execution to the stipulations of this Article.”

There is nothing there declaring that the Treaty shall not be binding till Parliament has legislated. But in the present instance the Treaty provides that it shall take effect only as soon as the necessary recognition shall have been given to it by Parliament; and in another part it is stated that it shall not be valid unless Her Britannic Majesty is authorized by the assent of Her Parliament to execute the engagements contracted under the Articles of the Treaty. I say, then, that the Amendment before the House is one that ought to be adopted. We do not ask for any delay, but we want to have an opportunity of discussing this question. We are quite prepared for its discussion; but we cannot discuss the French Treaty upon Resolutions moved in Committee on the Customs Act, nor upon the Bills introduced in pursuance of those Resolutions. We may discuss it on some future day, if you propose to address the Crown with reference to the Treaty. But what will be the consequence? We may differ from the Government in respect to the Treaty. We may approve certain parts of it, or we may object to this, that, and the other engagement. We may think it requires some of the modifications which scores of petitions presented to-night beg and pray for, and then the Government may say, "What! modify this Treaty after you have repealed £1,800,000 of Customs' duties! What did you remit those duties for? Was it not to give effect to this Treaty?" They may also say, "Has not this Treaty already cost you £1,800,000 of revenue? Don't you mean to adopt it after that?" That would be a plausible argument, and one which I dare say it would be most convenient for a Government to urge; but, on behalf of the privileges of this House, I submit a different argument. I ask that this House may not be put in that position, and that we may have the means of expressing a free and unfettered opinion on this Treaty before we can be told that the revenue of the country has been already given away. I submit that there could be no delay. It is in the power of the Government within a few days to bring down a Message, within a few days to go into Committee, and within a few days to obtain the opinion of the Committee and of the House upon those parts of the Treaty which are not mere reductions of Customs' duties; and then, when they find that there is nothing in the Treaty which is not approved and assented to by the House, with the exception of the Customs' duties, then, and not till then, let them ask us to go into Committee upon those duties. We shall then know that if the Customs' duties are dealt with as the Treaty proposes it will be complete as far as the House of Commons is concerned; and we shall not be told at the end, when we come to discuss the parts relating to those duties, that we are practically forbidden to discuss them, because the whole of the Treaty has been acted upon and acknowledged by Parliament.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL: Sir, after the most eloquent, and, I may say, crushing speech of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, it is hardly necessary that anything more should be said in defence of the course taken by the Government; and when my hon. and learned Friend got up, I really thought that he had risen to redeem the promise given by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire, that if a pledge were given that an opportunity should be afforded to the House for the discussion of this Treaty, the object of his Motion would be fully answered. My hon. and learned Friend, however, used arguments and stated propositions, which are so entirely alien to the mistaken representations contained in the address of the right hon. Gentleman that—as, indeed, we might have expected from the account given by the right hon. Gentleman, that this Motion was the joint production of their consultation at a late hour on Friday evening last—there has been the most complete consistency between the errors of the one and those of the other. In fact, I have seldom heard more erroneous propositions brought forward than those which were advanced in the few sentences which have just fallen from my hon. and learned Friend. He tells us that it is inexpedient to discuss the Resolutions upon the Customs' duties, because, if the Treaty is not afterwards confirmed, there will be a gratuitous loss of revenue. My hon. and learned Friend, able as he is as a lawyer, is probably not so conversant with the practice at the Custom-house. All who are familiar with the transaction of business by that Department are aware that, although a remission of duty takes effect in favour of the trader, from the moment a Resolution is passed by this House, it is accompanied by this safeguard, that the payer of the reduced duty is required to give an undertaking to pay the full amount in case Parliament should not ratify the Resolution by passing the necessary statute. Therefore we may discuss these Resolutions without any apprehension of the danger which has been paraded by my hon. and learned Friend. Again, we are told that you will have no opportunity of discussing the Treaty in discussing the Resolutions on the Customs Acts. That, I humbly submit, is a very great error indeed. It is only necessary for the House to bear in mind why it was requisite for Her Majesty to introduce into the Treaty the clauses with reference to the assent of Parliament; and I may be permitted to say that in all these matters it is most essential that the proper line of the prerogative on the one side, and of the right of Parliament on the other, should be strictly observed and acted upon. The necessity for coming to Parliament is simply this—that the Queen proposes to enter into stipulations which are at present at variance with the provisions of Acts of Parliament, and cannot, therefore, be entered into, except subject to the assent and approbation of Parliament. It must always be recollected that so far as the Treaty deals with matters requiring legislative interposition, so far it is submitted to the necessary antecedent assent of Parliament; but those matters which are within the power and within the ordinary prerogative of the Crown are not submitted to that assent. It is the right of Parliament to criticize them, to express an opinion upon them, to censure those who have advised the Crown; but all those things which do not militate against the established law, are within the limit of the ordinary prerogative of the Crown, and they are not submitted for the antecedent assent of Parliament. My hon. and learned Friend made some very great mistakes with regard to two matters, the dealing with which by this Treaty he said required the antecedent assent of Parliament. First, with regard to the trifling subject of trade-marks. [Sir H. CAIRNS: Not trade-marks; patterns for designs.] Trade marks require no assent. [Sir H. CAIRNS: I said so.] Certainly, with regard to patterns of designs, there was no necessity for coming to Parliament at all; nor is there with regard to trade-marks. This is a stipulation introduced at the expense of the foreigner, and for the benefit of England; and with regard to which, therefore, Her Majesty was rightly advised that it was not necessary to make any recommendations to Parliament whatever. The effect of the Article is entirely at variance with what the hon. and learned Gentleman supposes. It is a concession made by a foreign Power for the benefit of the English trader, not a stipulation at the expense of the English trader, which the Queen would be obliged to ask Parliament to sanction and carry into effect. He was just as much in error with regard to the 16th and 17th of the Queen, the Customs Act, which gives to the Crown the right to prohibit, under certain circumstances, the exportation of all articles which may be judged capable of being converted into or made useful in increasing the quantity of Military or Naval Stores. Now, the military and naval stores which are there referred to are the military and naval stores of Great Britain, not those of a foreign country. This prohibitive power is not a statutory prohibition—it is a power given to the Crown; it is not a direction. It is matter of prerogative and right of the Crown, which is made subject to the arbitrium and determination of the Crown, and with regard to which, therefore, the Queen may most properly enter into any contract contained in this Treaty, for in so doing she acts within the limit and verge of the authority given to Her, and She wants no further Parliamentary sanction or authority whatever. With regard, therefore, to both these two matters which have been superadded to the other erroneous grounds of argument in defence of this Motion, I can only say that there has been community and identity of error between the right hon. Gentleman and my hon. and learned Friend. Let me now refer the House to the assertion that we cannot discuss the Treaty in discussing the Resolutions which are intended to be proposed in the Committee upon the Customs Acts. I beg the House to observe that those Resolutions are introduced simply because it is necessary to propose to the House of Commons an alteration of the law having reference to this very Treaty. When, therefore, you are asked to alter the law with reference to the Treaty you have before you the whole ground and reason upon which you are asked to alter the law, and may properly discuss it. The first Resolution which will be put into the hands of the Chairman for altering the existing law with a view to the reduction of a duty being a proposition with reference to this very Treaty, the whole Treaty, as a matter of Parliamentary cognizance, comes into the field, and you have a right to consider the propriety, expediency, and polity of that Treaty, as a whole, with reference to the law which you are requested to alter. It is impossible, therefore, to devise any mode in which there will be more constant, necessary, and legitimate reference to the Treaty than that of proceeding by these Resolutions. In point of fact, any other mode of proceeding would have been an anomaly and a contradiction, which would have involved those who proposed it in the greatest absurdity; for how in the world can you discuss a treaty when the existing law forbids you to carry it into effect? How could we have proposed any Address or made any humble representation to Her Majesty upon this subject until we had first considered the propriety of revoking and repealing those laws which stand in the way of the consideration of the Treaty? The only proper and legitimate mode of proceeding was to call the attention of the House of Commons to the fact that the existing law was at variance with the provisions of the Treaty, and to give the House of Commons an opportunity of considering the propriety of repealing that law in order to allow the introduction of the articles specified in the Treaty. A more correct form of procedure could not have been adopted than that adopted by the Government in the present instance. You are asked to consider the law. Why? Because it interferes with the Treaty. If you are satisfied to accept the Treaty as a sufficient ground for altering your law, you will remove the law out of the way of the Treaty, and, having taken away all impediment to the full affirmance and confirmation of the Treaty, you may proceed to enable the Crown to enter into engagements conclusively, which are now, to some extent, only conditional. I could not have thought that a great party would have occupied itself with a mere exercise of idle ingenuity. In fact, one epithet which I have heard used appears to me a most correct designation of the course which that great party has thought fit to adopt—it is a puerile proceeding. It has been held up to us as the result of grave and mature councils, but I hope that in future those councils will be directed rather to the forwarding than to the retarding, by such subtleties, of the great business of the nation, and that we shall find those disposed to enter into the great arena of proper discussion which is now open to the House of Commons, namely, the propriety and advantage of this Treaty, every part of which will be before you when you are invited to consider the propriety of altering the law in order to carry the Treaty into effect.

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, that the Members on his side of the House were greatly obliged to his hon. and learned Friend who had just sat down for his advice. He would venture, in return, to advise his hon. and learned Friend that, before he vouchsafed to instruct others in the construction of the Treaty, he should himself look to its terms and make himself master of its clauses. If he (Sir F. Kelly) had been surprised at the terms in which some of the clauses were framed, he was still more surprised to hear the construction put upon this Treaty by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, a construction which the Attorney General did not attempt to allude to. The question was, what was the true construction of the 7th, 14th, and 20th clauses of the Treaty? It was rather remarkable that whoever may have been the framers of this Treaty, appear to have gone on from one con-

fusion to another, introducing a reservation in the 7th clause, afterwards referred to in the 14th clause, making the effect of the Treaty conditional as regards the United Kingdom, without reference to what followed in the 20th Article, which made the whole Treaty dependent upon the sanction to it, as a whole, of the Legislature of this country. The effect of that 20th Article would be, that the Treaty would be invalid from beginning to end, and would be binding upon neither Sovereign, nor upon the subjects of either country, till the whole Treaty in its entirety was sanctioned by Act of Parliament. The 20th Article said, "the present Treaty shall not be valid," not that it might be modified or varied, but that it should not be valid "unless Her Britannic Majesty shall be authorized by the assent of Her Parliament to execute the engagements contracted by her in the Articles of the present Treaty." He need not say that there was only one way by which Parliament could signify its assent, and that was by an Act of the Imperial Legislature. Upon referring back to the 14th Article, he found it provided that "the present Treaty shall be binding upon the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland so soon as the necessary legislative sanction shall have been given by Parliament, with the reserve made in Article VI. respecting wines." The effect of those two Articles, save as to the reservation in the 7th Article, was not that the Treaty would become invalid, but that, in fact, it should not be valid at all until it received the sanction of the Legislature. And now as to the course which the Government were disposed to adopt. They said they were following the precedent established by the treaty of 1787, and the course then recommended to Parliament by Mr. Pitt. He (Sir F. Kelly) considered, on the contrary, that they were departing from every precedent in existence. They proposed at present to lay aside the Treaty, but to deal with its provisions in Committee on the Customs Acts. Now, let him call the attention of the House to what might be the effect of this most unprecedented course. Every one knew that as soon as a remission of duty was determined upon in Committee on the Customs Acts, the immediate effect was that the duty, for all practical purposes, was remitted and repealed. Now, see the effect of this. If no opposition was made to the Motion that the Speaker do leave the Chair, in Committee a Resolution would be proposed by the Government to give effect to the 6th Article of the Treaty, which provided that the duty on French wines be reduced to 3s. per gallon. If that Resolution was carried, the duty upon foreign wines would be reduced from that very hour, as if an Act of Parliament was passed for that purpose—indeed, even at the present moment the merchants were asking the Government to allow a drawback upon the stocks they held. Now, supposing that Resolution was carried, the Chancellor of the Exchequer would proceed step by step to propose Resolutions ultimately to give effect to the whole of the Resolutions in the order in which they at present appeared. He would take the 11th Article of the Treaty, by which the two Powers engage not to prohibit the exportation of coal. Suppose the sense of the House to be taken with regard to this Article; suppose the Government to propose to the House a Resolution in conformity with this Article; there was nothing improbable in the supposition that the House, however disposed it might be to yield to a relaxation of the duty on wine, might pause before they consented to the stipulation not to prohibit the exportation of coal. He said that however the House might be led away by the eloquence of the right hon. Gentleman, sooner or later they must come to the consideration of what was the legal construction of the 14th and 20th Articles. Whether by Message from the Crown or not, certainly in some way or other—whether they took the Treaty step by step, clause by clause, line by line, or not, the Treaty in its entirety must be sooner or later submitted to the consideration of the House. He begged the House to consider in what situation the Government, the House, and the Queen herself would be placed, if this Treaty came before either House, Parliament having before expressed its disapprobation of one of its clauses. Then with regard to the 14th Article, which provides that the Treaty shall be binding for the United Kingdom only so soon as the necessary legislative sanction shall have been given by Parliament, he should be glad to know what course the Government would advise Her Majesty to take in case of the refusal of that legislative sanction to some one of the Articles? He would further beg to refer to one or two other Articles which express what Her Majesty had agreed to. She had not contracted to do what the Government were now doing—namely, at once to propose to Parliament to repeal certain duties. By the 20th Article the Treaty was to be of no validity unless Her Majesty shall be authorized to execute the same by Act of Parliament. Then, when the Treaty comes into operation, it is to become obligatory on Her Majesty, and then She is to propose to Parliament to repeal the import duties on French wines by Article VI. If so, was the Treaty to be performed by Her Majesty while it was yet uncertain whether the Treaty would ever come into operation or not? If any one adverse vote should be registered by the House, it would then be impossible to adopt the Treaty, inasmuch as it contained no provisions for modification or substitution in case of any Article or stipulation being rejected by Parliament. If it should turn out that the disapprobation of Parliament should be expressed, or any rejection of a vote should take place in the way in which the Treaty was now proposed to be laid before Parliament, Her Majesty would then be in this singular position, that whilst she would have undertaken to propose to Parliament to sanction the reduction of certain duties, the Treaty under which that undertaking was made would be no longer binding upon her. The consequence would be that in such a state of things Her Majesty would be completely paralyzed. The Treaty of 1787 contained no such clause as that which makes this Treaty conditional upon the sanction of Parliament. No doubt it never could have been adopted in this country without the aid of Parliament, but it was not at every step of its progress exposed to the risk of being negatived by some adverse vote. He asked whether it was possible for the House to take a course which was more fraught with danger than that which they were now taking, when they considered—and he supposed the Government did sometimes consider—that there was another branch of the Legislature, and that the sanction of the House of Lords must be given to every clause of this Treaty. The House of Lords might differ from that House in some matter not of finance, and then the whole Treaty must be rejected. By so framing the Treaty that it must be accepted or rejected as a whole, the Government had placed themselves in this inconvenient position that they were obliged now to propose to Parliament to go on vote by vote, though the disapproval of any part of the Treaty by either House would cause the whole Treaty to fall to the ground. If the course proposed by the Government should be persisted in, the House would be soon involved in a state of confusion and difficulty from which even the ingenuity of the Chancellor of the Exchequer would entirely fail to extricate it, and which might most injuriously affect the interests of this great commercial community. He said then that this Treaty, if it be properly called a Treaty, should have been submitted, as that of Mr. Pitt was, in the first instance, to the sanction of Parliament. And here he was bound to say that in the remarks his hon. and learned Friend, the Attorney General, had thought fit to make upon the prerogative of the Crown, his hon. and learned Friend knew the law too well not to know that he was trifling with the House. What, was it to be said for one moment that it was competent to Her Majesty to barter away her prerogative to a foreign Power without the consent of her Parliament? He hoped he should never see the day when that doctrine would be upheld by any Member of that House, especially by so distinguished a lawyer as his hon. and learned friend. He begged to apologize for having detained the House upon what might perhaps be considered a technical question; but feeling the vast importance of the question, and how deeply it affected the interests of the country, he thought it his duty to point out a danger which he thought must inevitably occur, in the course which the Government had thought fit to pursue.

MR. NEWDEGATE: The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer has thought fit to refer to me in a somewhat uncourteous tone, by speaking of me as the "wisdom of the House." The House will perceive how puerile such observations are. I might just as well allude to the right hon. Gentleman as the "consistency of the House," the "deliberate judgment of the House," or the "frankness of the House." But such observations are beneath the notice of this Assembly. I wish the House to consider who is responsible for the time at which the Treaty is made. I wish to know who is responsible for having advised Her Majesty to accept the Treaty, which it is proposed shall become operative immediately in England, but which, with regard to the Customs' duties, will not be operative in France till eighteen months hence. A great deal turns upon this. I do not wonder at the right hon. Gentleman, the Member for Buckinghamshire, suggesting the inconvenience which must result from the hasty adoption of this Treaty. That is a legitimate subject for the consideration of this House. Is this House really consulted as to this Treaty? Or is it only required to act upon it? In 1787 Mr. Pitt left the substance of his treaty five months before the country, in order that the country might instruct their representatives whether they assented to that treaty or not. But now, what happens? Just at the opening of Parliament this Treaty is thrown upon the table. And what use does the Government make of it? They immediately tell the House "you must go into Ways and Means before you go into Supply, because we have negotiated a Treaty which imposes upon you that necessity." Now, is that consistent with the practice of this House? The Government bring our relations with a neighbouring Power to bear on the finances before we consider what Supplies for the maintenance of her establishments this country may require. And then we are told that it is all in the interest of peace. Peaceably it certainly is, if submission is to be the condition of peace, for it is no less than submission to the nation across the Channel, a sacrifice of the independence of this House and of the country. The question of time was entirely at the discretion of the Government. What need was there to conclude this Treaty now, or before July and October, 1861; That would have been time enough for France. She will not reduce her Customs' duties till then. Why should we anticipate her action? Is it for the sake of leaving our unhappy producers exposed to the competition with France, while burdened by her prohibitory tariff and high Customs' duties? Why has this particular time been selected? No answer has ever been given to that. The right hon. Gentleman, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, says—"You must act immediately now that the Treaty has been laid before you, for the sake of the convenience of trade, for the sake of the holders of stock." That is no answer to the questions, why the duties in England should be removed immediately while those in France are retained for eighteen months? What is the cause of all this? Is it fear? What other inducement is there to the conclusion of the Treaty at this particular time, and forcing it thus hurriedly on our attention? I can understand no answer but fear. I object to this Treaty as one-sided. It is somewhat strange that Mr. Cobden was chosen as the exponent of the opinions of the Government; we know this, that Mr. Cobden holds opinions against all Customs' duties whatever. There could not have been a more improper person to select as a negotiator than Mr. Cobden. He could not claim or enforce any kind of reciprocity. He went to Paris, the French Government knowing that he would not depart from the consistency of his life, and ask England to maintain Customs' duties. His very appearance told France she might make her own terms. And what is the result? That England is to resign her Customs' duties; but we are pledged to sanction France in the levy of Customs' duties of 30 per cent. And how are we to stand with the rest of the world? If we establish a precedent of a duty of 30 per cent in France, as in the case of silk, and then 25, how can we complain if other countries levy like duties on our goods? They will point to the Treaty with France as a justification of any course they may adopt. Supposing we address Spain, and the noble Lord instructed Mr. Buchanan that we were going to reduce the duties on wine, and that he should require some reciprocal action of Spain, Mr. Buchanan would say, "Reduce our duties below 30 or 25 per cent." What answer would he receive from the Spanish Government but, "You have abandoned your duties in favour of France, and sanctioned her retaining 30 or 25 per cent duties on your goods: you cannot expect us to reduce our duties!" This is reciprocity on one side, indeed. No doubt the noble Lord, and very rightly, desires to stand well with France. So do I. The French policy approves itself to my judgment, because I believe the French Government to be at the present moment standing up for religious freedom. But I am not prepared to sanction a policy of cowardly concession to France because France is opposed to Rome. No, no! the matter has been quite otherwise stirred. There sits the hon. Member for Birmingham. He has a scheme of finance by which Customs' duties are to be abolished; and he very honestly suggested that in their place every one should be taxed, either by a poll tax, which is impossible, or by a property tax, which the hon. Member prefers. But there lately appeared an able article on this subject in the Edinburgh Review, and the hon. Gentleman will forgive me if I am wrong, but it appears to me that the substance of that article satisfied him he could not propose his scheme, in all its nakedness, with any prospect of success. He seems, however, to have said to himself—"Oh, if my friend, Mr. Cobden, can but persuade the Government to enter into a commercial treaty with France for the abolition of the Customs' duties, I shall accomplish my object, through the pressure of French influence brought to bear on the House of Commons." There is no question but that the hon. Member for Rochdale has got this House into a very pretty fix. The position in which he has placed us—let us endeavour to avoid it as we may—is this, that at the very commencement of the Session, and before we have begun to vote the Supplies, or to provide for the defences of the country—before the House of Commons have even ascertained what will be necessary for the defence of the country, we find ourselves in this position—that we must either offend the Government of France, or we must abandon revenue which at the present time we can so ill spare, if we are to carry out those national defences which the people of this country are prepared to exact of their representatives. That is the position in which we stand. The Chancellor of the Exchequer may be very angry with me for saying this, but that will not change the circumstances of the case. The fact is, that this House is now in a position in which its natural relations are interrupted by the intervention of this Treaty, which places us in this position—that we must either accept its terms, or affront the Government of France; and, if the right hon. Gentleman will say that that is a position which befits the representatives of a free and independent people assembled for the purposes of calm deliberation, credat Judæus. I will not go further into this subject. It is clear this House has been trapped. These negotiations have been pressed upon us, to use the mildest terms, under the influence of France; and then we are told that it is for the convenience of trade that we should not deliberate before we act. Sir, perhaps I may be an old-fashioned Member—perhaps I may be imbued with some of the haughty spirit which we are told animated the House of Commons of 1787, but I must say I rejoice that the right hon. Gentleman, even by the intervention of a few hours, has given us this opportunity of considering and expressing our opinion. I shall vote for his Motion with great pleasure, and I have only further to say, that if the Government are not acting under the compulsion of fear, they show little respect for the House of Comm-

Mr. AYRTON said, he rose for the purpose of stating the grounds upon which he should vote on the proposal submitted to the House; and he could not help expressing his regret that, instead of proceeding regularly and systematically to the consideration of the great subjects which Parliament was about to discuss, they should have put them aside in order to involve, and to some extent perplex themselves, by the examination of transactions which had taken place in former times. He thought it would be well to recollect that the Treaty involved not only the interests of people of this country, but the interests of people in other countries; beyond doubt the manner in which it was treated by the British House of Commons would be eagerly watched and closely scanned. Their course therefore ought to be without doubt or question. Independently of the privileges of the House of Commons, perhaps that was a reason which had always induced former Ministers to bring under the notice of Parliament in a most clear and distinct manner whatever engagements the Crown had entered into with Foreign States, so that no misapprehension could arise as to the course which Parliament adopted. Whether that was a sound view or not might be immaterial to the determination of the present question; but they found that upon every treaty, from the supplemental treaty which followed that of Utrecht up to the very last which had been entered into, a uniform course had been pursued by Ministers and Parliaments. They approached this question with the reflection that Government now, for the first time, invited them to depart from the established usages of the constitution, and to adopt a course which he believed was entirely unprecedented and unknown in our Parliamentary history. If there were precedents on their side, it was the duty of the Government to produce them, in answer to the right hon. Gentleman, the Member for Buckinghamshire, who did not think it necessary to quote more than one, because that was perfectly apposite to the circumstances of the present case. He would repeat the assertion of the right hon. Gentleman that the records of Parliament showed an uninterrupted series of precedents from the beginning of the last century down to the very last occasion when action was required, and that it had always been the practice either to take into consideration the Message of the Crown recommending the Treaty to the notice of Parliament, or the Treaty itself, in what was formerly called the Grand Committee, but which was now called a Committee of the whole House. Upon this occasion there was no necessity to draw the line where ancient precedents were to be passed by as obsolete, and where new precedents were to be adopted; because, whenever Parliament had been called on to vote the money of the people in execution of a Treaty, the course had been to go into Committee on the Treaty and there take the requisite votes. Although sometimes the Treaty alone had been referred to the Committee, and at others the Acts to be altered had been referred with it, the principle was the same. To name a precedent since the Reform Bill, there was the occasion when Lord Althorp had to deal with a Treaty of commerce and Navigation, and the very last was in March 1856, when the House went into Committee to take into consideration the Queen's Message with reference to a treaty with Sardinia. The Motion was made by the noble Lord at the head of the Government. Now he would not say, that the precedent ought to be respected by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, because he had frequent opportunities of seeing how much and how often the right hon. Gentleman differed from the noble Lord at the head of the Government; but the noble Lord himself ought to regard his own precedents; and however much he might stand pledged to this Treaty, he was bound to watch over the privileges of this House, and to enforce its constitutional course of action. He knew how difficult it was to frame a Resolution which would bear minute criticism, and he could not congratulate the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire upon the one which he had submitted. But, passing that by as beneath consideration, and looking only to its substantive and distinct object, he intended to vote for it. He looked only to the avowed purpose with which the right hon. Gentleman proposed it—namely, to take the Treaty into consideration and express a deliberate judgment upon it, and beyond that he should not hold himself bound in voting with the right hon. Gentleman. It was of the utmost importance that forms—even if they were only forms—should not be lightly set aside when they regulated the proceedings of 600 representatives, and he deeply regretted that the Government should have refused to entertain the subject on Friday, when it was first brought under their notice by their own friends. The course which the right hon. Member for Buckinghamshire had taken was forced upon him. The Government treated the suggestion with disdain, and determined to abide by their designed act, as they were bound to do if they really believed it was for the interest of the country. But what was the ground on which they justified their procedure? They said that commerce was of that character that the House must pass Resolutions the instant a treaty was published which involved a prospective reduction of duties. But surely they would give the French Emperor and the French Government credit for understanding the interests of the trade of France; and yet the French Government did not hesitate to make prospective arrangements, and fix a future day when duties should be reduced; and therefore it was clear that time was not so important that the Treaty must first be kept back, and then Resolutions hurried through for the sake of the interests of commerce. What was the reason that Parliament was asked to depart from its usual custom in relation to treaties of this kind? Surely the Government could not be afraid of having the Treaty discussed upon the completion of which they seemed to pride themselves. If the Treaty were as good a thing as they said it was, the first thing they ought to do was to take the judgment of the House upon it. When the House was asked to go into Committee and to pass Resolutions giving effect to the Articles of it, they must take it as a whole, and either reject it and address the Crown to take measures to reopen the negotiation, or accept it as a whole. If the noble Lord below would look at the language of Mr. Fox, whose authority he would not deny, he would see that such was his opinion. The moment the first Resolution was passed, then the whole question was over, and the remaining Resolutions became mere matters of form. It must be borne in mind that these proceedings were being watched by the whole French nation, and they ought therefore to be such as would leave no grounds for imputations of shuffling or evasion. Either a Resolution ought to be passed declaring that Parliament would not accept the Treaty, or they ought to proceed to accept it honourably and honestly. When once a single Resolution had been passed, he would not consent to go into a division to question any one Article of the Treaty.

If the House went into Committee on the Customs Act, the Resolutions which it passed there were not to give effect to the Articles of the Treaty, but to modify and alter the present Customs' laws. There was an essential difference between the two proceedings. A statute passed to-day, if it contained the usual provision, might be repealed in the present Session. At any rate, the Parliament which met in February next, would be as free to repeal it as this Parliament was to pass it. But if the House passed a statute to give effect to this Treaty of Commerce, the Parliament which met in February next would not be free to consider it; the hands of Parliament would, in fact, be tied, and they would be deprived of all control over financial legislation in these respects for ten years to come. The two operations were in their essence totally distinct. The Resolutions which the Chancellor of the Exchequer proposed, therefore, were not a faithful execution of the Treaty on the part of Parliament. He was bound to take a Resolution on every Article of the Treaty, not for one year only, but for ten; and if he did not, he had not given that legislative sanction to the Treaty which he had bound himself to obtain. They must look to the effect of these commercial conventions upon our relations, not with France alone, but with Russia and other Powers, which were directly affected by its language. Substantially they had to decide this question that night, whether they would proceed immediately to sanction that Treaty, or whether Parliament was not bound to give its due deliberation to decide upon its policy, and to take into consideration the claims of the people of England who thought that their interests would be injured by it. There had been times when Parliament did not think itself quite so popular, quite so perfect a representative of the country as it seemed to think itself now. It was chary then how it dealt with the liberties of the people—how it sanctioned a summary disposal of their industry. Men were heard then at the bar of the House in support of the interests which they thought were affected. That, however, had been got over. The House was supposed more truly and completely to represent the whole people through their representatives than in former days; and believing that the course of procedure proposed by the right hon. Gentleman was the only one which would enable these representatives to give a deliberate and unfettered vote upon the important questions involved in this Treaty, he felt it to be his duty to vote for the Amendment.

MR. MALINS said, he had noticed with regret the tone in which the speech of his right hon. Friend (Mr. Disraeli) had been received by the other side of the House. It was a speech characterized by great lucidity and temperate language, and the Resolution with which he concluded was of the most moderate character. It had been met, and especially by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in a tone of bitterness and sarcasm, which had no application to the subject; and which was followed by the Attorney General in a similar spirit and tone, and he denounced the Amendment as "perfectly puerile." He asked what was in it that was "puerile"? The nation had been taken by surprise; they suddenly learnt that a Treaty of Commerce had been entered into, and this had given rise to various suspicions and anxieties. A large portion of the community believed that their best rights had been bartered away for no consideration, and that the bargain was a one-sided bargain when we engaged to admit French produce duty free, and France engaged to admit our produce at not less than thirty per cent duty. The Treaty provided in itself that it should receive the sanction of Parliament; and what the hon. and learned Attorney General called a "puerile proposition" was that it should be submitted to the judgment of Parliament. The Resolution of his right hon. Friend asked no more than that the Treaty should be submitted to a fair discussion, and that the sense of Parliament should be taken upon it, apart from the numerous other questions which were mixed up with it in the Resolutions upon which they were asked to go into Committee. The Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Attorney General had led the House to understand that it would be virtually discussing the principles of the Treaty if they went into Committee upon the Customs Acts; but they must have overlooked or suppressed the fact that there were several stipulations that did not involve Customs' duties at all, such as those with respect to coal, upon which no duty had ever been charged, and the differential duties charged by France upon foreign shipping, with which we had nothing to do, but which at the same time operated most injuriously upon the shipping interests of this country. Coal and iron were among the objects which had principally contributed to the greatness of England, and yet by the 11th clause of the Treaty their exportation was not to be prohibited for a period of ten years, except in the case of direct war with France; so that a nation with whom we were on the best terms might be destroyed in the interval, and we should be forced to furnish France with the sinews of war. Unless the terms of the Treaty were modified such must be the construction which every Member of the profession would put upon them. He had seen it announced in The Times that the French Government was willing to modify some portions of the Treaty; and it was above all things desirable that not only on this point, but on the 11th clause relating to the differential duties on French shipping, some alteration should be made. According to the present system it was actually the interest of a merchant at Calcutta to ship his goods in a French in preference to an English vessel. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had by his eloquence endeavoured to lead the House on a wrong scent, and, perhaps, to some extent he might have succeeded in doing so; but the country at large was not blinded by his statements, as was shown by the shoals of letters which poured upon Her Majesty's Government daily, and almost hourly, remonstrating in the strongest possible terms against the propositions contained in the Budget. Indeed, so large was the correspondence that measure had produced that it might go far to make up the deficiency in the revenue by the increase in the postal department. The course proposed by his right hon. Friend—namely, that they should follow the precedent set by Mr. Pitt—was free from all those objections. If the Treaty was such as to deserve the approbation of Parliament, that approbation would be given in a free and independent manner on the merits of the Treaty itself; if not, our domestic finance would not be complicated, bound up with considerations altogether foreign to the subject; and for these reasons he hoped that the House would support the moderate and constitutional proposition which had been made to them. He would call upon the House, in conclusion, to come to the discussion of the subject at once, instead of proceeding in such an irregular course.

MR. BRIGHT: From the very earnest and animated manner of the hon. and learned Gentleman who has just sat down, a stranger might be led to imagine that there was some great question before us.

But after having listened to every sentence, I think, that has been spoken in the debate, I can hardly tell what it is we are debating. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire assured us it is not a party question; but I did not feel that he added any confirmation to that statement when he informed us he had consulted nobody but the hon. and learned Member for Belfast (Sir Hugh Cairns)—by no means a bad soldier to have at one's side when engaged in a party fight. Still, I can learn nothing from the speech of the right hon. Gentleman or of his supporter, because I am perfectly satisfied neither the one nor the other divulged the real object and purpose of this Motion. In the speech of the hon. Member for North Warwickshire I could get at something real. He digs up theories we thought were dead and buried, and never more to appear among us. I do not in the least blame him for the course he takes, though I cannot understand the point of view from which he regards this question. He does not believe in the Treaty, or in the principles which his leader pronounces good; and therefore, like a man, he stands up and says so; and, however absurd his views may be, or however erroneous in my opinion, still he discloses them frankly, and makes it no secret that his object in supporting the Motion is just to get rid, if he can, of this obnoxious Treaty. But what is the true object of the Motion? If I were on that side of the House—and it is not an uncomfortable side to sit on, as I know by pretty long experience—and held the opinion which many hon. Gentlemen opposite do, of the Budget and Commercial Treaty, instead of carping at them in private and making vicious stabs at them in the House, I would fairly avow I thought the Treaty a mistake, that the Queen had been badly advised in entering into it, and that the Government were to be condemned for their policy, and that Parliament should not adopt it. I would be open and aboveboard. I would take—I was almost going to say, the only rational—at least the only manly course. The real fact, I am bound to believe, is that a portion of the hon. Gentlemen opposite are very much annoyed at the Treaty from beginning to end; another portion do not like the side of the House on which they sit, and they think that an attack may be made on the Government with some success. Perhaps the Treaty may be altered in some respects; but I hardly imagine even that party will go so far as to overthrow it. This is why the Motion has been brought forward and is supported by hon. Gentlemen opposite. If those Gentlemen are really against it—if the House is against it—why do they not bring forward a Resolution and say at once that it ought to be rejected? The Resolution of the hon. Member for Essex does go, without saying it, very near meaning it, because he objects to the reduction of the duties as diminishing the ordinary revenue—the duties and ordinary revenue are necessarily reduced if the Treaty be adopted, and hence his Resolution goes a very long way towards condemning the Treaty altogether. I am free, for my own part, to confess I cannot exaggerate the greatness of the policy which characterizes the Treaty or the good which I believe it will do to this country and to France—indeed to Europe generally. It is a great question, and worthy of a great debate. Let there be one side of the House for it, the other against it; but let us debate it manfully. Do not take the course chosen by the leader of hon. Gentlemen opposite—a course which half of his own party, even if they vote with him, would rather in their hearts he had not taken. Do not put a Resolution on the paper which nobody can understand—which his principal recruit on this side of the House cannot even compliment as either grammatical or sensible, and which proposes a course which neither the right hon. Gentleman himself, nor any one who has spoken on that side of the House, has yet been able to give an explanation of. I am not going into the question of the Treaty in the least. We will talk about the coal difficulty by-and-by. Every one who knows anything about the matter knows that the whole navy of France does not consume in a year half as much coal as a single colliery in England can produce, and, after all, is only what the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Disraeli), speaking of the national debt, called a mere “fleabite.” If you are not adverse to the Treaty,—for I desire to give the right hon. Gentleman all the credit I can for his proposal, and to believe that he is merely anxious the House should take the most convenient and expeditious mode of considering this great proposition with the view to advance the public interests—let us consider what is the proper course to take. I am so much in favour of the Treaty I can vote for it altogether as it is. I am so much in favour of all the great free trade measures in the Budget that I can vote for it also as it is. But I do not insist others should do the same. I cannot expect the House of Commons to come by a leap, as it were, to a conclusion like that. But I ask you to consider that great interests are involved in the question, that it is one which ought not to be made the mere stalking-horse of party, and one we cannot fight over night after night without any definite proposition before the House. The question, it seems, is Treaty or Budget. On the other side they do not speak much in favour of the Treaty, but they are all very anxious the House should pass the Treaty at once. Suppose the Government had taken the course hon. Gentlemen opposite affect to recommend, in what position would the House have been then? Suppose the Chancellor of the Exchequer, or the noble Lord at the head of the Government, or the noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs, had laid the Treaty on the table of the House and asked you to discuss it—could you take the Treaty and go through it from beginning to end and put every single word, every sentence, every proposition to the vote? Do hon. Gentlemen opposite propose that? Or do they propose that the Government should have offered to the House a Resolution for an Address to the Crown expressing the general approbation of the House of the Treaty which the Queen has negotiated with the advice of Her Majesty's Ministers? If they did, then I would vote with them. But only look at the position the House would have been in after such a Resolution was passed. You could not then have gone into the details of the Treaty, you would have been prevented from considering all the propositions to which the Chancellor of the Exchequer invited your attention. A very large proportion of the propositions of the Budget are details of the Treaty; and if you had approved the Treaty in the bulk, and got rid of it, when you came to the Resolutions of the Chancellor of the Exchequer you would have been precluded from any examination of half of his proposals, you would have been shut out from exercising the most constitutional duty, privilege, and right of the House of Commons—that of examining seriatim every one of the features of the plan which the Chancellor of the Exchequer lays before you. Now, my notion of the course we should take to expedite business is this—we should go through the whole of the Budget, accept what we can accept of it, and reject what we do not like. I dare say there is something in it we do not like; but we should take it, as we do other things in life, a little bad with a little, or, it may be, a great deal of good. But, when we have gone through the Budget, including everything of the Treaty that can take effect through the Resolutions on the Budget, several things will be left in the Treaty not included in the Resolutions, which it will be still necessary for the House to consent to. When we have done this, it will be very easy to pass Resolutions expressing the approval of the Budget if the House does approve it, and the whole thing will be at an end. What can be more rational than such a proposal? As I understand neither the Chancellor of the Exchequer nor the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary has not the least objection to the House of Commons expressing its opinion on every point of the Treaty not involved in this Budget. Is this not a course, then, that hon. Gentlemen opposite may well adopt? I am afraid they have a very faint idea of the amount of inconvenience and suffering this state of things produces in the country. It may be assumed from the number of deputations that wait on Ministers, the letters that fill the newspapers, and are received by Members of this House. A very large portion of that which annoys persons in trade, when such changes as the present are proposed, is, not the ultimate result of such changes, but the torture, the perplexity and difficulty by which they are surrounded during the three or four weeks the subject is in suspense in this House. If you believe that the policy proposed is bad, the Budget bad, and the Treaty bad, you are perfectly justified in opposing it, or even in throwing out the Government on it. But you should meet it in a straightforward and manly way. We on this side of the House are mainly in favour of the proposition; you, on the other side, are mainly against it. We decide by majorities, and a result may soon be come to. Move a specific Resolution; let us have the debate on a well-defined question, and talk it out. The country will derive some information from the discussion, and, I hope, will be satisfied with our decision. Every Chamber of Commerce that has noticed this plan, almost every meeting, and every opinion given in the press, or by the public, except on details not very essential—has been in favour of the great changes the Government has proposed. Now, I ask the hon. Gentlemen opposite not to be led astray on this question, for any mere party interests ; not to leave the whole trade and industry of the country in a state of suspense and partial confusion, till these great measures are settled. If I speak to any Member in private he agrees with me in this ;—if these things are to be done let us get them done. I am not arguing in favour of any party ; I urge it on behalf of the country and of interests ten thousand times dearer to us, I hope, than those of party. I do not speak in favour of these measures to keep one set of gentlemen in office or another set out. I only wish the hon. Gentlemen on the other side when they sat here had had the courage to propose a policy like this. They should have received from me as warm a support as I shall give the right hon. Gentlemen who now have the good fortune, if good fortune it be, to occupy the Treasury benches.

MR. SEYMOUR FITZGERALD said, they had for nearly five hours been discussing the Amendment which his right hon. Friend had proposed in a speech of singular clearness and ability, and—more than that—marked by a tone and temper befitting the great party he represented in that House ; yet though they had been so occupied for five hours, and had heard several speakers from the other side of the House, yet no one had attempted to grapple with the point that Amendment set before them. My right hon. Friend was followed by the Chancellor of the Exchequer ; but his speech was certainly no exception to the observation he had made, though if ridicule and personality, only so far veiled as not to become offensive, could establish a case, the right hon. Gentleman would have been successful ; but never since he had had a seat in that House had he heard a speech in which a debater had dealt so unfairly with the arguments and statements of an opponent. The right hon. Gentleman represented his right hon. Friend as suggesting that the Treaty should have been made public four months ago, or at least, that a delay of four months should take place before Parliament was called on to decide upon it. That was never suggested by his right hon. Friend ; all he said in narrating the circumstances attending the production of the treaty of 1786 was, that a certain time had been given before the debate on the treaty in the following year. Again, the Chancellor of the Exchequer stated that the effect of the suggestion of his right hon. Friend would be equivalent to a protective duty on French wines during the next two or three months.

What his right hon. Friend proposed was exactly the reverse. He proposed to go into Committee not on the Customs Act, but on the Treaty : and no Resolution passed by a Committee on the Treaty could have any such effect. He had consulted the authorities of the House, and he found that this was the case. He was astonished that any one in the position of the Chancellor of the Exchequer should not have known this, and should have made such an attack in ignorance. The accusation against his right hon. Friend that he proposed to recur to an antiquated system of protection was utterly groundless. He would not follow the many misrepresentations of the right hon. Gentleman. He wished rather to recall the House to the strict point, that had not yet been dealt with from the other side of the House ; that point was, whether the course taken by the Government in this instance gave the House a fair opportunity of discussing the Treaty. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had almost ridiculed his right hon. Friend, and charged him with paying a pedantic regard to musty precedents. But the right hon. Gentleman (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) had justified the course he was himself taking by saying he followed substantially the precedent of Mr. Pitt ; but, so far from being the same course, it differed not substantially, but in some points essentially, from it. Mr. Pitt moved certain Resolutions in Committee on the treaty ; the right hon. Gentleman proposed to go into Committee on the Customs Acts. The result of the two courses was perfectly different. If the House went into Committee on the Customs Acts, any reduction of duty it made would commence from the time the Resolution passed. If it considered the Treaty, such a reduction of duty would not commence till after the Treaty had been sanctioned by the House. and Resolutions in accordance with the Treaty passed in Committee on the Customs Acts. Then, in a Committee on the Treaty, any Member might move a Resolution in reference to any article in it. In a Committee on the Customs Acts this was impossible. The only clauses the Committee would be competent to consider were those clauses by which a reduction of duty was made. The effect of the difference between us is that the right hon. Gentleman wished to limit the House to the consideration of the Treaty to those portions of it which were contained in the Customs Acts ; whereas those who sat on his side of the House said that it was the right of the

thority of the House was in that case necessary before the Treaty took effect, and he wished to know when it would be applied for. The Treaty contained a clause relative to shipping. There, again, was a most important clause which by itself the Government with all their strength could not pass any more than the Article regarding coal. When was the House to have an opportunity of expressing an opinion upon that Article of the Treaty? The House knew that if his hon. Friend the Member for Essex (Mr. Du Cane) moved his Resolution, and a division took place upon it, no further Amendment could be moved, and that in Committee on the Customs Acts it would be impossible to take into consideration the clause relating to shipping. They had been told that it was possible to raise the whole question on Resolutions and an Address to the Crown, and the hon. Member for Birmingham had recommended this as a manly way of meeting the question. But it was precisely because it was not a manly way of meeting the question that hon. Gentlemen on that side of the House could not vote for it, since it would put the issue in a shape in which it would be impossible to give an opinion upon the details of the Treaty; and they said that the only way of properly discussing it was by bringing forward Resolutions, which would enable the House to consider in detail every Article and clause that required the legislative interference of the House. It had been said on the other side, "Pass the Customs Resolutions, and then there will be an Address approving of the Treaty as a whole." No doubt those who advise the Government that that was the best form for themselves were correct. Many hon. Members would say, "I approve of so much of the Treaty that I shall not go the length of coinciding in any Address condemning it as a whole; others would say, I am in favour of one particular portion, and, although I disapprove of another, I cannot vote on an Address which condemns the whole;" so that, by this clever and skilful manipulation, the Government would get a great many votes more than they would get if the issue were plainly put before Parliament on every one of the clauses of the Treaty. On his side of the House they did not ask for any delay; they sought, as well as the hon. Gentleman who spoke last, to come to an early and satisfactory decision on the part of Parliament; but the simple proposition they put was that they could not come to a proper conclusion on this Treaty in Committee on the Customs Acts. They insisted that it should be submitted to the House in such a shape that every clause could be discussed. If the Treaty were good it would be as easy for Ministers to obtain the approbation of Parliament in a Committee so framed as in a Committee on the Customs Acts; but, as it was impossible to arrive at a satisfactory discussion in a Customs' Committee, they call upon Ministers to lay their propositions before the House in a clear, definite, and decided manner.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: Sir, I was disposed to think that the right hon. Gentleman who made the proposition under our notice had taken a somewhat extraordinary course, for until I heard the last two speeches which were delivered on the opposite side of the House I confess I was at a loss to understand what that proposition meant. It seems to me, indeed, that the right hon. Gentleman, in submitting his Resolution to the House, must have borrowed a suggestion, not so much from what fell from other hon. Members on Friday night, as from some observations which were made by my right hon. Friend the Secretary for War in reference to the opinion which had been expressed in certain quarters as to its being desirable that the volunteers should learn to march in loose instead of in close order. At all events, the right hon. Gentleman instead of moving in close order, as the hon. Member for Essex proposed to do, has thought proper to direct his attack against our flank, in the hope, no doubt, that the irregularity of his advance may be attended with greater success. The real question, however, which we have to consider is, what this Resolution means, and by what arguments it can be supported. The right hon. Gentleman asks us to assent to the proposition:—

"That this House does not think fit to go into Committee on the Customs Acts, with a view to the reduction or repeal of the duties referred to in the Treaty of Commerce between Her Majesty and the Emperor of the French, until it shall have considered and assented to the engagements in that Treaty."

Now, had this been merely a proposal to the effect that, instead of going into Committee on the Customs Acts, we ought to go into Committee on the Treaty, the answer which was given to it by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer must, I think, be regarded as perfectly conclusive. My right hon. Friend the conduct of the House in this matter. What, let me ask, was the course which was adopted by Mr. Pitt under similar circumstances? and in what consists the difference between that course and that which my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer has pursued? Mr. Pitt concluded a Commercial Treaty, which had been ratified four months before he submitted it to the notice of the House of Commons, and by means of which he desired to give certain advantages to France. That Treaty contained forty-seven Articles, in accordance with one of which Englishmen might travel in France without licence or passport. There were other Articles of the same kind to which he did not require the assent of the House of Commons, and, indeed; I doubt whether he wanted its sanction to any but the 6th Article, which embraced all the changes in duties which he proposed. Mr. Pitt, under the circumstances, acted in a rational and sensible manner. He asked for the assent of the House of Commons to those particular changes, and put them into some fifteen or twenty Resolutions. I may mention one of those Resolutions, which will show how entirely they were directed to the Customs' duties. The Resolution to which I refer states that the Committee deemed it expedient that the wines of the European dominions of the French King imported directly into this country should in no case pay a higher duty than those of Portugal paid. Here is a specific Resolution changing the Customs' duties on wine, and therefore requiring the assent of the House of Commons; and thus Mr. Pitt went on to deal with the various other provisions of the treaty requiring that assent. Having obtained that assent, Mr. Pitt moved an Address to the Crown, thanking the Sovereign for the treaty which had been concluded, seeing that it would tend to increase trade and manufactures, and to draw closer the bonds of amity between this country and France. Such, then, was the course which Mr. Pitt pursued, and such is the course which we propose to adopt. We desire to bring before the House all the Resolutions relating to the Customs requiring its assent, and, when those Resolutions have been agreed to, to move an Address to the Crown on the subject of the Treaty. The hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ayrton) says that Ministers acted differently in those times, when that portion of the metropolis had no representatives—times, I may say, in passing, which he seems to regard as having been much happier than the present. Those, he contends, were times when manufacturers and commercial men were not listened to, and it was left to Ministers to bring before Parliament matters affecting the commerce of mankind. Does the hon. Gentleman, let me ask, conceive that we have been taking this absurd course, and negotiating with France a Treaty portions of which were expressly declared to require the assent of Parliament, and that then we laid the Treaty quietly on the table and meant to evade discussion with respect to its provisions? Many a Minister may have pursued an absurd course, but it is, I believe, a more stupid one, so far as I am aware, than any Minister ever pursued, to make such an arrangement, submit it to Parliament, and then say we mean to have no discussion on it. Our course is a plain course. It is the course which Mr. Pitt pursued in 1787, and it seems to me the only course which Parliament can rationally pursue. But then, the hon. Gentleman said, here is an Article which implies the surrender of the power of the Crown to prohibit the export of coal, which involves important political considerations, and which, therefore, ought to be brought specially before the consideration of Parliament. Now, I find in the Treaty of 1786 an Article of very considerable importance, which refers to many articles, and I will read part of it to the House. The 23rd Article of that treaty says—

“These merchandises, which follow, shall not be counted among contraband goods—iron, lead, sulphur, coal, wheat, barley, cordage, sails, pitch, &c., but shall be free to be carried by both nations, even to places belonging to an enemy, except to such places as may be actually blockaded or invested.”

Now, this was an Article which very clearly affected the export of these articles. Of course at this time coal was not an article which could be considered contraband of war; but there were other articles, such as sail-cloth, cordage, and other materials of that kind; you said that France might carry those articles to a country with which we were at war, if it were not actually blockaded or invested. That was a question clearly affecting the power of this country to carry on war; but did Mr. Pitt submit a Resolution to this House to carry out this Article of the treaty? By no means; it was not even mentioned; and yet, I repeat, it is an Article as much af-

—I think this proposition, which is a large proposition, whether as a commercial treaty or a budget, ought to be met in some such way as that of which notice was given by the hon. Member for North Essex—by a Resolution asserting other principles. Let the principles asserted in this way by hon. Gentlemen opposite and the principles we have asserted by the propositions we have laid before the House come into open and fair combat, and see which have the assent of Parliament and the country. Allusion has been made to the course taken by Mr. Fox. On two occasions Mr. Fox endeavoured—once with success and at another time without success—to negotiate a treaty with France; but in the first instance he began with the resolution, saying that whatever might be the opinion of Parliament with respect to that treaty with France, Parliament would justly expect the faith of the Crown and the engagements which had been entered into by the Crown to be inviolably adhered to. That was a fair, an honourable, and a constitutional course. In the second instance, when the treaty of commerce with France was considered, as soon as the House went into Committee, at the end of the first Resolution, he proposed that the Chairman should leave the chair, thereby giving a negative to the whole proposition which had been laid on the table by Mr. Pitt. That was likewise a fair and manly course. His object was to defeat the treaty, and the treaty would have been at an end, if he had been successful. This is the way in which an honest and constitutional statesman proceeds; but to endeavour to embarrass the House by questions about the forms of proceeding—to propose, as the right hon. Gentleman seems to propose, that we should depart from all precedent by going into Committee on the Treaty, and that this House should assume the right of making a treaty with France, of negotiating article by article, saying, “This Article we won’t have, this second we shall amend, and we shall place this third along with the exceptions,” is unknown to the constitution, unworthy of a great party, and to which, I trust, this House will give no countenance.

Mr. HORSMAN said, he did not intend to refer to the Articles of the Treaty, but he could not refrain from expressing his amazement that the expectations of the House, founded on the 20th Article, that their consent was to be asked to the Articles of this Treaty, should now turn out to be a delusion. The words of the Article were :

And yet the hon. and learned Attorney General had told them that if anybody considered this Article to mean that the assent of Parliament was to be asked to those engagements, his conclusion was the result of an idle ingenuity. They had heard, also, from the Chancellor of the Exchequer that this Article was to receive a limited and qualified construction. On that point he would not enter into any controversy, but would simply content himself with expressing his surprise and his protest. They had always been accustomed to listen to the noble Lord who had just spoken with great respect as one of the highest constitutional authorities in that House; but he should like to ask the noble Lord whether in all his experience he could recall a single instance—and he would appeal to the right hon. Gentleman in the Chair whether in his more extended researches he could cite a precedent—for the House of Commons being placed in the position in which it stood that night—being called on to vote on certain financial propositions of the Government so entwined with a political treaty that every vote they gave involved political considerations, and yet the treaty out of which those considerations arose was not permitted to be brought before them? It was the function of that House to vote annual Supplies with relation only to national wants and interests; but they were now asked to pass financial Votes, every one of which carried with it political responsibilities and grave results, while the instrument out of which they sprang was not before them. The hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright) had given them some appropriate illustrations of the inconvenience of that course when he told the House that if the hon. Member for North Essex (Mr. Du Cane) carried his Resolution it would not be possible to carry out the engagements of the Treaty. Thus, if he (Mr. Horsman) thought the increased income tax grievous to his constituents, he was answered, “If you reduce it you shake the Treaty”—or, if he complained that the paper interest had been too strongly represented in the Cabinet he was told, “If you act on that view you will endanger our relations with France.” Thus, every vote they gave entailed political responsibilities, and the freedom of discussion was seriously country, and the respect with which he treated Parliament, formed a strong and favourable contrast to the secrecy of the negotiations, the secrecy of the provisions, the secrecy of the ratification of this Treaty, and the manner in which it was published and proposed to Parliament, and preceded by the Budget—all indicating something very like a consciousness on the part of its authors that there was that in the transaction which would not bear the light, and which, when brought to light, the country would not approve. But the real and marked difference between the conduct of Mr. Pitt and that pursued on the present occasion was this, that they were now asked to consider the question before them merely as a fiscal question, whereas Mr. Pitt laid it before the House as a political, commercial, and financial one. And that, in fact, was the triple aspect in which the proposition of the Government now came before them. First, there was the financial exposition for the year; secondly came the treaty of reciprocity—a national compact between France and England, revising and modifying their respective tariffs for their mutual advantage; and, thirdly, there was the political question, wearing, indeed, the outward and tranquil form of a commercial convention but having also a most significant effect upon the general policy of Europe. Beginning with it as a treaty, as they went on through each division they found it grow upon them in its scope and importance, owing to the laws of public policy it touched, the vast interests it disturbed, and the higher responsibilities it entailed. Treating it merely as a budget, they committed themselves only for a year; it was a purely domestic arrangement, for which they were accountable to no one but themselves. Taking it as a treaty of reciprocity, they committed themselves for future years, and incurred obligations to France as well as to England. But, as a demonstration of renewed, close, and intimate alliance between France and England, they challenged for it the attention of the whole world. It afforded matter for thought and reflection to every Cabinet in Europe. It was no longer a simple question of wines, calicoes, and manufactures. In the distracted councils of Europe it might be a sword thrown into the scale. It might affect the boundaries of Empires or the validity of treaties. It might mean a new Sovereignty for Savoy; it might mean an engagement to Switzerland; it might give a new mission to France. There was not a Government in Europe—Europe which had been in a state of disquietude since the present ruler of France filled the throne—there was not a Cabinet in Europe which might not turn doubtfully and despondingly to England, marvelling how she could a second time incur the heavy and lasting responsibility of giving to a dangerously predominant and aspiring military Power so vast an accession of character, and strength, and influence, not unlikely to be used for purposes which England could not afterwards control. Was he exaggerating the gravity of the questions before them? Was it right that their consideration should be prejudiced and marred by their being all huddled up together? Was it unreasonable to ask that they should be separated? The course forced upon them was the more uncalled for, because great questions of national interest were approached by every Member of that House with one principle and one sentiment. They were all anxious to co-operate with the Chancellor of the Exchequer in providing, as Parliament always did provide, liberally for the requirements of the year. They were all anxious to extend our commercial relations with other countries, while in doing so they were faithful to the great principles of commercial freedom which were now the law of the land. They were all anxious to cultivate the friendship and alliance of France. ["Oh, oh!"] Yes, to the utmost that was consistent with a vigilant regard to English interests and honour; and, let him add, consistently also with maintaining the respect and goodwill of the other Powers of Europe. But how could they turn their attention to questions of that description in the consideration of a Budget, which was itself a large financial scheme, and deserving of full and separate consideration? Such a Budget, one of the most important ever presented to the House, surely deserved to be taken on its own merits as a financial scheme. But the Government would not let them do so. The Budget was founded on a Commercial Treaty, and the Treaty, in turn, was founded on political considerations. What was the Treaty? What were the political considerations by which it was to be judged? Viewed as a financial measure, as a mere question of facts and figures, it might be subjected to some very simple tests. The first requisite in a Budget was that it should make the financial year close well. If it provided ample supplies for the year, draining his land, expecting by a larger produce to raise money with which to pay his debts. The Chancellor of the Exchequer's, he was afraid, resembled more the irregularity of the spendthrift who squandered the money that might have fertilized the soil, and then, when his debts fell due, went upon the highway and robbed the first comer. The proposed abolition of the paper duty was beyond all comparison the most important financial measure which had been submitted to Parliament by any Minister in our day, not on account of the nature and amount of the impost itself but of the principle which the Government was establishing, and the grave consequences likely to arise from it. The constitutional maxim was only to reduce taxation when there was a surplus. But the abolition of a revenue tax and substitution of an income tax afforded no relief to taxation; it was only shifting the tax from one class to another. If that was to be done it was manifestly unjust that the Chancellor of the Exchequer should dwell eloquently for three-quarters of an hour on the frauds and evils of the tax he was abolishing, and pass by, without a single word of comment, the greater frauds and evils incident to the tax he was proposing. In that way they went on step by step, from year to year, remitting indirect taxation and adding direct taxes, without any inquiry whatever as to the justice of such a course; shifting, in fact, the whole taxation of the country indirectly, without public explanation or inquiry, from one class to another in a manner that became as oppressive as it was unjust. They might complain that the Chancellor of the Exchequer was inflicting heavy burdens on the community and introducing new principles of taxation. What was the right hon. Gentleman's answer? He replied that he was only carrying out the policy of the Government under this new treaty, and that he was but a unit in that Government. The policy of the Government was to have large war Estimates this year in order to obtain security against France. Security against France! Why, they had just concluded a treaty of peace and friendship with France. Let the House see that treaty, because they could then reduce the Estimates. "Oh, no!" was the answer, "the Treaty leads to a large increase in the Estimates." We have now two policies to pay for—we raise taxes for war and at the same time pay subsidies for peace; we addressed our Ally with a sword in one hand and a sop in the other; and while from one side of the account we take off £2,000,000 of taxes to enable us to meet France in the embraces of peace, we take care to add £10,000,000 to the other side of the account that we might meet him in the shock of war. He did not comprehend that double policy; it was not satisfactory to the country; we had to sustain the expense of peace and war at the same time. If we might have peace with France, let us make every effort which a civilized, Christian people could exert to establish it; if, on the other hand—which might Heaven avert!—we had to go to war with France, let us gird up ourselves for that war. But it was the present system of peace and war expenditure, without the policy of either, that was grievous and perplexing; for, although the Government told the country they had concluded a Treaty of peace, their armaments were far more eloquent than their Treaty; and it was little comfort to know they had peace on their lips when they had war in their Budget and their Councils. Therefore, he said, let them produce their Treaty. His hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham said, why did the House not manfully oppose the Treaty; and the Chancellor of the Exchequer cheered that observation. He (Mr. Horsman) said to the Government, why did they not manfully produce it and challenge the judgment of the House upon it? But he thought he could answer the question himself—there was a great blot in their Treaty. It was like everything else in the hollow and disingenuous alliance with France; it was but a screen and a cloak for the increased armaments of France we should still have to rival and confront. If the object was to negotiate a Treaty of peace, why did they not go more directly to the point? Why did they not tell the Emperor of the French that it was the rivalry of armaments which formed the great obstacle in the way of peace? Why did they not say, "We will abolish our duties in your favour, if you will dismantle your navy?" A proposal of that kind would have enabled Ministers to come to that House with clean hands; but a treaty which ignored all reference to the existing rivalry in armaments was delusive and unsatisfactory. Did any negotiation whatever turn upon the respective armaments of the two countries? If the French Emperor was not told that it was the rivalry in armaments which lay in the way of peace, cal with the fair and constitutional drift of the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman, that I wonder he should even contemplate a division, and that he and those around him should not say, "We made our Motion in utter mistake and inadvertence; we are satisfied that you are going to do the very thing that we said you ought to do, and, therefore, we will not trouble the House to divide upon so foolish a proposition." However, it is said that the House ought to have an opportunity of expressing an opinion upon the Treaty itself. Well, my noble and my right hon. Friends stated that it is our intention to give the House an opportunity of expressing its opinion by an Address of approval to the Crown. When that Address is moved, it will be competent to any Gentleman to assign his reasons why, disapproving of any portion of the Treaty other than those which will have been the subject of preceding Resolutions upon the Customs, he objects to give his sanction to the Treaty in the aggregate. We are following precisely the precedent set by Mr. Pitt in every portion of its substance, and are going to bring the Treaty before the House in the first place in detail, as far as Legislative enactment is necessary, and afterwards in the aggregate by an Address to the Crown. We are going to bring this Treaty under the cognizance of Parliament in precisely the same manner in which Mr. Pitt brought the treaty of 1786 before it in the year 1787. I should have thought it needless to repeat the arguments which have been so conclusively and so eloquently urged by my right hon. and my noble Friends, if I had not thought it really necessary to say a word or two upon the speech of my right hon. Friend who has just sat down. My right hon. Friend, I see, entirely agrees with me as to the manner in which the arguments of Gentlemen on the other side of the House have been demolished by those who sit near me. My right hon. Friend, like a benevolent bystander, seeing that those for whom his sympathies are enlisted stood greatly in need of assistance, came to their aid like a good Samaritan, and made a diversion in their favour. He doubted at first how he could do it; but he bethought himself that he had ready a most eloquent speech which he had intended to deliver upon the Budget. He saw that there could not be a better opportunity, a fuller House, a finer audience upon which to bestow that eloquent argumentative oration which circumstances had precluded him from delivering upon a former occasion, and he thought that it would make an excellent diversion. Therefore he did not say a word upon the Motion before the House, but dashed at once into the Budget. I beg his pardon; I misrepresent him. Some few words he did say in the beginning about the Treaty, and most important words they were, because if his arguments and opinions have any value he ought not to move anything about the Budget, or about the course of proceeding; he ought at once to propose a declaration of non-intercourse between England and France. Why, his argument went to that. He said, "I object to your Treaty, because it tends to increase the wealth and prosperity of France." He could not deny that it would, by the necessary operation of international intercourse, tend to increase the wealth and prosperity of England; but he says that anything which tends to make France richer, more prosperous, more commercial, more industrious, is a danger to England. I say that if that is a danger to England, he ought at once to propose a law that we should have no intercourse with France. Let us have no more relations with France; let our industry go to other countries; let us abstain from anything which, by developing industry and a commercial spirit, may tend to make the people of France think more of the occupations of peace than of those of war, which may tend to unite and cement the two nations together; let us put France under a ban, and if we are to have commerce, let us have it with any other, or every other nation of the world.

MR. HORSMAN rose amid confusion and said, the noble Lord, I am sure, will thank me for telling him that I did not say one single syllable—"Oh, oh!"

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: I reaffirm that which I have stated. I do not pretend to have a better memory than other people, but I can recollect that which passed in debate a few minutes ago. I say, then, that if the right hon. Gentleman is consistent, that is the conclusion to which he ought to come. However, his object was to take the House off upon another scent, and he therefore delivered a long discourse upon the Budget of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer—a speech, no doubt, very able and very full of argument, but one which had no earthly reference to the question under discussion. No doubt great latitude ought to be allowed to every Member of this

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Tuesday, February 21, 1860.

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILLS.—1^a Law and Equity;
Plea on Indictments.
2^a Companies (1860).

LAW AND EQUITY BILL.

PRESENTED. FIRST READING.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR presented a Bill for the further Amendment of the Process, Practice and Mode of Pleading in and enlarging the Jurisdiction of the Superior Courts of Common Law at Westminster. The noble and learned Lord said the Bill had been drawn in compliance with the recommendation contained in Her Majesty's gracious Speech from the Throne that some attempt should be made for such further fusion of law and equity as might be necessary to insure that in every suit the rights of the parties might be satisfactorily determined by the Court in which the suit was commenced.

PLEA ON INDICTMENTS BILL.

PRESENTED. FIRST READING.

LORD BROUGHAM in presenting a Bill for removing Doubts on the Plea of Persons indicted, said, he quite agreed that the Bill of the Lord Chancellor, just laid upon the table, would be an excellent measure; for it was absolutely necessary to give additional powers to the admirable common law courts of this country, and he could call to mind numerous instances in which such an extension of power would have saved enormous expense and delay to suitors. He begged to lay upon the table a Bill rendering it unnecessary for prisoners to plead "guilty" or "not guilty" at their trials. Some such measure had long been earnestly desired by numerous visiting magistrates and chaplains of gaols, who had petitioned their Lordships on the subject. By the construction of the English law the plea of "not guilty" simply meant that the person pleading it wished to be tried; but it appeared by the number of petitions that had been presented by magistrates, chaplains of gaols and others, that it very frequently happened that in the interval between commitment and trial the prisoner, either from the internal conviction of conscience, or through the exhortations of worthy and reverend men conceived that he would only be adding to the crime by pleading "not guilty;" the consequence of which was that many prisoners pleaded "guilty" to indictments upon which no conviction could have been had, rather than tell what they conceived to be a falsehood in the presence of the Court. To obviate this he had introduced the present Bill, which would enable prisoners to be put on their trial without calling upon them to say anything to which a conscientious objection could be raised. The question he proposed to substitute for the question at present put by the officer of the Court, whether the prisoner says he is guilty or not guilty was the question, whether he desires to be tried or pleads guilty; and in case the prisoner answers that he desires to be tried, that answer should be taken to be a plea of not guilty to all intents and purposes.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR observed that one of the Bills which he laid upon the table on a former occasion contained similar provisions to those proposed to be inserted in the Bill of the noble and learned Lord; but he failed to carry the measure. He hoped that better success would attend the present measure.

LORD BROUGHAM said, that he had looked through the various law Bills of the last few Sessions, and had failed to discover any provision of the kind; but he should be very happy if the noble and learned Lord would adopt this Bill as his own child, and carry it through.

ITALY—SIGNOR BONCOMPAGNI AND THE BRITISH CHARGE D'AFFAIRES AT FLORENCE.

EXPLANATION.

EARL GRANVILLE said, he wished to state to the House that Her Majesty's Government had received a letter from Mr. Corbett, Her Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires at Florence, with reference to his alleged attendance at the official reception of Signor Boncompagni on New Year's Day. Mr. Corbett denied that he had attended difficulties and inconveniences to which such excesses would be sure to lead.

THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE said, he should not think it necessary to go much into the question, especially as his noble Friend had himself expressed the same opinion as he (the Duke of Newcastle) thought it his duty to do in regard to the prayer of the petitioners. The Act to which the petitioners referred was intended to amend the constitution of Tasmania in two respects. The Act of the year 1857 which conferred representative Government on that Colony, provided that it should have two Houses of Legislature of which the lower one, known as the House of Assembly, was to consist of thirty Members, and the upper House, or Legislative Council, was to be composed of fifteen, of whom a certain number—five—should go out annually by rotation. It was found, however, that Members sometimes resigned their seats, and this had the effect of causing those below them to go out before their time in the usual course of rotation had arrived. In this way it might possibly happen that through a direct party manœuvre—of course he was putting an extreme case—the whole Council would cease to exist. In the Act then under their Lordships' consideration a provision was inserted which would prevent the possibility of such a contingency by enacting that the Members should not possess the power of resigning, but should retain their seats for the period for which they were elected. But the main objection of the petitioners was directed against another provision of the measure, by which judges were disqualified from holding seats in the Legislative Council. The petitioners had elected as their representative an eminent judge, and they naturally wished to retain his services in that character. The question thus raised was one which had been discussed in this country; and none who had heard it could fail to remember the celebrated speech in which the late Lord Macaulay had advocated the policy of leaving the English Master of the Rolls eligible to a seat in the House of Commons. But whatever opinion might be held upon that point in this country, he believed that every one who was at all acquainted with the condition of Tasmania must feel that the provision in the Act in question was a very wholesome one. The population of that colony was very limited; the legislative body itself consisted of only a few members, and the Judges had actually, upon some occasions, to decide upon the powers and privileges of the assembly of which they had hitherto been allowed to be members. It was further stated by the petitioners that the Act had been passed through the Tasmanian Legislature with undue haste. Now he admitted that measures appeared to be sometimes adopted by our Colonial Legislatures with too much rapidity, but he thought at the same time that it would be a very strong proceeding on the part of the Crown to refuse its sanction to Acts which had received the approval of free assemblies merely because the Standing Orders had been suspended upon the occasion of their passing. On the whole, he saw no reason why the Crown should withhold its assent to the Act. He had not thought proper to advise Her Majesty to give it Her sanction while a notice upon the subject stood upon their Lordships' books; but, as the question had been introduced, he begged leave to inform his noble Friend and the House that it was now his intention, without any further delay, to recommend Her Majesty to assent to the Act.

THE EARL OF DERBY had also a petition to present from Tasmania, though relating to a point somewhat different from that embraced in the petition presented by his noble Friend, and not from so numerous a body. The persons from whom his petition emanated were the Clergy of Tasmania, on behalf of themselves and all other Colonial Chaplains of the Church of England whose interests are endangered, and they prayed their Lordships to advise Her Majesty to withhold Her assent to the Colonial Act to provide for the Abolition upon certain terms of State Aid to Religion in the colony. He had no hesitation in expressing his belief that the case he had to state on behalf of the petitioners was one which would justify the Colonial Secretary in advising Her Majesty to withhold her assent to the measure which had been passed by the Tasmanian Legislation. From the first formation of the colony there was set apart a large amount of reserves in land for the maintenance of the clergy of the Established Church. These were subsequently to a great extent reserved by the Crown, and in 1837 a measure was introduced enacting that wherever a church was erected on certain conditions a clergyman should be appointed under the authority of the Crown, at the yearly stipend of £200 for life, or during good beha-

of State to see that the persons who had gone out in the capacity of ministers of the Gospel, and many of whom had exercised their important public functions for, as he had said, thirty years, should be treated with something like justice and equity. He had a strong sense of the merits of the case of the petitioners, and did trust that he should receive from the noble Duke a more favourable answer than that given to his noble Friend (the Earl of Carnarvon).

THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE agreed with the noble Earl that the Secretary for the Colonies was bound under all circumstances to see that in the Acts of the Colonial Legislature private and individual rights were protected. The noble Earl had no need to press that point upon him or upon the House, because he trusted before he sat down to satisfy their Lordships that he had not neglected that portion of his duty. But the matter was not so simple as the noble Earl appeared to regard it—chiefly because the noble Earl laboured under some slight mistake as to the real facts of the case. If, indeed, the Colonial Act to which the noble Earl referred had made it a sine quâ non that the £15,000 a year should in all time coming be devoted to religious purposes in the colony, then, indeed, the case would be simple, and he (the Duke of Newcastle) would be free from all responsibility in the matter, as well as from the great anxiety he had felt in arriving at the conclusion to which he had come.

THE EARL OF DERBY: I did not say that the Act made it a sine quâ non, but that the Secretary of State, in authorizing the Colonial Legislature to deal with this matter, made it a sine quâ non that they should reserve in the Act a fund for religious worship.

THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE said, that practically the result was the same either way, but his noble Friend had not repeated quite accurately the words used by the Secretary of State. In reality, Lord John Russell's despatch in 1839 would rather tell against the petitioners than in their favour. His Lordship said that the exemplary persons who were now devoting themselves to the cause of religious instruction in these remote colonies must “Look for future support to the community among whom they are preparing to spread those inestimable advantages rather than to any pledge from the mother-country. It is, therefore, of great importance that all clergymen and schoolmasters at New South Wales and Van Diemen's Land, and especially all who may hereafter resort thither, should most distinctly understand that the continuance of their stipends cannot be absolutely guaranteed to them by Her Majesty's Government, who can be responsible only for the exercise of the legitimate authority and influence of the Crown with the local Legislatures for preventing any departure from the principles already sanctioned by those Legislatures on this subject.”

The despatch, therefore, it would be seen, bore a different construction from that put upon it by the petitioners. But he would not lay any great stress upon this despatch, because subsequent instructions had been sent out by Colonial Secretaries, and it did not tell materially one way or the other. But the Act did not prevent the local Legislature from dealing with this £15,000 a year. It was expressly so stated in a despatch of his noble Friend (Earl Grey). The enclosure contained in that despatch, being a copy of one addressed by him to the Governor of the neighbouring colony of New South Wales, was to this effect:—

“All other salaries except those of the Governors and Judges are placed by Parliament under the ordinary control of the Legislature. With regard to the mode of exercising this control you will, however, observe that reductions of fixed establishments, or of any expenditure provided for by permanent laws, can only be effected by Acts of the Legislature, which, of course, require the assent of the Crown, signified by yourself, and confirmed by Her Majesty; but I wish you distinctly to understand that there is no desire on the part of Her Majesty's Government to prevent prospective reductions of charges which, in the opinion of the colonists, will safely admit of being diminished. The interests of existing office-holders must be protected, because they accepted those offices with expectations which cannot be justly disappointed. But, subject to these interests, there is no objection to the Legislature fixing whatever scale of emoluments they may think fit for public servants to be hereafter appointed.”

Now, what was the state of feeling in the colony with regard to the Church of England and the whole question of State endowments? The petitioners stated that the majority of the colonists had no desire to change the present system, and that the existing Legislature did not represent the opinions of the body of the people; but he had the authority, not only of the Governor, but the Bishop of the colony, for the exact reverse of this statement. From the facts which had been submitted to him, it would appear that in Tasmania the hostility to all State endowments was both strong and progressive. In 1858 a Bill precisely similar to that now complained of was introviour. The Colonial Government from time to time made additions and allowances that raised the income of each clergyman to £310 per annum. He might state that the revenue of the colony had nearly doubled what it was in 1837. When the Constitutional Act was passed it was made a sine qua non that £15,000 a year should be set aside and made one of the items of a civil list guaranteed to the Crown, and should be appropriated to the support of ministers of religion and to the maintenance of public worship. He was not certain whether that £15,000 a year was in addition to or in lieu of the previous provision which had been made for the colonial chaplains. [The Duke of NEWCASTLE: It was not in addition.] The noble Duke said it was not in addition. The case therefore which they had to lay before their Lordships was all the stronger from that circumstance. In 1859 a Bill was introduced into the Legislature of Tasmania for the purpose of abrogating the whole of that reserve of £15,000 a year—of which £9,000 had been given to the clergy of the Established Church, and 6,000 to those of other religious denominations—and substituting for the annual payment of £15,000 debentures to the amount of £100,000. The immediate effect of that arrangement, which was to take effect from January 1861, was to reduce the sum receivable by the Established Church from £9,000 to £3,000. An extraordinary part of the arrangement was that the Bishop was to be paid in full, the result of which was to diminish still further the £3,000 to be divided among the general body of the clergy. The substitution in question had placed the clergy in a position which they had no reason to anticipate. Their incomes had been reduced from about £310 a year to less than one-third of that amount. Although a clergyman might have been in possession for thirty years of a guaranteed income of £310 a year, and although a provision for the clergy was made a sine qua non of the constitution, the maximum allowance which he would henceforth receive would be only £80 a year. He (the Earl of Derby) regretted to hear the noble Duke state that he did not consider that in itself the circumstance of a Bill having been passed with great haste in a thin House was a sufficient reason for the Secretary of State to recommend the Crown to disallow it. In a case where a Bill in itself was unobjectionable the fact of its having been passed in a thin House would not have been a sufficient reason for the withholding from it the sanction of the Crown; but if the measure was one which seriously invaded, as he thought this did, the principles of justice, and set aside one of the main provisions of the Constitutional Act, then, he thought, the circumstance of its having been carried in a thin House, and with great rapidity, and without notice to the persons whose interests it would immediately affect, did form a sufficient ground to justify the Secretary of State advising Her Majesty not to give Her assent to an Act passed, he might almost say, with indecent haste. He would state the circumstances under which the Bill had been passed. The Bill, after having been debated in the House of Assembly, was brought up to the Legislative Council on the 20th of September, when it was read a first time, and the second reading fixed for the following day. On the 21st of September the Standing Orders were all suspended; the Bill was read a second time, committed, and received the Governor's assent, so far as he was able to give it, and Parliament was prorogued on the 22nd. It was not passed with the full knowledge of the Members of the Legislative Council. The Legislative Council consisted of fifteen members; but at that time six out of the fifteen seats were actually vacant, and one member was absent in England. Of seven members who were present, exclusive of the President—there being a division—four voted in favour of the Bill and three against it; so that a measure setting aside one of the main provisions of the Constitution was carried in one day by a majority of one in a House consisting of only seven members. He thought, allowing the Colonial Legislature the fullest latitude to deal with their own affairs, he had made out a case—having regard to the importance of the object of the measure, the haste with which it was passed, and the infinitesimally small majority by which it was carried—to justify him in calling on the Government not to sanction the Act in question; at all events, to afford the Colonial Legislature an opportunity of reconsidering the position of so valuable a body of men charged with important public duties in the performance of which some of them had spent thirty years of their lives. If it was to be determined that in future no aid should be given by the State for the service of religion in the colony—a conclusion which he (the Earl of Derby) should deeply deplore—he held that it was the bounden duty of the Secretary

while full powers were given to the Colonial Legislature to manage their own affairs, the Crown, on the other hand, should be armed with ample power to protect those who had accepted employment under a different regime, and the strongest instructions were given to Governors in no case to allow injustice to be committed on those who had sacrificed all their prospects in life for the purpose of accepting either civil or clerical employment in that distant colony. He thought the colonists had committed a grave error in thus sacrificing these religious endowments; but it was an error they were free to commit. But when the rights of individuals were interfered with, the Crown had no alternative but to disallow the Act.

After a few words from the LORD CHANCELLOR to the same effect, the subject dropped.

SECOND READING.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said, that it consolidated all the Acts relating to joint-stock companies, both in their formation and winding-up. These subjects were under the peculiar control of the Board of Trade, and his noble and learned Friend (Lord Chelmsford) brought in a Bill last Session which received their Lordships' approbation, but did not obtain the sanction of the other House in consequence of the dissolution which took place. The subject had been again revived under the present Board of Trade, and their Lordships were asked to agree to the present measure, which was substantially the same as that of last Session. No disapprobation of the measure had been expressed in the other House, and he trusted that the Bill would now pass.

Bill read 2^d, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Tuesday next.

CHINA—EXPLANATION.

THE EARL OF SELKIRK moved an Address for Copies or Extracts of certain Letters connected with the Earl of Elgin's Mission to China, and not contained in the Correspondence hitherto presented.

THE EARL OF ELGIN: My Lords, I do not rise to object to the Motion; but as the papers for which the noble Lord has moved, relate to a matter affecting myself, not in the position I now hold as a member of Her Majesty's Government, but in the position I occupied in China, I trust I may be permitted to address to your Lordships a very few words by way of personal explanation. I am not in the habit of trespassing on your Lordships' attention; and therefore I hope that when I proffer this request, as I do most reluctantly, and only from the conviction that an explanation is essential to vindicate my character and conduct, I shall meet with your Lordships' indulgence. I am aware of the great inconvenience, and, as a general rule, of the great impropriety of referring in this House to what passes "in another place." At the same time I cannot help thinking that my position as ex-Minister to China, more especially in the present critical state of our relations with that country, is one of a somewhat peculiar and anomalous character, and this may perhaps justify me in the expectation of receiving something more than an ordinary measure of indulgence from your Lordships. It does so happen that both Administrations—the one from which I received my first official instructions, and the other under which my important duties were performed—have passed from their political state of existence. At the present moment, therefore, there is no person in office who is personally cognizant of many of the transactions which occurred during the greater part of my mission in China, or who is able from his own knowledge to answer any inquiry that may be made, or to remove, by an explanation of facts, any erroneous impression that those transactions may have produced. Perhaps I may be allowed to mention, in illustration of what I mean, that a few days ago, when it was asked in the House of Commons, with something like a taunt, which elicited a cheer, why the noble Lord who negotiated the treaty of Tien-tsin, did not himself proceed to Peking to exchange the ratifications, if there had been in the other House any official person qualified as I have described, the answer might have been given that, in point of fact, I was never charged with the duty of exchanging the ratifications of the treaty, that the treaty was never placed in my possession; that I never had the option of going to Peking. I do not mean in making that statement, to cast the slightest reflection upon my noble Friends opposite for the course they adopted in regard to the treaty of Tien-tsin. On the contrary, I think they acted properly and naturally in charging the Minister who was to remain permanently in China with the duty of er duced into the Colonial Legislature, but was successfully opposed. Next year it was again introduced, and was supported, and many who had opposed it in the first instance, having in the meantime consulted their constituents, changed their votes, and the Bill was thus carried by the support of those who had formerly opposed it. Under these circumstances it was felt by those most interested in the present state of things that some compromise was necessary. Two plans were proposed--the first, which was that adopted, being the substitution of a capital sum of £100,000 for the £15,000 a year heretofore given; the other plan being that all State endowments, whether in the shape of a capital sum, or an annual grant, should cease; with a due regard, however, to vested interests. It was felt that more benefit would result to the permanent interests of religion by the grant of a capital sum, than by a grant ceasing with the lives of the present holders; and this, therefore, was the compromise adopted. He could assure the noble Earl that there was not that unanimity even among the members of the Church of England to reject this measure that he supposed. He had received a letter from the Bishop, which undoubtedly, in its general purport, was opposed to the measure; but added, that if the time had really come for compromise, he did not object to that now suggested; believing that such a compromise would be best for the Church and for the interests of religion. Again, he (the Duke of Newcastle) had a petition in favour of the measure from a Church Synod, consisting of clergy and laymen, which had been recently formed in these colonies—that petition being signed by an archdeacon with several lay and clerical members, who did not indeed believe that £100,000 was a full and satisfactory equivalent for £15,000 a year, but who, knowing the state of feeling in the colony, and the powers conferred on the local Legislature, were anxious that the offer now made should be closed with, as the only means by which the Church was likely to save something out of the fire. And he must say that the clergy who had signed the petition presented by the noble Earl were supported by some very strange allies—by the Anti-State Church party both in the colony and in this country—the former of whom had petitioned against this measure, and the latter had lately applied to have an interview with him on this subject. Under all the circumstances, therefore, he should have been prepared to recommend to Her Majesty to signify her assent to this measure, if it were not for the entire neglect evinced by it for vested interests. If the clergy affected by the measure had viewed the matter in the light in which the archdeacon and others, to whom he had already referred, viewed it, and had given their consent to the measure, that would be a totally different thing; but they had petitioned against it; and it did not appear that the provision made was an adequate compensation for their stipends. In the case of civil servants such treatment would not be fair and just; but the case of the clergy was not entirely analogous to that of civil servants. The latter, on quitting office, might follow some other profession; but these clergymen, who had been long separated from all friends in England, when suddenly turned adrift on a most inadequate compensation, would be unable to find any other profession in the colony. Under these circumstances, it was his intention to recommend to Her Majesty to disallow this Act. He did not hesitate to say that he took this course not without reluctance; but, nevertheless, he considered the advice he proposed to give to the Crown was based on principles of justice; and it would in the end be found to be wise and expedient. At the same time, he did not close his eyes to the fact that, in that peculiar colony, where the moral feeling was not so high as Englishmen would wish to see it, great indignation might be felt at the course he intended to pursue, and the consequence might be that the cause, not of the Church of England alone, but of the other denominations that were interested in this endowment, might possibly suffer. Yet, agreeing with the noble Earl that it is the duty of the Secretary of State to support vested interests, he had come to the determination he had just stated to their Lordships. He trusted that the colony would view the decision in the spirit in which it was given, and that it would not take the course of which he had expressed apprehension, but that another Bill would be passed with an additional clause, either giving ample compensation to the petitioners, or continuing their salaries.

EARL GREY said, he saw no other course that the Colonial Secretary could have adopted. It was his duty, when Colonial Secretary, to bring in a Bill, under which the Colonial Secretary of Van Diemen's Land was to act; and in preparing that Bill the greatest care was taken that, boats drawing little water—for which I had applied, which I certainly understood him to have promised, and which I considered to be essential to enable me to carry out the policy which I was endeavouring to pursue in that quarter. I cannot, of course, be expected to acquiesce altogether in the view which the gallant Admiral takes of the transaction in question; but that view was so temperately expressed, and it was so natural that he should desire to place before the public his own version of the affair, that if his statement had stood alone, I should not have thought it necessary to take any notice of it whatever. But I must say I read with some feeling of surprise the observations which fell from a right hon. Baronet, the late First Lord of the Admiralty (Sir John Pakington), who referred to a verdict which he stated had been pronounced upon the unfortunate misunderstanding which has arisen between the gallant Admiral and myself—a verdict which I have never seen, and the grounds of which I do not know. It does seem to me to be a most unusual proceeding, when differences have occurred between two persons in any position of life, that a verdict should be given in favour of one of the parties without the other being informed either of the result which has been arrived at or of the grounds upon which it is based. I presume I shall know with the rest of your Lordships what the verdict is when the papers now moved for have been placed in your hands. Of course I do not intend to enter into the question now. I shall only say that I think when those papers are laid on the table, your Lordships will see that I was placed in a position of very great difficulty at the commencement of 1858, after the capture of Canton, with the forces at my disposal reduced by the demands of India and the requirements of the Canton garrison, with instructions directing me to obtain from the Chinese Government concessions which amounted to an entire subversion of the traditional policy of that great empire, and with orders to prosecute my mission in combination not only with the representative of France, with whom I was associated, and with whom I acted in the most friendly concert throughout, but also with the representatives of two other Powers, Russia and America, who were still in the position of neutrals, and from whom, if we were forced into acts of hostility, we must entirely have broken off. My Lords, I think you will gather from these papers that I had some good reason for believing that prompt, direct, and energetic action in the shape of a demonstration in the neighbourhood of the Court of Peking was the only expedient which seemed to afford any hope of our being able to bring to an early close, and without bloodshed, the hostilities in which we were then engaged with China upon conditions consistent both with my instructions and with what I believed to be required by the honour and interests of this country. I can assure your Lordships that when I proceeded to the north I went in the firm belief that the gallant Admiral was entirely cognizant of the policy I intended to pursue in that quarter, that he thoroughly sympathized with that policy, and that I might count upon his ready and energetic support. I do not refer to private communications which passed between us, and of which no record is kept, but I had in my possession at the time a despatch, to which I may now refer, because it is before your Lordships—a despatch written by the gallant Admiral in answer to my applications for gun-boats, not stating that he did not know the object for which I wanted them, or that the monsoon or any other difficulty would prevent him from supplying them, but, on the contrary, stating most distinctly that the subject had been under his consideration for a long time—this despatch was written on the 2nd March—that one of the gun-boats had already started, and that arrangements were in progress for others to follow. The most conclusive proof I can give of how thoroughly I supposed I was acting in full concurrence with the gallant Admiral is the fact that I went to the north at all; because it would have been an act of absolute insanity to do so had I not felt assured of the gallant Admiral's support when I arrived there. The Admiral arrived on the 24th of April, and informed me, that so far from the gun-boats being at hand, very few of them had been ordered to leave Hong Kong, and that those few would not leave until a period long after that at which I had been led to understand they were to arrive in the north. I confess that information filled me with the greatest possible disappointment, and it is very probable that the despatches which I wrote at that time bore the reflex of my feelings. My disappointment arose from the fear which I entertained, not only that the policy I was engaged in carrying out in that quarter would be compromised by the non-arrival of the gun-boats, but that the honour of our country, our commercial interests, and even the lives of Europeans in the different open ports of China would be placed in jeopardy; because I apprehended that if we made an abortive attempt of that kind in the north, the Emperor would be very likely to send down word to the authorities in the different provinces to attack the Europeans in the open ports. Our apprehensions on that head are entirely borne out by what has actually occurred. The Emperor did send down such a message as I anticipated to the Provinces, but it took effect only at Canton; there the war was revived; and in consequence such urgent representations were made to us to send back from the north the forces we had collected there on our advance to Tien-tsin, that we were obliged, as soon as the treaty of Tien-tsin was signed, to give up the intention I had always had of proceeding direct to Peking, there to carry out the policy which I believed to be absolutely essential to the perfect execution of the treaty, and to return to Canton. I believe that to that unfortunate omission the whole of our present disasters are due; because I believe that if I had been able to deliver that letter of credence to the Emperor at Peking, I should have been able to have made such arrangements with the Imperial Court as would have disposed of that delicate question of the personal reception of the British Minister, and then none of the difficulties we are now involved in would have occurred. There is another point I must refer to, because the misconstruction repeatedly put on it in various quarters has created, very naturally, a strong prejudice against me. It has been observed that the despatches to which I have referred, which were written home at the time, were not shown by me to the gallant Admiral. That is perfectly true. I have been for seventeen years employed in the public service, and I do not think I ever showed to any one a despatch which I had thought it my duty to write to the Secretary of State; and I am quite sure I never saw any despatch written to the head of a Department in which my own conduct was commented upon. I have always understood that despatches addressed to Secretaries of State by public servants are private and confidential, and that the Secretary of State alone was at liberty to relieve them from the condition of secrecy. At the same time I must solemnly say that when Admiral Seymour made to me the communication I have referred to, I stated to the gallant Admiral that it was absolutely necessary, not only for my own vindication, but also in order that Her Majesty's Government might be in possession of the facts of the case, that I should report in the fullest manner to the Government the extent to which, in my opinion, the prospects of our mission in the north were compromised by the failure on his part to furnish me with the armament on which I had relied. I added that if he had any counter statement to make, if he thought anything in my conduct, either in the way of omission or commission, was the cause of this failure, I begged of him to make a corresponding report to the Admiralty, in order that the whole case might be laid before Her Majesty's Government. My Lords, I state this on my honour as a Peer, and am quite ready to repeat it in any other more solemn form in which an asseveration can be made. I ought to add, and it is the only sentence in the whole of this address which I have any satisfaction in uttering, that, apart from the unfortunate misunderstanding I have alluded to, and which the looseness and forgetfulness pertaining to verbal communications may, perhaps, explain, nothing could be more loyal, more cordial, more generous, or more gallant than the support which I received throughout the whole of these transactions from all the officers commanding Her Majesty's forces. I must say I think there were some performances of the British navy during that period of a most remarkable character. I think the manner in which we visited many parts of the coast of Japan and the expedition for 600 miles up an unknown river, without pilot or chart, accomplished both in going and returning with perfect safety and good order, were transactions reflecting the highest credit on the gallant officers who were engaged in them. In alluding more particularly to these circumstances, I wish to say at the same time that an equal degree of gallantry and skill was shown by the whole of the fleet in all the operations which occurred, whether belligerent or otherwise; and I have only to repeat what I have more than once said in private and official communications, that to the happy audacity of my gallant Friend Captain Osborne, on board of whose ship I was for sixteen months, I was much indebted for the success of my mission.

LORD COLCHESTER said, that an imputation of the utmost gravity had been cast upon the conduct of the gallant

Admiral who commanded in China at the time the events referred to by the noble Earl took place. He would not then go into the question which had been raised; but he begged their Lordships to suspend their judgment on the matter until all the papers bearing upon it were before them.

EXTRA BATTÀ TO THE PERSIAN ARMY. QUESTION.

MR. ADAM said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for India if he will state the substance of any Communication which he had lately received from the Government of India, regarding the payment of extra batta to the Troops engaged in the Persian War; and whether Her Majesty's Government are prepared to recommend the payment of such batta?

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, it had been agreed to grant a donation for six months' batta in lieu of claims for prize money to the troops engaged in the Persian War, one-half of the extraordinary expenses of which war, according to agreement, was to be paid out of the Indian revenue, and one-half was to be borne by this country. He had applied to his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for War to know if he was willing to pay his share of this claim for extra batta, and, though he had not received any official answer, he had been apprised that Government had acceded to the proposition, and no time, therefore, would be lost in making a formal grant of batta to the troops engaged in that War, whether by land or sea.

THE CHINESE WAR OF 1857.

LORD BURGHLEY said, he wished to ask the Secretary of State for War when the Field Allowance claimed by the Officers of the Artillery and of the Line, who were sent in the year 1857 to the Attack of Canton, in lieu of the Consolidated Allowance which they were ordered in April, 1859, to refund, is to be paid?

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT said, the allowance due to the officers engaged at Canton had been paid to those who remained in China. Those who came to England had for the most part applied to the War Office and had been paid, and if any officers who had not yet received their allowance applied to the War Office, and stated the particulars of their claim, the money would be forthcoming.

VOLUNTEER CORPS OFFICERS' FEES. QUESTION.

COLONEL NORTH said, he rose to ask the Secretary of State for War if the Fees to be paid by Officers of the Volunteer Corps for their Commissions will be the same in all counties; and, if so, what amount will they be called upon to pay.

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT said, he had no authority whatever to adjudicate upon the amount of fees; but in 1853, when a great difference of opinion arose as to the amounts claimed by the Lords-Lieutenant of Counties in regard to the Militia, his noble Friend the Member for Tiverton had issued a circular recommending the adoption of a uniform scale of two guineas for Field Officers, and one guinea for Officers of a lower rank. It was intended to pursue the same course in the present instance; but it must rest with the Lords-Lieutenant to adopt the recommendation or not, as they thought proper. Should they agree to it, however, it would obviate a great deal of inconvenience.

ANNEXATION OF SAVOY TO FRANCE.

QUESTION.

MR. PALK said he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the Communication made to Her Majesty's Ambassador was to the effect that, in the case of annexation of Central Italy to Sardinia, the French Government was of opinion that it would be necessary for France to have some increase of territory on the side of Savoy; and whether the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs will lay the Despatch containing this Communication upon the table of the House?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL : When my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Bridgwater (Mr. A. W. Kinglake) sought to bring on a Motion in asking for papers on this subject, I requested him to postpone his Motion ; accordingly he did postpone it till this day se'nnight. I think, therefore, I had better reserve my answer to the hon. Gentleman till that day.

THE NORWICH ELECTION.

QUESTION.

MR. EDWIN JAMES said, in the absence and on behalf of his hon. Friend (Mr. Mellor), he would beg to inquire of the Attorney General, Whether his attention has been called to certain proceedings at Norwich, with reference to the alleged bribery of one Joel Fox; and to the refusal of a witness, a Magistrate of the said City, to answer certain questions, on the ground that the answers thereto might tend to criminate himself; and to the conduct of certain other Magistrates in voting for the adjournment of a charge in which they were alleged to be implicated.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he would beg to state that he had read a large volume of evidence which was taken relating to certain accusations which were made, and also to certain counter accusations, arising out of an election at Norwich. After an examination of the whole matter, he thought it was unnecessary for him to say anything further than that he had not felt it incumbent upon him, nor did it appear to him to be necessary for the purposes of justice, that he should interfere by filing an ex-officio information. The parties were prepared to bring the persons inculpated before the Court by criminal indictment; they had taken proceedings for that purpose, and he did not think it necessary to interfere.

REGISTRATION OF BIRTHS, &c. (IRELAND).—QUESTION.

LORD DUNKELLIN said, he wished to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether Her Majesty's Government propose to take any steps towards the promotion of a general system of Registration of Births, Deaths, and Marriages in Ireland during this Session of Parliament?

MR. CARDWELL, in reply, said, a Bill had been drawn, which he hoped to have an early opportunity of introducing.

Mr. Palk

EDUCATION COMMISSION.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he wished to ask the Vice-President of Committee of Council on Education how soon the Report of the Royal Commission on Education is likely to be presented to Parliament?

MR. LOWE said, he had not received any official communication from the Commission which was now sitting on the subject of Education ; but he had learned, in answer to inquiries which he instituted, that they hoped to embody their opinions and suggestions in a Report before the conclusion of the present Session of Parliament. The Appendices and Statistical Returns, however, which they desired to include in their Report could not be ready by that time.

THE FRENCH TREATY.—IRON ORE.

QUESTION.

MR. LYALL said, that seeing the Vice-President of the Board of Trade in his place, he was desirous of knowing in what manner the admission of Iron Ore into France would be affected by the Treaty.

MR. HUTT replied that since the Treaty of 1826, iron ore of any description coming direct from this country was admitted duty free into France, whether carried in French or English ships ; and there was nothing in the present Treaty which at all limited the benefits that were granted to commerce and navigation by the former agreement between the two Countries.

THE TREATY WITH FRANCE.

QUESTION.

MR. BALL said, he wished to know, Whether, in the case of any of the Resolutions to be moved in Committee on the Customs' Acts being rejected or altered, any corresponding alterations could be made in the Treaty of Commerce laid on the Table of the House?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, the Treaty as laid before the House was a complete Act; but if any alterations were rendered necessary by the Resolutions as passed in Committee, they might be embodied in a Supplementary Treaty, which it would be open to the other party to accept or not.

On Motion that the House at its rising adjourn till To morrow, at Two o'clock—

RULES OF PROCEDURE. AMENDMENTS IN COMMITTEES OF SUPPLY AND WAYS AND MEANS.

SIR JAMES GRAHAM said, he would avail himself of the opportunity afforded him by the Motion of the noble Viscount to say a few words upon a point of order. Last night, although the House expressed different opinions in regard to the application of strict rules and precedents on the matter then before them; yet he observed with pleasure the unanimous feeling of respect for those rules and precedents, and an anxious wish on the part of the House to carry them into effect. The hon. Member for North Essex (Mr. Du Cane) had given notice of a Resolution to be moved "in Committee on Customs Acts." Now it appeared to him that that notice was not in accordance with the established rules of the House. He conceived that no Resolution could be moved as an Amendment upon a Vote in Committee of Supply. It might be that it was competent in Committee of Ways and Means to move a Resolution as an Amendment. In 1853, in a Committee of Ways and Means upon the income tax, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Hertfordshire, the late Secretary for the Colonies (Sir Lytton Bulwer) was allowed to move a Resolution in reference to the income-tax. He thought that a dangerous precedent, and one that, if possible, ought not to be followed. But the proposition of the hon. Member for Essex was not an Amendment that should be moved in the shape of a Resolution in a Committee on the Customs Acts. The Resolution, to be in form, should be one that dealt with the sources of revenue arising from Customs, and should be confined within the limits of the Customs Acts. Now he submitted, subject to the correction of Mr. Speaker, that it was not competent for the hon. Member to move a Resolution in the Committee on the Customs Acts which was not confined to the revenue arising out of the Customs. If that were the rule of the House, as it appeared to be the desire of the House to have a discussion on this subject, it was still in the power of the hon. Gentleman to bring forward his Resolution without the violation of their rules. He would suggest a course which would avoid that difficulty. On that day it was usual to give Notices of Motion priority over the Orders of the Day. It was, therefore, competent for the hon. Member for Essex to bring forward his Resolution as a substantive Motion before the Order of the Day. By doing so, the rules of the House would be strictly observed, and they would have the advantage of having the Speaker presiding over the discussion. Before he sat down, he ventured to appeal to the right hon. Gentleman in the Chair whether he was correct in his statement of their forms of proceeding?

MR. SPEAKER: By the rules of this House the Chairman of the Committees of Ways and Means is the judge of all matters of order which arise in Committee; no doubt the Chairman would rightly rule any question which might come before him for discussion. I should, perhaps, be going beyond my province were I to pass by anticipation a judgment upon any Resolution to be proposed in Committee; but as my opinion has been asked as to the general practice of the House, I will with pleasure give an answer. The right hon. Baronet has, in my judgment, correctly laid down the rule of the House in regard to Committees. It is competent in a Committee of the Whole House for any hon. Member to move a Resolution so long as it is relevant to the matter referred to the Committee; but any Resolution must be confined to the subject-matter referred to the Committee. I restrict myself to a statement of the general rule of the House, leaving to the Chairman of Committees to express his judgment upon the fitness of any Resolution which may be proposed.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, the hon. Gentleman who had given notice of his Resolution was of course the best judge of the course he ought to take under the circumstances — whether to shape his Motion in accordance with the principle laid down, or to submit his Resolution in a substantive form. As far as Her Majesty's Government were concerned — although there was an understanding that the House should go into Committee that night — they were willing to submit to any arrangement that would suit the convenience of the hon. Member for Essex; and if the hon. Gentleman thought proper to act upon the suggestion made to him, and to bring forward his Resolution as a substantive Motion, the Government were ready to waive their right of moving that the House should go into Committee upon the Customs Acts.

MR. DU CANE said, his object was to move a Resolution affecting the whole scope of the financial propositions. It would be a source of regret to him if, by the forms of the House, he was prevented from touching upon the prominent features of the financial statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He threw himself upon the indulgence of the House, and would accept the proposal made to him by the noble Lord.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER wished to give an intimation which might be useful to the hon. Member for Finsbury (Mr. T. Duncombe), in regard to the course of business in Committee as regarded one point of some importance—namely, that part of the treaty which related to foreign spirits. That particular part stood second on the paper, immediately after the Resolution upon the wine duties. He should not move that Resolution in any case before Friday next.

MR. E. P. BOUVERIE referred to the Speaker to decide whether it was competent for any hon. Member to move a Resolution as an independent Motion on the Order of the Day, without giving due notice of it?

MR. SPEAKER: The course is quite irregular—it can only be done by the general consent of the House. If the House chooses to sanction this course of proceeding I need not tell the right hon. Member it is in its power to do so.

Motion agreed to.

House at rising to adjourn till To-morrow at Two o'clock.

(FIRST NIGHT.)

MR. DU CANE:—Sir,—In rising to move the Resolution of which I have given notice, I trust that it is almost needless for me to say that I stand before the House under circumstances of no ordinary difficulty and embarrassment. The scheme of finance to which I am about to offer my opposition, is one of so intricate and so complicated a character, and has moreover been submitted to the House in a speech of such remarkable eloquence and subtlety of reasoning, that I feel that nothing but the kindest indulgence and forbearance on the part of the House itself, and a confident sense of the justice of my cause, can sustain me to the end in the task I have undertaken. I have no doubt that during the progress of the discussion to which my Resolution will inevitably give rise, it will be my fate to hear a cry re-echoed in this House that which has already been faintly whispered out of doors, that in bringing forward this Motion I am allowing myself to be made the instrument of a party and a factious movement. If, Sir, by a “party movement” may be interpreted to mean any desire on my part needlessly to interpose between the House and the discussion in Committee of these financial proposals with a view solely to embarrass Her Majesty’s Ministers and thereby to check the further progress of useful and beneficial legislation, I trust that it is indeed unnecessary for me to enter my most emphatic disclaimer against any such intention. On the contrary, I believe that I am interpreting, not merely my own feelings, but the feelings of the large majority of those Conservative Members I now see seated around me, when I say that it is with sincere regret that we have found that the financial proposals of the Chancellor of the Exchequer are not such in their leading features at least if not in all their minor details, as to entitle them at our hands to an honest and independent support. But if, Sir, on the other hand, openly and fearlessly to throw down the gauntlet to a scheme of finance I believe from my heart to be as dangerous as it is unjust, openly and fearlessly to vindicate that which I believe to be a sound and true Conservative policy towards the people of this country, if that by any chance can be construed into a party move, then I say that I frankly, nay more, that I gladly, accept the term. And this much, perhaps, the Chancellor of the Exchequer will permit me to say as the only and perhaps the best return for the graceful compliment he was pleased to pay me yesterday evening, that if I cannot give his financial proposals a warm support, he shall find me to be that which I for one think better than a mistrustful adherent or a lukewarm partizan—an open and a candid enemy. Now, Sir, with the permission of the House I will state as concisely as I can the main reasons I have for objecting to these proposals. I object to the Budget in the first instance because it appears to me not merely to fail to grapple with the financial exigencies of our present position, but to leave the country rather worse off than it found it, in a state of increased and increasing financial deficiency. I object to it in the second instance, because the principal remissions of taxation which it proposes, I allude more especially to the reduction and abolition of the duties on wine and paper, unobjectionable perhaps in themselves at the proper time, appear to me to be singularly inopportune and uncalled-for at the present period, when we find that the income tax is to be reimposed at a higher rate than was ever before known in time of peace. And last, certainly not least, I object to the Budget, because it appears to me to be based on an uncalled-for and a one-sided commercial Treaty. I certainly was in hopes that the result of last night's discussion might have tended to relieve me from entering at all upon this latter objection, but in that expectation I have been somewhat disappointed. By the vote of last night we have been placed, I think the House must agree, in this somewhat extraordinary and anomalous position. We cannot at any future period venture to amend in any essential point the Treaty itself, without vitiating at the same time some important feature of the Budget; we cannot now venture in any essential point to amend the Budget, without running the future risk of vitiating and annulling the Treaty. We are called upon in short, by Her Majesty's Government to open our mouths to their widest possible stretch, and swallow in one great gulp the Budget and Treaty combined. And all I can say is, that if the constitution of Parliament and the country can stand the dose, it must make up its mind from henceforth to swallow anything.

Now, Sir, I fear it will be necessary for me to detain the House for a few moments while I recount as briefly and succinctly as I can those which appear to me to be the main features of our financial position as laid down by the right hon. Gentleman himself and the manner in which he proposes to deal with the difficulty of our situation. And first as regards the question of an increased and increasing deficiency. The right hon. Gentleman, estimates the income of the country for the present financial year at £60,700,000, and its expenditure at £70,100,000, the deficit for the year being thus, £9,400,000. Well, this being so, the right hon. Gentleman, acting upon a very simple, but at the same time a very novel principle as applied to financial matters, that his deficit,

"Is great, because it is so small—

Would it were greater, then 'twere none at all!"— proposes further to increase it by the reduction of some duties and the total abolition of others to the extent of £4,000,000 upon articles which, for the most part, to use the words of the noble Lord, the Member for London in his first despatch to Lord Cowley and Mr. Cobden—

"Are not in general articles of such primary necessity or such universal use among the people of the United Kingdom as to entitle them upon that ground to the special attention of the Government."

The right hon. Gentleman next in order proceeds to reduce this deficiency to the extent of £2,000,000 by means of sundry savings proposed to be effected in the Revenue Department by making certain allowances for increase of consumption as the natural result of the reduction of duties, and by certain other charges of an entirely new character. This, according to his own Estimate, still leaves the total deficit for the year at £11,500,000. Now this deficit he proposes to supply by re-imposing in the first instance the income tax at 10d. in the pound, bringing to the revenue a sum of £8,472,000. He then re-imposes the extra duties upon tea and sugar, and he calls in the malt and hop credits to the amount of £1,400,000. These sums amount in all to £11,972,000, and thus, according to the right hon. Gentleman's own statement, we shall have a surplus of £470,000.

Now I will ask the House to observe in the first instance that out of these sums there is one item of £535,000 that must be regarded as being altogether of a speculative character, as it is supposed to be derived from the increased consumption that the right hon. Gentleman looks to as the first result from the diminution of the duties upon wine and spirits. And further let us remember that should this scheme meet with our sanction, we shall have next year to submit to a further reduction of these duties to the extent of £250,000. I will next ask the House to observe that by anticipating the malt and hop credits to the amount of £1,400,000, the right hon. Gentleman is in point of fact, calling in the latter portion of a sum of £2,500,000 which has hitherto been considered, and by nobody more so than the right hon. Gentleman himself, in the light of a loan by the Government to the malt and hop interests of the country. While, therefore, on the one hand by anticipating these credits, very considerable annoyance and in many instances positive injury will result to the smaller members of the malting community, the right hon. Gentleman is availing himself at the same time of an entirely temporary expedient, and I take it we are fully justified in assuming that no such sum will be forthcoming next year to meet the financial exigencies of the country. I will next ask the House to observe that the right hon. Gentleman proposes to postpone altogether, for a period of three years, the payment of £1,000,000 of Exchequer bonds which became due in the present year. These bonds accordingly will have to be re-issued, and therefore one of the very first happy results of the year of bliss that was to result from the falling in of the Terminable Annuities, is a considerable addition to the unfunded debt of the country. And lastly, I will ask the House to remember that the income tax of 10d. in the pound and the war taxes on tea and sugar are only to be re-imposed for one year, and therefore the Chancellor of the Exchequer for the year 1861-2 whoever he may have the good or bad fortune to be, for I confess I have never considered the position of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to be a very enviable one, cannot possibly reckon on a renewal of these taxes without obtaining the formal consent of Parliament. Now, Sir, let me carry the House with me for a moment in imagination to the commencement of the year 1861, and let me ask them to contemplate what will in all probability be our financial position. I take it in the first instance that unless, which in the present aspect of the Continent is most improbable, the House shall agree to sanction any very considerable reduction of the Army and Navy Estimates, our expenditure will be very much the same as at the present period, to wit £70,100,000; and to this, as I have shown, we must also add £1,000,000 of Exchequer bonds. But what, let me ask, will be the state of our income? We shall, as I have already shown, virtually have parted with the income tax and the tea and sugar duties; we shall have anticipated the malt and hop credits, and we shall have done something more: we shall have pledged ourselves to a further reduction of the wine duties to the amount of £250,000; we shall have pledged ourselves also to a further sacrifice of paper duty—and, if at the same time we allow for a sum of £250,000 as the remaining portion we have yet to receive of the income tax, I think the House will find that the total loss of revenue will amount to £12,172,000. Now, if we deduct this sum from the present revenue, it will leave us exactly £58,392,000 to meet £71,100,000 of expenditure, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer will therefore have to announce to the House of Commons the pleasing intelligence of a deficit of £12,700,000. But if we take also into consideration, as I think we are bound to do, the probability as I shall presently endeavour to show, that instead of an increased there will be a diminished consumption resulting from the first reduction of the wine duties; or, supposing I am here in error, a diminution of the malt tax resulting from a diminished consumption of beer, I think we may be very safely justified in assuming that our total deficiency will not be far off £13,000,000. Now let me ask the House seriously to consider what is likely to be the position in which Parliament at that time will find itself situated. Sir, the night of February 20th, 1860, must, I think, have been long ago destined by the Fates to be a very remarkable era in the annals of Parliament. It is not often that our Parliamentary bill of fare is so luxuriously catered for, that we have a choice presented to us of dainties of the first class for our discussion. Animated debates on subjects of interest are, I fear, rapidly becoming the exception and not the rule, and I should think that seldom, if ever, has it happened to a Government to have to choose on the same night between three subjects of such vital consequence to the future welfare of the country, as a French Treaty, a Budget, and a Bill for the Amendment of the Representation of the People. I have not, I fear, the honour to agree on many political questions with the hon. Member for Birmingham; yet, I think from what I have read of his speeches out of doors, he will agree with me when I say that the two subjects of a Budget and a Reform Bill are somewhat intimately allied. For it must be the general tone and character of a Parliamentary majority that will ultimately determine the general nature and incidence of the taxation of the country. The noble Lord the Foreign Secretary, owing to circumstances over which he, perhaps, had no control, has postponed the introduction of his Reform Bill to what he imagines to be, and I sincerely hope he may find to be, a more auspicious moment. It is not for me, on the present occasion, to widen the field of discussion by indulging in speculation as to the probable provisions of his measure; but I think, at the same time, I shall be fairly interpreting the general feeling both of the House and the people of the country, when I say that there is a growing desire amongst both that this great constitutional question should not be made the stalking-horse by which to hurl Ministry after Ministry from office, and that we should, if possible, during the present Session endeavour to effect its settlement upon a fair and an equitable basis. Well now, I will ask the House to indulge in what, at the present moment, they may possibly think a rather wide stretch of the imagination. I will ask them to conceive that we have passed the Budget, that we have passed the Reform Bill, and that somewhere about the commencement of next year, a new Parliament, returned by constituencies into which new and popular elements have been introduced, is assembled in this House for the first time. What will be the position of affairs with which that Parliament will inevitably have to grapple. They will find, in the first instance, awaiting them, a deficiency of £13,000,000, and they will find also renewed for one year only and shortly about to expire an income tax of 10*d.* in the pound. But in what state, let me ask the House, will they find this tax? They will find this tax, the retention of which as a permanent feature in the taxation of the country almost every statesman, from Mr. Pitt down to Sir R. Peel, and from Sir R. Peel down to the present Chancellor of the Exchequer, has condemned in the very strongest terms, existing at the highest rate ever known in time of peace, in its most odious form and controlled by no prospective legislation as regards its diminution. Consider then for a moment what must be the inevitable consequence. They will stand between Scylla and Charybdis. You will have cut off from them by this Commercial Treaty several of our surest and safest sources of indirect taxation, and you will see one of two evils inevitably happen. Either you will see the engine you have left so ready to hand, seized with avidity, established in a graduated form as a permanent feature in your taxation, and mounting to a rate which will soon render it utterly oppressive and unbearable even to the most ignorant and patient subject for taxation; or, on the other hand, you will see adopted a hardly less pernicious course. You will see ignorant impatience running riot in the House, and developing its first fruits in the restoration of that miserable and cheeseparing system of economy which has already wrought us such disastrous fruits, which disbelieves in war till the enemy is thundering at your gates, and laughs to scorn the very idea of national defences. Sir, I say to Her Majesty's Ministers, I say emphatically to the right hon. Gentleman, "Beware what you are about with this great chasm yawning before you in increasing this tax to its present rate." I ask the right hon. Gentleman, "Can it be you, you who have exhausted your matchless eloquence and powers of reasoning to demonstrate the hardness of this tax, its unequal incidence, its inquisitorial character, and yet withal its enormous power if reserved as an engine for national emergency. Can it be you, who now without a thought or heed of future consequences, throwing aside all regard for prospective legislation, recommend to the country its re-imposition in its present most aggravated form?" I will not weary the House by quoting Hansard as I could do, column after column, upon the subject of the income tax. Who is there, let me ask, that does not remember the Budget of '53, and that elaborate essay which has since been, as it were, a very textbook to every political schoolboy on the question? Who is there that does not remember how every form in which this tax could be permanently retained, or its incidence graduated, was successively paraded, minutely analyzed, torn to shreds, and scattered to the winds. And now, when the year has arrived that was to have brought to us our hour of financial millennium, the hon. Gentleman remorselessly adds to the burden on our backs, cuts the rope from the vessel of State, and sends us groaning into the future of a financial purgatory. And yet, Sir, I venture to maintain that there are reasons why a reduction of this tax, however slight, would have come at the present time with peculiar grace at his hands, and have been regarded as a peculiar boon by the people of the country. They had long regarded him as the very champion of its extinction. In time of war they had borne its increase without a murmur, for they knew that the extraordinary exigencies of the country required extraordinary demands on their part, both of patience and of patriotism. They had submitted too to see the burden of taxation heavily laid upon the necessities of life, for they thought that there was a day at hand that should bring to every cottage in the land an hour of joyful and of character, utterly unsuited, unless a complete and sudden change should take place, to an English taste and palate. And yet this is the cheap wine which you fondly expect to bring by this Budget to the poor man's door; which is in one moment entirely to supplant beer, the national beverage, at more than treble its price; which is to check the cultivation of barley and inflict thereby an irreparable injury upon the farmer, the maltster, and the brewer of the country. Why, the very idea appears to me to be so absurd upon the face of it, that I wont presume on the present occasion to start an agricultural grievance, and stand before the House in the once well-known character of a farmer's friend, on the question of the malt tax. But I may at least presume, by the way, to ask the right hon. Gentleman what sort of even-handed justice is this which, upon his own showing, proposes while carrying out the doctrines of free trade to their fullest extent to leave the home producer of the staple beverage of the country heavily taxed, to enter into competition with the untaxed foreigner. As regards Spanish wines the case may perhaps be slightly different. No doubt that there are several of the lighter Spanish wines that would in time grow into greater favour with the people of this country; but here again remember that you will have to contend, as far as the prospects of the revenue are concerned, in the first instance with repeated bad harvests, and a diminution of the stock in the hands of the merchants. Well, Sir, but to pass on to another part of the case against the wine duties, I think the House can hardly have forgotten the right hon. Gentleman's pathetic narrative of the sufferings to which we are all of us liable from the adulterated concoctions of the British merchant. One would have thought as we listened to his description that adulteration of wine was a crime utterly unknown upon the Continent, and peculiarly indigenous to a British soil. But I fear that the blue-book recently published on the trade and vineyards of the Continent tells us a somewhat different story. Adulteration, I fear, is a crime common to every country, and to none more than the regions round about Bordeaux. Why, one-half the cheapest wines manufactured at Bordeaux are nothing more than a sort of Arragonese or Catalonian syrup which is in the first instance imported across the Spanish frontier into France, doctored at Bordeaux with vinegar, and then reimported into Spain to be sold in large quantities as prime Bordeaux. There is again in the Gulf of Lyons a seaport called Cette, the chief trade and business of whose population is nothing more or less than wholesale adulteration and imitation of every species of French wine. The adulteration too, of Austrian wine is perfectly notorious. And can the House suppose for a moment that, supposing the duties are reduced and the price of wine cheapened to the extent that the right hon. Gentleman supposes possible, we shall not have the British and Foreign adulterators competing with one another for English custom, with what results, to use the right hon. Gentleman's own expressive language—with what results to a discerning public I need not pretend to say. But let me revert for a moment to the subject of pure wine, and let me give the House an instance of the sort of market even a cheap pure wine is likely to command in this country, judging by the reception it not unfrequently meets with elsewhere, and let me take the case most analogous to England itself—the case of Australia. A few years since one of the largest firms at Bordeaux sent to a house at Melbourne a large consignment of wine of all growths, including some 4,000 dozen of a light and pure wine, which cost about 10s. a dozen at Bordeaux. At the time I am speaking of there had been a succession of good harvests; the price of wine was generally cheaper, and consequently the wine itself was of a better quality than could now be obtained at the same price. Well, the cargo reached Melbourne, and after an interval the Bordeaux merchants received a letter from their correspondent at Melbourne, stating that the wine in question had met with no sale whatever among the middle and working classes, upon whom they chiefly depended for custom, and requesting that by the next ship they would send them a wine of a far higher quality and price. And yet this is the reduction of taxation for which in the present year alone we are to allow to the revenue a sum of £530,000 for increased consumption. For the sake of a mere speculative theory like this we are to be asked to supersede our native beverage by taking off duties upon wine which was now and must for some time continue to be emphatically a luxury of the rich, and yet at the same time you call on us to continue the war duties on tea and sugar, which are emphatically the necessities of the poor.

but which I maintain to be the direct opposite of that upon which the present Budget is based. The right hon. Baronet quoted the following extract from the writings of Arthur Young:

"If I was," says Arthur Young, "to define a good system of taxation, it should be that of bearing lightly on an infinite number of points, heavily on none. In other words, that simplicity in taxation is the greatest additional weight that can be given to taxes, and ought in every country to be most sedulously avoided."

Now this is a theory of taxation to which, as I said before, I venture to give my cordial assent, but which is diametrically opposed to the principle of the present Budget. The present scheme is nothing more or less than a system of financial complications to result in complete simplicity of taxation. But a few days afterwards a still more extraordinary scene took place in the House. The present Chancellor of the Exchequer seized his opportunity to make a furious onslaught upon the whole financial statement, which he condemned as being founded on principles of finance contrary to those which for years past had regulated the whole course of the taxation of the country. But it now appears that the Nestor of Tiverton has been able to compose the differences of this financial Achilles and Agamemnon, and that they can sit side by side in the same Cabinet united in bonds of brotherly affection. I now come to the year 1858, the period at which the House affirmed the memorable Resolution which has exercised such irresistible influence with the right hon. Gentleman, and I will ask hon. Members to listen to the terms of the Resolution itself.

"That this House is of opinion that the maintenance of the excise on paper as a permanent source of revenue would be impolitic."

Now I think the House must see at once that this is a Resolution asserting a mere abstract principle of the very vaguest character which cannot, put upon it the widest construction you will, be construed in any way so as to fetter us as to any particular time in which to deal with the duty. And perhaps hon. Members will agree that one of the shortest and at the same time most sensible speeches ever delivered in the House was made on that occasion by my hon. Friend the Member for Norfolk, who interposed before the question was put from the chair, and said, "I only want a single word. I presume we all fully understand that the Resolution means nothing." But it is a somewhat remarkable fact that the nearer we approach to the present period the stronger appear to have been the objections of Members of Her Majesty's present Government to deal in any shape with this duty. The right hon. Baronet the Home Secretary used rather strong language with respect to the proposed abolition of the tax in the year 1857; but in the year 1858 the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary was really quite abusive. The noble Lord said on this occasion—

"The House would recollect that last year the Chancellor of the Exchequer proposed that the income tax should be kept up at 7d. in the pound, and instead of 1s. 3d. the duty on tea should be 1s. 5d. with a proportionate increase of the sugar duties. This year they had allowed the income tax to fall from 7d. to 5d. in the pound, but they had kept up the duty on tea to 1s. 5d. and retained the proportionate increase of the sugar duties. It was, therefore, almost a matter of good faith that when next there was a reduction of taxes those duties on tea and sugar should be reduced, which were in fact war duties, and there could be no greater claim for reduction than upon articles which entered so largely into the comforts of the people."

Now, Sir, these are arguments to which I most unhesitatingly give my assent, and than which I feel that if I were to talk for an hour upon this subject I could not advance any that are likely to have greater weight with the House. But what a change now appears to have come over the spirit of the noble Lord's dream! The Chancellor of the Exchequer in 1860, in the face of a deficiency of nine millions, proposes to increase the income tax, to retain the war duties on tea and sugar, and to abolish the paper duty. And the noble Lord sits by his side and applauds the proposition. Sir, there appears to me to run throughout the whole of this elaborate scheme, dexterously veiled, it is true, but more apparent here than in any other part of it, a desire to conciliate at all hazards and at any price the favour and good will of a certain section of politicians beneath the gangway, without whose support we are plainly told that no Administration can endure for a day. I remember to have read, that in the days when the struggle between free trade and protection was at its fiercest height, the hon. Member for Rochdale, to whom we are so indebted for the construction of this French Treaty, told this House that he addressed them in the name of the people who live in towns, and who will govern the country. The day has come when we are called on to witness the fulfilment of his prophecy. We have here before us a Budget which bears but too plainly the image and superscription of people who say, "If I ask a friend into my house one week, and he invites me in the next week to return the visit, and sets before me as good an entertainment as that which I have offered to him, that is my notion of a fair and a perfect reciprocity." But what are you calling on us to do? You are calling on us to admit into our house to-morrow, and from henceforth at all times and at all seasons a crotchety neighbour who keeps his doors resolutely slammed in your face for a year to come and then only promises to open it half way for nine years more; keeping a strong chain up all the time, while he reconnoitres your personal appearance before he lets you in altogether. And to think for one moment to whom it is that we are mainly indebted for this enormous blessing. We were told the other night that our old friend Protection, driven from the palaces of our country, had sought for refuge in holes and corners. That was unkind treatment doubtless, and I think my hon. Friend the Member for West Norfolk, when he so gallantly announced his intention of defending these relics of his ancient faith might have added, had he thought of the quotation—

"Extrema per illos

But here, methinks, we have the unkindest cut of all; we have the great high priest of free trade himself recanting, abjuring the worship of his favoured deity, and falling prostrate on his knees before the monstrum horrendum of one-sided reciprocity. Well, Sir, but again I had always thought that one of the privileges which this House had ever held most dear, was the power of retaining in its own hands the power of remitting or imposing taxation. But if you pass this Treaty in its present shape, not merely will you cut off from henceforth several of the most valuable and harmless sources of our indirect revenue, but you will fetter and restrict in the most arbitrary manner for years to come the whole system of the future taxation of the country. No matter how great may be our financial exigencies; no matter how complicated our political embarrassment, unless, which I think the House will agree with me is not very likely, we agree to annul this Treaty by mutual consent; or unless, which God forbid! we are involved in a French war, what we have once done we shall never again be able to undo. Fetter the taxation of the country in this way for ten years to come! why then do you leave the income tax and tea and sugar duties without prospective legislation even for a year? Legislate in this way for ten years! is there any man amongst us, let me ask, who can tell what one year, what six months may bring forth? You have tried your hand before at this far-sighted legislation. In 1853 you tried to cast the horoscope of 1860, and with what result? The financial sky was then bright and clear, there was but a small speck darkening the future of the Continental horizon, but you saw it not, and in one short year we had drifted into war upon a Budget of peace. The financial sky is now dark and gloomy, the clouds are gathering fast upon the horizon of the Continent, and yet you fondly hope that upon the shoulders of this Treaty and with a Budget of war, we shall drift into the haven of everlasting peace. Sir, I may be blind, but I think at all events I shall not be without companions in my misfortune when I confess that I am utterly unable to discover the benefits we are to derive from this Treaty. Is it, as has been so frequently stated, that we may enable the Emperor of the French to exhaust our resources of steam coal, and supply himself with one of the principal munitions of naval warfare? An excellent object, doubtless, that for France, but one which I protest against on behalf of England. The hon. Member for Birmingham told us last night with his accustomed frankness, that we know nothing whatever about the subject when we alarm ourselves on this head, and that any one who knows anything at all knows that one North colliery contains coal enough to supply for a year the whole French navy. [Mr. BRIGHT: Hear, hear!] That may be so, and my ignorance of this matter may be very profound; but let me ask the hon. Member to explain to us, if such is the case, how it is that at this moment the price of coal in this City is rapidly rising in price, and that which has hitherto been a blessing and a necessary alike to rich and poor, threatens to become an expensive luxury to the rich alone. If the object of this Treaty be to stimulate free trade, how can you justify for a moment the retention of the differential dues on foreign shipping? If it be to return to the days of reciprocity, why, when you reduce the duty on French wines, do you make no stipulation for a corresponding reduction of the French duty on English beer? Why, when you add to the income tax to abolish the paper duty? do you make no attempt to have the prohibition removed from French rags, which

MR. GOWER said, he would not attempt to consider in detail the comprehensive Budget which had been laid before the House, but would leave it to be dealt with by abler hands. On the general question, however, he must beg leave to express his dissent from the opinions which had been expressed on the previous evening, for he regarded the scheme of the Chancellor of the Exchequer as a continuance of the commercial policy and principles of Sir Robert Peel, which had conferred inestimable benefits on the country, and it would therefore receive his warm and cordial support. The issue really narrowed itself into the question whether that policy was or was not to be continued, and he must say that the question was very fairly raised by the Resolution they were now considering. If its spirit were taken as exemplified in the very fair and moderate speech of the hon. Gentleman, it must appear directly opposed to the policy of Sir Robert Peel, and such as might fairly have been brought forward in 1842. But, with regard more especially to the French Treaty it was very desirable to know what were really the opinions of hon. Members opposite with respect to free trade. It was highly satisfactory to hear the right hon. Gentleman at the head of that party say on the previous evening that he approved of free trade, but there was a certain want of heartiness in the way he expressed himself that made him (Mr. Gower) doubt not the sincerity, but the strength of his convictions. He had also remarked that whenever throughout the debate any Protectionist's argument or sentiment was uttered, it had always been received with the loudest cheers by hon. Gentlemen opposite. Again, in the speech to which they had just listened, the House had been told by the speaker that he bowed to free trade; this was not what they wanted to know, but whether hon. Gentlemen opposite believed in those principles; because the assurance that they were ready to act contrary to their convictions could not be very reassuring to the country. Free-traders held that measures of that class were beneficial to the country which adopted them; and if the opponents of the Treaty were prepared to make this admission, there was no force whatever in the objection urged by them that this was a one-sided measure. Therefore, if hon. Gentlemen opposite were earnest in their adhesion to free trade a great deal of time might be saved and the country might proceed at once to carry out the stipulations which had been entered into. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had clearly explained that what we stipulated to do was beneficial to ourselves; there could not be, therefore, any question of indemnity. The hon. Gentleman opposite held that it was contrary to the principles of free trade to engage in any commercial treaty whatever. This was a doctrine which had been very much put forward, but he could not understand upon what ground. No doubt Free-traders had hitherto condemned treaties of commerce; but for what reason? Because they had invariably been passed on principles of restriction—they nearly always aimed at favouring the manufactures of one country at the expense of the other. But in order to judge of a commercial treaty it was necessary to look at its stipulations, and if they found nothing in them of a restrictive character, he did not see how the Treaty itself could be regarded as opposed to free trade. It was perfectly preposterous to suppose that a treaty between two countries, made in order to carry out a policy, could in itself be opposed to it. One of the principal stipulations in this Treaty is a total abolition of commercial restrictions; was that contrary to free trade? This abolition he advocated as a matter of justice. The community ought not to be taxed for the benefit of any particular class. Protective duties were an injustice to the consumer, and by retaining them England was rendered liable to the charge of insincerity in her advocacy of free-trade principles. No doubt there were great alarms in some districts as to the effects of the proposed measures; but no great commercial reforms could be undertaken without causing similar apprehensions. It was not for the permanent interest of any trade to have to rely on artificial prices. In bad times it was the protected trades that suffered most because their market was a limited one, and when the Home demand failed they had no other market to go to. They could not compete in the general markets of the world. When Mr. Huskisson proposed to reduce the protective duties, vising the Emperor in that House to adopt free trade in France and to break through the commercial restrictions which were inflicting so much injury upon that country. The Emperor, at last with great moral courage, undertook to break through these restrictions, and what was the return he met with? Why, they cavilled at the mode in which he had done it. He should be delighted if there existed in France free institutions, a free press, the right of political assembly, and a Chamber of Deputies freely elected in which the matter might be publicly canvassed. But the Legislative Chamber was at present an exclusive body made up of old officials imbued with the traditions of protection, and if free trade depended upon their support, the interests and welfare of the whole country would be sacrificed to obsolete opinions. These difficulties ought to be weighed when the Emperor of the French took a course that he had always been assured in that House would confer inestimable benefits upon France. A petition had been presented in which the petitioners expressed a hope that the provisions of the Treaty would cause "perpetual peace between the two countries." He was not quite so hopeful, but he entertained no doubt that if France, imitating our successful example, left her industry unfettered; and if, abandoning false ideas of military glory, she devoted herself exclusively to the arts of peace, she would take a far juster view of what constitutes the real greatness and nobleness of a nation. If she did so, that House would incur a great responsibility if it rejected a measure fraught with such inestimable benefits.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU said, that if he desired notoriety, or if singularity were his object, two courses were open to him. He might either be the only one to disparage the ability and eloquence which the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had exhibited the other night, or he might be the only one to praise the Budget which he had propounded. He should take neither course. The former was debarred to him because he entertained a great admiration for the right hon. Gentleman and his dazzling talents; and the latter course was precluded for reasons which he would presently mention. No one ever sought to find fault with that which was entirely bad. If a thing was utterly worthless it was at once cast aside. They only picked flaws in that which was essentially good. It might, therefore, well be that the system which the right hon. Gentleman had proposed was good in a commercial point of view. But there were other considerations which must be regarded. The hon. Gentleman who had just sat down had assumed that all who sat on the Opposition side of the House were necessarily Protectionists. That was not the case, for there were many Free-traders amongst them. These might, however, support the system usually upheld by Protectionists, but not upon Protectionist grounds. The treaty with France, for instance, could not be so well defended politically as it could from a commercial point of view; and while Protectionists might regard it as contrary to Protectionist principles, others might object on purely political grounds. It reminded him indeed of an old tale with which they were all well acquainted in their youth, of a man who desired to obtain an old but valuable lamp, and who went about crying "New lamps for old ones." The Emperor Napoleon had gone about declaring that the protection of British shipping system was old and effete, and said to the Government, "Give me this old lamp, and in exchange I will give you a French moderator, spick and span new, from the Imperial factory. So also the restraint on the export of coal is part of a musty-fusty system, and Customs' revenue likewise. These are all old lamps; but you shall supply the French dockyards with coal; you shall increase the French merchant shipping as a nurse to her navy; you shall encourage French merchandise by impoverishing your own; these are new lights, which you shall have in exchange." The Treaty assumes an exchange, but he (Lord R. Montagu) would ask, why there was any treaty at all? Were we not competent to repeal our Customs' duties ourselves? We surely did not need the signature or leave of an Emperor for that purpose. But if there were to be a treaty surely the conditions ought to be equally balanced. We ought to get as much as we gave, and the same freedom of commerce should be given to us that we conceded to them. The whole of this Treaty proceeded upon a totally different assumption. It would be seen in the third page of the Correspondence that for a slight reduction on the other side we were to make a clean sweep of articles subject to Customs' duties. If hon. Members compared what the Treaty gave the Emperor with what the Emperor

cellor of the Exchequer himself had, in 1853, pronounced that impost to be one which tended to encourage immorality among the community by reason of the system of self-assessment, and in other respects to be open to the gravest possible objections; and yet the right hon. Gentleman did not hesitate not only to continue but to increase, in time of peace, a tax which he had declared ought to be regarded as a great resource to be resorted to in time of war. He had said of it in 1853, that a Minister had only to "stretch out his hand and reach this weapon from the shelf." The right hon. Gentleman did so once to stir the flames of war, and now he used it to cement the bonds of peace: he has taken down the weapon, he will say, to beat it into a ploughshare and have done with it. It was all very well to say that the tax would only be a temporary expedient; it had gone on from year to year, since its first imposition for a period of three years. In short, its term was for one year, renewable for ever, as there appeared at the present moment as little chance of its being dispensed with as ever, particularly when it was taken into account that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had anticipated the malt and hop duties, that the payment of Exchequer bills had been postponed, and that there would be next year "no little account" from Spain on which to rely. The right hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Horsman) had said the previous evening, no doubt in the heat of debate, that the Chancellor of the Exchequer, with such a deficit staring him in the face, and a larger deficit looming in the future, was like a man who had spent all his money and then went out into the highway and robbed the first comer. He thought the right hon. Gentleman should rather have said that the Chancellor of the Exchequer was like the scion of some noble house, who at the last hour of the night tried to retrieve, by a desperate throw for "double or quits," the ill-fortune which had clung to him all day. He must say he thought we ought not to receive this Treaty with an increased income tax and reductions in a failing revenue, or allow our hands to be tied, and give what had always been our greatest strength into the hands of a man of dark designs, of simulated friendships, and of sudden animosities. Shall we let him store his dockyards, and nurse a powerful navy, and by a stroke raise up strong genii to overturn our unsuspecting land. Under these circumstances he should with confidence ask the House whether they were prepared to sanction the proposals which the right hon. Gentleman had submitted to their notice.

MR. BAXTER said, that representing, as he did, a great commercial constituency, likely to be affected not only by the Treaty with France, but also by all the financial proposals of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, he was most anxious to address a few words to the House. He must record his conviction that the Budget of the right hon. Gentleman was the best and boldest which had been submitted to Parliament since the days of Sir R. Peel. He might also observe that the speech in which it had been introduced had not, for simple eloquence and lucid arrangement, been excelled in any Legislative Assembly in the world. The manner in which it had been brought forward, however, was of minor importance as compared with the great principles which it involved. The more the reasoning of the right hon. Gentleman was considered, the more unanswerable it appeared. He quite concurred with the right hon. Gentleman in the opinion that one of the greatest benefits which could be conferred upon the labouring population of England was to extend the trade and commerce of the country so as to render that labour, which was the poor man's capital, more valuable. Compared with this the remission of taxes was worthless. And how, let him ask, did our trade with France at the present moment stand? Why, it might be said with justice that with that vast country, containing as it did 30,000,000 or 40,000,000 of inhabitants, we carried on scarcely any trade at all. If, however, the remission of duties which was proposed in the Budget were carried into effect, our commerce with France would increase, although perhaps in some cases—as, for instance, in the case of flax-yarn, in which his constituents were interested—the advantages which the Treaty was calculated to confer might not be quite immediate. But, although that might be true, the Budget was no less entitled to the support of the House, and he felt assured that when the treaty which Louis Philippe had concluded with Belgium should have expired, and when the French should have come to the knowledge of the real substantial benefits certain to flow from a free-trade policy, they would not only be encouraged, but most anxious to take further steps in the same direction, and thus a great benefit to all classes would be the result. Was it not likely, he would could not have brought about the change he desired in any other way than by a treaty. They had heard many common-places about Richard Cobden having deserted the principles of free trade in negotiating this Treaty; but he maintained that if the hon. Member for Rochdale succeeded in this great attempt to draw the two countries more closely together and in establishing a more intimate commercial relationship between them, he would accomplish a task as great and beneficial as that which he accomplished when he brought about the repeal of the duty on corn. The Chancellor of the Exchequer would, no doubt, see it would be necessary to amend his Budget in some particulars; but, looking at it as a whole, he held that if the House, from mere party feeling, or from petty jealousy of France, would not sanction the measure, it would not only do a most unpatriotic deed, but a deed that they would repent of in all time coming.

MR. LIDDELL said, that it was with considerable pain he felt obliged to adopt a course on the present occasion different from that pursued by the party to which he belonged. But he objected to the Motion made by the hon. Member for North Essex. The advantages offered by the Treaty were not to be measured by any arithmetical calculation. It had been observed that the Treaty might be commercially right, but that it was politically wrong. Now, he had a strong feeling that it was right in both aspects, and he therefore intended to give it in the main his support. He opposed the Motion because abstract resolutions in matters of finance were always objectionable. In the abstract, nothing could be more odious than a proposition to increase the income tax; but finances depended upon the circumstances of the time, and the exigencies of the State. Now, the circumstances of the time were of a grave and peculiar nature. The Emperor of the French had recalled to his mind the celebrated words he uttered a few years ago, "L'Empire c'est la paix." They created great surprise at the time, and his remembrance of them now no doubt produced an equal sensation, because no one could deny that his acts had in some degree belied his professions. But the Emperor of the French saw that he wanted many of the most valuable means for the cultivation of the arts of peace, and he looked for the supply of them to a neighbouring country. The Treaty was, in fact, a matter of necessity to France. And viewing it in that light, he was prepared to consider how far its adoption would conduce to British interests, and either alter or amend it in that sense. No doubt the articles we were going to obtain from France were articles of luxury which for many years had been mainly consumed by the rich classes in this country, and no one had complained of their price. But what was the case with France. She wanted the raw materials for carrying on her manufactures. The condition of the two countries was very different. We were at the top of the tree, so to speak, of commercial advancement. France was only beginning to feel her way—emerging from all the darkness of prohibition and restriction. The advantages of the Treaty to France would be immediate; the advantages we would derive might be more protracted, but they would be no less sure. The question was whether they were worth the price we should have to pay for them. He believed in his heart that they would be. Though we were only separated from our neighbours in France by a narrow channel, our trade with that country was infinitesimally small. Last year, as he was assured, it only amounted to some £600,000. That was a state of things so remarkable that he could hardly credit it. If we were on the eve of obtaining with our great and powerful neighbour an extension of trade such as might fairly be expected to follow the adoption of this Treaty, why should we lose the opportunity by sweeping away the whole proposition of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and refusing to enter on the discussion of the Articles of this Treaty? Embracing the opportunity, he felt perfectly convinced no man living could estimate the amount of extension to which it would lead. With regard to the existing exigencies of the State, he would say that the great blot of the financial scheme of the Chancellor of the Exchequer was that while they were making sacrifices of revenue to France for the sake of obtaining what he considered inestimable advantages, it called on Parliament at the same time to vote unprecedented Supplies in a time of peace. It was that double expense of which the party which sat opposite complained; but if he wanted any proof of its necessity, he found it in the fact that it had been recommended by a Government remarkable for its ability and administrative power, and composed largely of the disciples of the late Sir R. Peel, the greatest of modern economists. He believed that our large military ex-

was not impossible that the reduction of the wine duties might neither increase the consumption nor lower the price. Our manufactures might not be admitted to the French markets by the 30 per cent ad valorem duty which had excluded our linen cloths in 1842; while the Article binding us not to prohibit the exportation of coal was one of very questionable policy, and one upon the construction of which the highest legal authorities in the House differed. He thought the Chancellor of the Exchequer had made a bold estimate in calculating that the proposed reduction of the wine duties to 3s. per gallon would lead to an increase of 35 per cent in the consumption. Some years ago the right hon. Gentleman himself, in opposing a Motion of Mr. Oliveira, had contended that a reduction of the duty to 1s. per gallon was not likely to produce any great effect upon consumption. The reduction of the wine duties in 1787 had the effect of a large increase in the consumption; but there were additions made to the duties in 1795, 1803, and 1805, none of which materially affected the consumption, though they brought an increased revenue to the Exchequer. In 1825 the wine duties were reduced nearly 50 per cent, and in 1831 the duties on all kinds of wine were equalized, and the effect was to give a considerable stimulus to consumption, but not by any means in proportion to the increase of population. The truth was that social habits had a greater effect on the consumption of wine, one way or the other, than any amount of duty whatever; and, judging of the future from the past, he thought the Chancellor of the Exchequer had been exceedingly sanguine in the estimate he had taken of the probable increase of consumption from the proposed reduction in the duties. It was important to bear in mind that the wine duties did not stand alone, but formed part of a system of taxation levied on all fermented beverages. At present there was an equilibrium between the duties levied on wine and those levied on beer. Take, for instance, a barrel of porter. That was brewed from two bushels of malt and three or four pounds of hops. It was worth from 26s. to 30s.; it paid malt and hop duties to the extent of 6s., or from one fourth to one-fifth of its value. The present wine duties were equal to 6s. per gallon or 1s. per bottle, which on a bottle of port or sherry of the kind ordinarily consumed in this country, costing from 4s. to 5s. a bottle, was also about one-fourth or one-fifth of the value. It would therefore be felt to be a gross injustice if they reduced by four or five-sixths the duty levied on wine and left the present taxation on that drink, brewed from malt and hops, which, if not a necessary of life, was almost one to the working man in a climate like ours. Moreover, through the operation of the malt and hop duties, when the wine duties were reduced to the full extent proposed by the right hon. Gentlemen, the foreign wine-grower would be enjoying a protection in competition with the English brewer and farmer. Hence the reduction of the wine duties seemed to him necessarily to involve a reduction before long of the duties upon beer. He could not look upon the Treaty as consistent with that free-trade policy which this country had hitherto pursued. But then they ought not to be bound by any abstract principles of political economy. If the Treaty would be the means of increasing the commerce between the two countries, and of knitting them closer together in bonds of interest and of amity, it would not, he thought, be too great a price to pay for it, to sacrifice some political consistency and some revenue; and believing that it would have the effect of promoting and fostering the connection with France, while he objected to such commercial engagements on general principles, and while he objected to some particular provisions, he was still ready, on the whole, to give his assent to it. Looking at the Budget as a whole, he thought it not more remarkable for boldness than for foresight, and hoped it would lay the foundations of future prosperity and wealth which would repay this country for any immediate sacrifice, and enable it to bear with ease even a greater amount of taxation than it sustained now.

MR. DAWSON :—It has been so often laid down as an axiom in this, and last night's debate, that it is impossible to consider the Budget propositions apart from the Commercial Treaty with France, on which the whole scheme is founded, that I must necessarily examine the principles of taxation and remission of duties which do appear to me to apply to the general interests of Ireland. If I am to judge from the expression of public opinion, as elicited at large and influential meetings, by petitions, and through the ordinary channels of the Press, the people of Ireland do not appear satisfied with the financial expectations of this year—a year

Members of this House, and will be defended with all the advantages of Parliamentary experience. I shall only say, that in the votes I may be called to give, I shall act with a sincere desire to unfetter commerce and extend our trade; but also upon the principle that the people of these kingdoms shall not be subjected to an immoderate and excessive taxation, without the most positive proof that the advantages to both countries shall be rendered equal.

MR. FRANK CROSSLEY had listened with considerable attention to the course of the debate, and he had found some disparity in the views entertained on the other side of the House. For example, the hon. Gentleman the member for North Essex (Mr. Du Cane) had laid considerable stress upon the fact that the working people of this country were going to have dear tea and dear sugar; and the noble Lord the member for Huntingdon had stated that wine would be no cheaper, and that paper would be no cheaper by the abolition of the duty. The noble Lord said that some years ago the duty upon leather was taken off, yet boots and shoes were no cheaper; that the duty on soap had also been taken off, yet soap was no cheaper. Now the noble Lord ought to bear in mind the prices at which those articles would have been had the demand then been what it now was. As to soap, he (Mr. Crossley) could speak from experience, that it was decidedly cheaper; but when the consumption went on increasing, from the article being in demand, it was thus possible that it might be as dear as it was before the reduction. The position of the Chancellor of the Exchequer was one of great difficulty. We had the largest deficit in the revenue in his recollection, and it had occurred under most remarkable circumstances. There were three circumstances, all of which would have led us to suppose that instead of a deficit we might have had a surplus. We had had peace—he meant as far as we were concerned—in Europe; and he would almost say we had had peace with all the world. As to the prosperity of the country, he did not recollect any time in which it had been so great as during the past year. He did not mean with regard to any one branch of industry. Taking away the manufacture of cotton, it might be that many other branches of industry had seen more prosperous times. But, taking them altogether, he did not think there had ever been a time in which the country had been more prosperous. He was only stating a fact when he said there was not a town or village of any importance in any manufacturing district in Lancashire or Yorkshire that had not machinery standing, not from want of orders, but from want of people to attend to it. We had had a most extraordinary falling in of no less a charge upon the public revenue than £2,136,000 in terminable annuities; and he had been rather disappointed to find that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had not given hope that, at same future time, we might look for similar golden days when other terminable annuities would fall in. He quite agreed with the right hon. Gentleman that we should not live to see the day; but he (Mr. Crossley) had on former occasions stated how the Chancellor of the Exchequer might set about a course which would ensure the falling in of a considerable amount of terminable annuities. He (Mr. Crossley) had had a table prepared by a very experienced actuary, from which he found that if £500,000 per annum were set aside out of the revenue, with a view to the reduction of the national debt, by creating terminable annuities at sixty years, assuming Three per Cent Consols to be at £95, those sixty years' terminable annuities would be worth £79 1s. 9d., being a difference of £15 18s. 3d. That £500,000 per annum would create £3,412,183, and that would be the amount falling in every year, commencing sixty years from the present time. But suppose the Chancellor of the Exchequer wished to fix the time further, and he devoted £500,000 per annum to annuities terminable at 100 years' date, taking bonds at £95, a terminable annuity would be worth £90 3s. 3d., or a difference of £4 16s. 9d., so that £500,000 per annum would be creating a falling in at the expiration of the term to the amount of £10,335,917 per annum. He again threw out these suggestions for the use of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The national debt was now so large that everything ought to be done to diminish it; and if we now put some such plan forward, as our forefathers had done with the terminable annuities just expired, he thought we should be taking a very wise course. He had thus stated three things, which ought to have produced a surplus, namely, peace, prosperity, and the falling in of more than £2,000,000 annuities, and he may well ask how it was they had got into all this most anxious that this Budget should pass with alterations in minor details; and it was only in minor details that alterations were required. By this Treaty they would throw open to this country markets which they had not had before, and supply the means of reducing their armaments.

MR. HENNESSY said, he would not advert to the great political questions connected with the Budget, but would confine himself to a consideration of its effects upon Ireland. As far as Irish interests were concerned, he believed the Budget to be the very worst ever laid before the Imperial Parliament. When the right hon. Gentleman proposed an income tax of 10*d.* in the pound, he said he was about to remit certain duties, and the consumer would gain as much by the remission as he would be called on to pay in income tax. That might be true as regarded the British consumer, but not in respect of the Irish consumer. On the article of currants alone the British consumer was relieved to the amount of £300,000, while the relief to the Irish consumer was only £720. Then, again, with regard to butter the British consumer would be benefited to the extent of £94,795; the Irish, who imported no butter, would not be relieved one penny. And the same might be said with regard to eggs, upon which the British consumers would gain £23,846, and the Irish consumers not a farthing. There were other articles, with respect to which the proposed reductions of duty would, he said, operate in a similar way. Thus, there would be a gain on corks of £8,000 to the British consumer, to the Irish nothing; on firewood, to the British consumer £589, to the Irish nothing. Taking the whole of the principal articles of consumption together, the total relief to the British consumer would be £580,000, and to the Irish consumer only £800. In like manner, as regarded the income tax, it had been the boast of those who defended that tax that the classes who had the highest incomes in England paid more income tax than the classes below them; in Ireland the case was the very reverse, the three lowest classes of incomes actually paying 40 per cent more than those above them. This fact indicated that the income tax pressed with an arbitrary and unequal severity, and that though it was equal in theory, it was not so in reality. With regard to the tea duties, he had received important communications from large tea-dealers in Ireland, stating that the reduction of the tea duty to 1*s.* a pound would have occasioned an immediate increase of consumption to the extent of 25 per cent, and a gradual increase within two years to the extent of 75 per cent. Thus, by the reduction of the tea duty, combined with the consequent increase of consumption, the right hon. Gentleman would have increased the revenue by £350,000 per annum from Ireland alone. When the tea duties were reduced in Ireland the population was greater than it is at present. In the year 1840 the population of Ireland was over eight millions. The population now is about seven millions. But in 1840 Ireland consumed four million pounds of tea; now they consume ten millions of pounds. They now consume a larger quantity because the duty has been reduced, although the population had diminished. He thought, therefore, he was justified in saying that if the tea duty were still further reduced there would be a still further increase of the revenue. Last year the duty paid by Great Britain amounted to £4,500,000; the duty paid in Ireland on tea was £700,000; that is to say, they paid in Ireland only one-sixth of the duty which was paid in England. He thought, therefore, that if the duty were still further reduced more would be paid into the Exchequer than by the taxes which the Government now took from Ireland. He mentioned only these few facts, to show that he was perfectly justified in voting for the Amendment.

MR. GRANT DUFF said, that he would approach the consideration of this much-canvassed Treaty from its weakest side, the side which had been alluded to by the noble Lord who had spoken a few minutes before from the opposite side of the House (Lord R. Montagu). It was said, and with some plausibility, that we, the free Parliament of England, were conspiring with the ruler of France to defraud the Parliament of France of its right to discuss a great change in the commercial policy of that country. But this objection disappeared when the state of the case was understood. There was no real Parliament in France. The body called the Corps Legislatif had nothing in common with that illustrious assembly which once gathered within the same walls, and was awayed by the eloquence of M. Thiers and M. Guizot, M. Berryer, and M. Lamartine. A great deal had been said on the other side of the House as to the election of the

up in the belief that treaties of reciprocity were not much in favour with the free-trade school, but that their creed was that we ought to legislate for our own benefit and leave other nations to follow the course which they thought their interests dictated. This Treaty, however, conferred benefits on both France and England, and therefore was a measure which should not be condemned on that ground. Still the leading members of the free-trade party in that House had been led into inconsistencies in reference to that matter, which made him doubt whether they would necessarily adhere under all circumstances to their own professions. He found, for instance, that when a complaint was made from the Opposition side of the House that injustice would be done under the Treaty to our shipping interest, the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade, who was by far the purest Free-trader on the Treasury Bench, replied that, under that arrangement, differential duties would be established in France in favour of both English and French ships against those of the rest of the world in the case of goods exported from our shores to that country, so that the right hon. Gentleman seemed to have no objection that a practice should be adopted in France at variance with his own free-trade principles. That, however, was a matter of minor importance, and although it was an indication that there were matters in connection with the Treaty which took off the keen edge of free-trade principles so strongly professed by noble Lords and right hon. Gentlemen opposite, he (Sir S. Northcote) would not further insist upon it. Neither would he cite upon that occasion the language which had been employed last year by the noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs or by the noble Lord at the head of the Government upon the subject of commercial treaties. It was well known that such treaties had never been looked upon with any favour by free-trade writers, but there was one treaty of that description which those writers had signalled out for their special reprobation, and that was the Methuen Treaty, which had been concluded in the beginning of the last century with Portugal, and under which, in consideration of certain advantages which Portugal gave us, we were bound to admit into our ports Portuguese wines at a lower rate of duty—he believed one-third lower—than the wines of France. It was true that there was, at first sight, no such Article in the present Treaty. But it certainly contained a very curious provision in reference to the wine duties. It was set forth in one of the Articles that the duties should be fixed in three classes, at 1s., at 1s. 6d., and at 2s., according to the quantity of spirit which the wines contained. The wines of Spain and Portugal would generally come into the second class, those of France, for the most part, into the first; therefore, the effect of the Treaty would be that, generally speaking, the wines of France would be introduced at 1s. a gallon, those of Spain and Portugal at 1s. 6d. This was the exact converse of the Methuen Treaty, and in his opinion it was questionable how far this was consistent with our free-trade principles. It was said by the hon. Member for Montrose that if this reduction were made we should be able to go to Austria, Spain, Portugal and other countries which now imposed prohibitory duties on our manufactures, and get them to do for us what France had done. But it was not easy to see how that could be done. We should have nothing left to offer them. If we offered to reduce their wine duties they would reply, "You have done that already, but you have arranged what remains to the advantage of France. Let us come in at the same rate as the French, and we will open our markets to your goods." But we could not do this, for the Treaty bound us for ten years. In the Ninth Article there was a stipulation that if we thought proper to impose fresh duties on home made spirits, we might raise the duties—on what did the House think? On all wines? No; on wines of the second and third classes. So that while the clause provided that we might raise the duties on the wines of Spain and Portugal, we must not touch the duties on the wines of France, which would still come in at 1s. the gallon. He might be told that this was a provision introduced partly for the protection of the revenue and partly against interference with our home distilleries, and that it was not a new principle, because at present there was a certain duty on proof spirits, which was increased if the spirits were above the proof strength. So we did; but we did not raise the payment by jumps, but by a per-centage, whereas in the Treaty a degree above the limit caused the duty to jump from the 1s. to the 1s. 6d., or from the 1s. 6d. to the 2s. He might also be told that the duty was made ad valorem, in order to admit the light and cheap wines of France, which by the present system of an equal duty of 5s. were excluded; but he do well, but only on condition that they infused new energy into education. With education the franchise was a blessing—without it an extension of the franchise would be a curse. It was but the other day that a French Republican leader had said to him, "Let your countrymen be warned by us. Let them not reduce the franchise too far." ["Hear, hear!" from the Opposition benches.] Ah! hon. Members opposite might cheer, but he would beg to remind them, and especially the right hon. Member for the University of Dublin, who honoured him by his applause, that in France only one man in ten could read. With regard to the simplification of the tariff, he thought it an enormous benefit, not only because many things would be admitted duty free which were useful and desirable, the tax on which did very little for the revenue; but, because when things were once made plentiful, all sorts of new uses were found for them, and even trades sprang up in the most unexpected ways. Soon, too, the obnoxious search at the Custom-house would be done away with, and this, though it seemed but a little thing, would be a great boon to the most valuable part of our population. Did not every one, even the least thoughtful summer tourist, who returned to our shores, bring with him more or less of that knowledge which is power, not only to individuals but to nations? Ere long, he hoped that we should be able to say to other nations, "We, Englishmen, have no passports, we have no detention at the Custom-house, and very soon we hope to have no quarantine."

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, he was anxious to express his sense of the great merits of the scheme proposed by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, which was then under their consideration. The hon. Member for West Norfolk (Mr. Bentinck) had remarked, after his right hon. Friend had concluded his statement the other evening, that he had never before known a case in which so much tinsel had been wrapped up in such glowing colours. That, however, was not his (Sir S. Northcote's) opinion. On the contrary, he readily admitted that there was a good deal of sterling gold in the proposals that had been made by his right hon. Friend. But, at the same time, he could not help remembering the proverb that even "gold might be bought too dear." They had then to consider whether the price which they would have to pay for the advantages which were held out to them was not higher than that which those advantages were worth. He did not mean to enter into a minute examination whether this concession on the part of France was precisely equal to that concession on the part of England; or whether some duties might have been a little less and some restrictions spared. There were many points upon which, if disposed, they might be critical, and probably many details would on a future occasion demand discussion. The great benefit of the scheme was the simplification of the tariff; but upon that point there was a difference of opinion in 1857 between the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Home Secretary. The right hon. Baronet, who was then Chancellor of the Exchequer, was of opinion that a large number of duties of small amount was better than a small number of heavy duties; while the present Chancellor of the Exchequer ridiculed the argument by saying that, according to this theory, the perfection of finance consisted of an infinite number of infinitesimal duties upon an infinite number of articles. His own opinion agreed with the present Chancellor of the Exchequer, but it must be remembered that part of the price which they were to pay for a simplification of the tariff was the imposition of an infinite number of infinitesimal duties upon every transaction in commerce, and perhaps the commercial classes would experience almost as much inconvenience from the infinite number of stamps as they would avoid by sweeping away a certain number of duties. It was a question, however, upon which he did not wish to express at that moment any decided opinion. Before he entered into a consideration of the general merits of the financial scheme, he wished to say a few words in reference to the Treaty with France, which the House had decided should be considered along with the Budget. He was not disposed to quarrel with that arrangement. It had been stated by many hon. Members on that (the Opposition) side of the House that the Treaty was opposed to the principle of free trade. The remark had been made jestingly; but on the other side of the House some serious apprehension had apparently been felt on the subject, and an anxiety shown to repudiate the idea that a Treaty negotiated by the present Government and by Mr. Cobden could be contrary to the principles of free trade, which reminded him of the French proverb qui s'accuse s'accuse. Now, he had been brought

go on rising year after year. He believed firmly that if the Government had not proposed to deal with these branches of the revenue, they would in themselves have afforded a surplus. His right hon. Friend, as an instance of the elasticity of the revenue, had referred to the increase which had taken place between 1832 and 1853, notwithstanding the removal of Excise and Customs' duties to a very large amount. Between 1832 and 1841 duties were remitted and the revenue increased. From 1841 to 1853 taxes were remitted to the extent of more than a million a year, and the revenue increased at a larger rate. But what had happened since 1853? Between that year and 1858 we had put on more than we had taken off, and the balance, as he calculated it, exclusive of the malt duty, imposed and taken off, was this, we had added £5,347,000, and we had remitted £5,011,000. But during that time there was a gradually increasing revenue to the extent of £760,000 per annum on the Customs and Excise duties. When his right hon. Friend asked, therefore, where they were to get their surplus, his reply was that they would probably find it in the natural progress of their Customs and Excise duties, and he said it with the more confidence, because his right hon. Friend admitted that the sum of £640,000 would probably be lost to the Customs' duties this year, in consequence of the agitation connected with the Treaty. [The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER dissented.] He would not, however, insist upon that point, because he wished to point out to the House that they should not really want a surplus of £3,000,000, and that an income tax of 7d. in the pound, along with the natural elasticity of the revenue, would amply cover the deficit. Now, if the deficit could be covered by a 7d. income tax, while the Chancellor of the Exchequer demanded 10d., then the price which they were called on to pay for the advantages of this Treaty was not one penny, but three pence. The question, moreover, he maintained, could not be considered merely as an arrangement for the present year; in process of time the revenue might recover; but in giving relief to the consumer, as it was termed, to the extent of £4,000,000 they had struck a very serious blow at the finances of the country, and for the present, additional taxation in some form or other should be imposed. In what form was it to be raised? Was it to be an income tax of 10d.? No; if this scheme

were adopted, it must be at the rate of 1s. in the pound at least. So that when hon. Gentlemen in that House spoke so very glibly of getting those immense advantages for an additional 1d. of income tax, they were really talking in a way which deluded the public, and presented a wholly incorrect view of the matter. What were they to do next year? They would not then have the advances on the malt tax to help them—it was out of the question to propose additional duties on tea and sugar. But even this was not the end of their losses, for they spoke of relinquishing a million on the paper duty; the fact was that the tax amounted to £1,200,000, though it appeared to be only a million this year because the abolition of the duty was not to take place till July. He did not wish to speak at large upon the paper duty, but he might call attention to the very prosperous state of that branch of the revenue, which from £810,000 in 1849 had, with one check which lasted for one year, steadily risen to £1,142,000 in 1858, being an increase of £332,000, or more than forty per cent, within a period of ten years. He was not defending the paper duty—he did not mean to say that the mere increase afforded any reason for refusing to take off an impost which was considered to press upon the people of this country and on the springs of industry; but when large reductions and abolitions were proposed, mainly depending upon the elasticity of the revenue to supply their place, it was the duty of Members to call attention to the elements of this elasticity, and to see in what they really consisted. No doubt the revenue was to a wonderful extent elastic, but it could only be so according to certain principles and laws; and if the duties which were the elements of this expansive power were taken away, it followed that elasticity itself would no longer exist. Since the year 1849, although taxes to the amount of £1,700,000 had been abolished, the revenue from Excise had actually increased from £15,500,000 to £17,500,000. That was an increase of £2,000,000; nay, if they looked to the articles that had yielded the increase, and deducted the articles on which taxation had been wholly remitted, they would find that it was an increase of more than £4,000,000. But whence did the increase arise? Of the total increase, £3,200,000 had arisen from spirits; £448,000 on malt; £173,000 on hops; and £332,000 on paper, leaving only was informed that the finer wines of Spain and Portugal would probably be found to contain less than 15 degrees of spirit, as would likewise the best wines of France, so that they would pay the lower duty; while the cheaper but stronger wines of Spain and Portugal, which were really fitted for the consumption of the poor, would pay the higher rate of duty; and, if so, the duty, at first sight ad valorem, would, on examination of the circumstances, be found to be an ad valorem reversed, and would press heaviest on the cheaper kinds of wine. It might be that the Government had information in their possession which would show that the effect he had described would not be realized, but until the system had been tried its working could not be known accurately, and his objection to the proposition of the Government was, that it tied our hands for ten years, however the system might work. However, he would say this—and it was an admission that he was willing and anxious to make to the Government—that, setting aside some of these points of detail, he approved of the negotiation with France. He saw very great advantages that might probably be derived by our trade. This was an admission that he made without the slightest hesitation. Though the Treaty did not give all we wished, and all we had a right to expect, and although it contained a condition which would be embarrassing to us, he was free to admit that it made a breach in the French system of prohibition which might be attended with most important consequences. If, then, he felt obliged to oppose the whole scheme, it was not because he undervalued the advantages of it, but that he objected to the price we were called upon to pay for it. The hon. Member for Montrose (Mr. Baxter) had made a most astonishing speech that evening. He had always considered him a gentleman of more than ordinary shrewdness and ability. That evening he had risen and in a speech setting forth the great advantages of the Budget of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, he paid, as was natural and as was done by all, his tribute to the manner in which the financial statement was brought forward. Probably, he thought that all the eulogium had been exhausted, and that he must try and find something new; and therefore, the particular quality he selected for especial praise was what he called the Chancellor of the Exchequer's "simple eloquence." Now the eloquence of the right hon. Gentleman nobody doubted;

but that its characteristic was simplicity he (Sir S. Northcote) was hardly disposed to admit. The hon. Member for Montrose seemed to have been led away by it however, for shortly afterwards he made another statement showing in what way the "simple eloquence" of the Chancellor of the Exchequer had taken effect on him, as we were told art, when well concealed, was ever sure to do. After explaining the advantages of the Budget, the Member for Montrose had asked, "And what is the price? You may have it all for an additional income tax of one penny in the pound for one year." Why this is dirt cheap. One penny in the pound for one year. The Chancellor of the Exchequer also took care, both at the commencement of his speech and at the end of it, to put the bargain in that way. He said there was a deficit of £9,400,000 to meet, and these two modes of doing it. We might have a niggardly Budget, with a ninepenny income tax, and keep on the war duties on tea and sugar; or a liberal Budget, giving up the tea and sugar duties, with a shilling income tax. He went on to state that there was a treaty with France, a simplification of the tariff, a repeal of the paper duties, and he showed how he proposed to compensate the losses we were to sustain, at least to a certain extent. And then he asked, "And how are we going to make this out? Why, by one penny addition to the income tax you can get all that." Certainly at that price the Treaty was cheap, but then the right hon. Gentleman added that, by collecting three quarters of the income tax in the financial year he could get £8,472,000; he could get £1,400,000 by taking up the malt and hop credits; and another £2,100,000 by the tea and sugar. But if the right hon. Gentlemen were going to receive all this, he would not want a ninepenny tax; a sevenpenny tax would be sufficient. Seventenths of £8,472,000 would produce £5,930,400; and adding to this £2,100,000 from the tea and sugar, and £1,400,000 for the calling in of the malt and hop credit, and there was the exact sum of £9,400,000, which was the amount that was wanted.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Where is your surplus?

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, there would be very little difficulty in getting a surplus. In the first place, it might be provided by some other form of taxation; but in truth that would not be needed, for it was the inevitable nature of the Excise and Customs' duties, if left to themselves, to £70,000 increase from other articles. These were the principal elements of elasticity; and what were they going to do with them? The increase which had taken place upon spirits was due, let it be remembered, not to consumption, but to increased taxation. In the year 1849 the quantity which paid duty was 22,962,000 gallons; in 1858 it was 23,686,000. Only 700,000 gallons additional paid duty in the latter year, and yet the revenue was increased by upwards of £3,000,000. This was because the duties in Scotland and Ireland had been raised. In one sense it was through elasticity, because it showed that the improved circumstances of the people enabled them to pay a higher price. For the future, however, it would not be in their power to raise the duty on spirits, because the French Treaty would stand in the way. He did not mean that they had absolutely bound themselves in the Treaty not to do so; but what was likely to be the effect on their relations with France if, after concluding a treaty in which they had consented to a rate on spirits lower than what the Government themselves had wished, they were obliged for purposes of revenue to increase the duty? Of course it was not to be expected that the introduction of cheap French wines over here would lead to an increased consumption of malt and hops, or enable the Government to lay a higher duty on those articles. Therefore, they were really crippling themselves as to malt and spirits, and were giving up paper altogether. He did not think it was right to make such reductions at a critical time like this, and to trust to the elasticity of the revenue to make things square. No doubt, if there was an increased consumption of wine, the revenue would recover; but this cheapening of wine was only an experiment, and one on the success of which it would be some time before they could pronounce. What had been the effect of reducing the duty on tea—an article for which it was not necessary to create a taste as in the case of wine, but which was in large and constant use among all classes of the community? That duty had been gradually lowered from 2s. 1d. per lb. to 1s. 5d., and the result was an increased consumption of tea to a remarkable extent; but yet the revenue in 1851–52, before the reduction, was £5,984,000, and it was now under £5,500,000. The people had no doubt been benefited by the change, but it was clear the revenue had suffered.

It was said that if they stimulated the trade and manufactures of the country the people would grow richer, and more money would flow into the Exchequer in the long run. But if they went on stopping up one after another of the channels which conveyed the wealth of the people into the Exchequer, how would it find its way there? If the plan was a good one, had they not better take off all the Excise and Customs' duties at the same time? It would, on the principle he had referred to, greatly improve the condition of the people. Hon. Gentlemen opposite were constantly pointing to the conduct of Sir Robert Peel as a precedent; but he could not see that that was a case in point. When Sir Robert Peel brought forward his scheme, there were symptoms which showed that the system of indirect taxation had reached its limit; all attempts by Chancellors of the Exchequer to get more money by an increase of Excise and Customs duties had failed; and, as no more could be done in that direction, direct taxation had been resorted to. The unfruitfulness of indirect taxation proved there was something rotten in it; and that it was at that time carried too far. Sir Robert Peel not only saw that they must have recourse to direct taxation, but that their whole system was rotten, that industry was cramped, and that relief must be given. In setting free trade and manufactures he broke up virgin soil—he brought in raw material free of duties, and removed or lightened the taxes on labour. The effect was enormous. It was to be recollected, too, that Sir Robert Peel put on an income tax for a sufficient time to cover the deficiency to be anticipated, for a sufficient period to give his scheme time to work. But in the present instance they were entering not upon an entirely new field, but on one in which a great deal had already been done, and where, though there was still something, there was very little left to be done. And, instead of putting on an income tax to cover the operation of the scheme, the Chancellor of the Exchequer put on only as much as would tide over the year. Then, again, Sir Robert Peel removed restrictions upon materials imported for manufacture. The present Government sought to remove restrictions upon articles of export; and it was not to be expected that the stimulated exportation of coal and iron would lead to as great an increase in the manufacturing prosperity of the country as the changes effected by Sir Robert Peel. These, however, were shire had taken that step, because he believed that the House would desire to abolish the income tax this year. It would have been better that that step should not have been taken, if they could have foreseen what was coming; but it was hard that the fact should be thrown in the teeth of his right hon. Friend. He had endeavoured to state very generally the objections which he entertained to this scheme; and he hoped the Chancellor of the Exchequer would understand him as appreciating the advantages offered; whilst he seriously put it to the Government to consider well within themselves whether they were not exposing the country to serious risks if they left affairs for next year in the serious dilemma which he had endeavoured to describe. He felt that there had not, within the memory of many of them, been so serious a crisis as they might be exposed to next year.

MR. AYRTON said, that the discussion of the previous evening had not been without a good effect on the present debate. It had resulted in the Government adopting a course that did them honour—they had told their opponents to choose their weapons and make their attack, the Government was prepared to make its defence. The great question was now brought on, divested of the difficulties that had hitherto surrounded it. Whether the Treaty deserved the support or censure of the House was now submitted to it in a direct and distinct form. It was no longer competent to hon. Gentlemen on the other side of the House to get rid of the Treaty by a side wind. It must now be regarded and examined as a fact. The House had also to consider a question of deep political interest—the relation the public burdens were to bear to the property of the country. It was not the country at large that was disappointed by the renewal of the income tax, but a class. He would admit that the general policy that dictated the negotiation with France was wise and discreet, and the object sought to be obtained just and legitimate. The general scope of the Budget, too, had deservedly commanded the respect and admiration of the country, and there was no just reason to impugn it on the ground upon which it was attacked to-night. The question, however, remained—on what basis was the taxation of the country to be maintained? He held that the best mode of imposing taxation upon the great body of the people was to select those articles which were not necessary for the maintenance of life, but which were regarded as comforts and luxuries. When they approached the next grade of the community, the manner in which they were taxed resembled a poll-tax or capitation-tax upon the individual consumer. It was necessary to levy a considerable sum in the form of taxation upon property, but the amount was small in comparison with the amount levied upon the necessities and luxuries of the people, such as spirits, beer, wine, &c. In 1802 the expenditure for military purposes was £37,000,000, and the revenue raised from Customs and Excise was £17,000,000, and from stamps and taxes, including the taxes upon property, £13,000,000. This was the apportionment of taxation of Mr. Pitt, the greatest man who ever appeared in the history of this country, and who knew so well how to appeal to the heart of the nation that 500,000 men out of an adult population of 2,000,000 or 3,000,000 were trained to arms in answer to his appeals to the patriotism of the country. If they passed to the era of peace, they found that the expenditure was nearly that of the present year, being £27,000,000 for military purposes. The indirect taxation was then £34,000,000, and the Excise and taxes raised £25,000,000. Looking at these proportions and the relative amount of indirect taxation at a later period under Sir Robert Peel, he thought that the owners of property had no reason to complain of the measures now under discussion as unfair and unjust. The fact was, that the amount of indirect taxation was so disproportionate to the direct taxation of the country that, so far from the Chancellor of the Exchequer being called upon to relieve property from its burdens, it became rather his duty to endeavour to arrive at a more fair adjustment of the charges which pressed upon the public. With respect to the duties which were levied on certain articles of consumption, and which it was proposed to reduce or to abolish, he could only say that they exercised an extremely prohibitory effect so far as those articles were concerned. If any man for instance would take the trouble to consider the result of the present duty on wine, he thought he could hardly fail to come to that conclusion, or to perceive that the trade in that article would be greatly increased by a remission of duty, which would admit of its being generally sold. It had been said, indeed, that it was impossible for France to increase her trade in wine, and it was true that for ten years her annual prowas fraught with inconvenience, and would be injurious to the public interests, and therefore he should vote against it.

MR. HUBBARD said, he would move that the debate be now adjourned.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, he wished to express a hope that the House would come to a decision on the question before it on Thursday night.

VALUATION OF RATEABLE PROPERTY (IRELAND) BILL.—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

MR. BLACKBURN objected that this Bill had been read a second time before it was printed, or in the hands of Members. The object of it was to shift the expenses attending the annual revision of the valuation of rateable property in Ireland from the Irish counties to the Consolidated Fund. He thought that it was too important a measure to pass through Committee under such circumstances, and he should move as an Amendment, that the Bill go into Committee on that day six months.

Amendment proposed,—

MR. LAING said, that the valuation referred to by the Bill, was used for Imperial as well as for other purposes, and it was only fair that the public should bear one moiety of the cost of its annual revision. The amount which the Treasury would have to pay could not exceed £5,000, and it would practically be much less. He hoped therefore the House would go into Committee.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, he would remind the hon. Secretary of the Treasury that when the Bill was about being read a second time in a House of only a few Members, he asked him what it meant, and he was told that it was to provide for a moiety of the expense of the annual revision of the valuation of rateable property being paid out of the Consolidated Fund. Now, he asked the Secretary of the Treasury whether he had told him the truth on that occasion. The Secretary of the Treasury appeared to him to exercise more power than the chief officers of the Government. He found that the Bill went much further—that it threw the whole of the expense upon the Consolidated Fund, with the exception of the comparatively trifling expense attending the preparing and furnishing copies of the lists of valuation to the various treasurers of counties and grand juries.

COLONEL DUNNE said, there was a mistake in the wording of the Bill, which might be corrected so as to meet the objections of the hon. Baronet. The object of the Bill was clearly to lay one moiety of the expenses in question on the Consolidated Fund, and the other on the counties.

MR. LAING said, on the bringing up of the Report of the Committee he should be prepared with an alteration of the wording which would remove the ground of exception taken by the hon. Baronet.

COLONEL GREVILLE said, he hoped the hon. Baronet would withdraw his opposition to the Bill. The sum involved was very small, and he trusted that the objection would not be further urged.

SIR EDWARD GROGAN said, he should support the Bill. The clause in question was certainly very obscure, but he thought the intention of the Government with reference to it was perfectly clear.

Amendment by leave withdrawn.

Main Question put, and agreed to.
House in Committee.

MR. LAING explained that one moiety of the expense of the valuation would be borne by the Government and the other by the grand jury.

MR. BLACKBURN thought that if half the expense of the valuation in Ireland were paid by the Government, the same relief ought to be given as respected Scotland and England.

MR. O'BRIEN said, he could not help observing that if ever there was a measure on which all the Irish Members were agreed, and it was not often the case, it was generally some Scotch Gentleman who interfered in the matter. The hon. Member for Stirlingshire was a member of the late Government, who, when in power, promised everything in favour of the Irish interest.

MR. BLACKBURN said, he had never found Irish Members wanting in unanimity in getting money from the Consolidated Fund. He must repeat that he did not see the justice of the provision in question.

able to tax the remaining one-third. It was the identical principle upon which the opposition to church rates rested, and if the frequent decisions of the House against its justice in the case of church rates were to be maintained, how could they allow it to be applied to other objects of a public nature which, however desirable, were not more praiseworthy than the maintenance of the fabrics in which Divine worship was celebrated? He did not intend to discuss the clauses of the Bill, but simply to insist that the House ought to proceed with some degree of consistency. He did not object to the principle of levying rates by majorities, provided it was carried out without exception. But he was not to be told that church rates ought to be resisted on that ground, and to have the very same evening the second reading of a Bill smuggled through the House which gave effect to that principle. He did not think the argument could fairly be maintained that this measure had nothing to do with religious purposes, and that a different principle might be applicable where a question of conscience was not involved, because, as to church rates, the ground of conscience had, practically, been abandoned. The Dissenters, when invited to accept a conscience clause, which would have exempted them from church rates, declined, and said they objected altogether to the imposition of taxes upon minorities by majorities. There was a great deal to be said in favour of that view. He believed that the voluntary principle would be sufficient for the maintenance of churches, and upon the same grounds he believed that the voluntary principle would be sufficient for the maintenance of parks and places of public amusement. There was a clause in this Bill which disclosed the weakness of the ground upon which the hon. Member for Shrewsbury stood, and it was the one which provided that, previous to any rate being imposed, not less than one-half the cost of the improvement should be subscribed by voluntary offerings. Such a mixture of the voluntary and compulsory system was most objectionable.

Mr. CAVE said, he had no objection to the principle of the majority taxing the minority. On the contrary, he thought it a good one, as it enabled them to catch two classes of persons; first the unreasonable man who could not see any advantage in public improvements, and secondly the selfish man who saw improvements but wanted other people to pay for them. He objected to the Bill, however, because it proposed to give larger powers than mere taxing powers to the majority. It enabled them to say what were improvements. Under this Bill the right hon. Member for Hertford (Mr. Cowper), whose name was on the back of it, might be taxed to pay for those public indicators which so much moved his indignation last Session. Another objection which he had to the Bill was that, as at present drawn, a great deal of injustice might be done by it in cases where a large proportion of the property in a parish was owned by bodies which could not be represented in the vestry. In the parish of St. George's-in-the-East two-thirds of the property was owned by the London Dock Company. They paid their proportion of the rates, but they were advised by their solicitor that they could not appear in vestry; so that, if this Bill were adopted in that parish, it would be adopted, not by two-thirds of the ratepayers of the parish, but by two-thirds of the remaining one-third. If the Bill went into Committee he should propose clauses to remedy such cases of injustice as this.

Mr. RIDLEY observed, that this was one of the class of Bills which required the strict attention of the House. They were founded undoubtedly on philanthropic motives; but under that character there was great danger of injustice being done to individuals. He also observed that there was a clause in the Bill by which ratepayers under £10 might be present and vote at a meeting at which a rate was authorized, and yet be exempted from contributing any portion of the rate themselves. Surely all who voted for the rate ought to be made liable to it. He intended to vote for the Amendment.

Mr. HENLEY said, the machinery of this Bill, if not its principle, required strict examination, because, to increase the powers of levying local rates, which so often gave rise to ill-feelings and heart-burnings amongst parishioners was an operation which ought not to be undertaken without due consideration. Not the slightest intimation was given as to the its object was to diminish the danger incurred by servants and others employed in cleaning windows. His attention had been drawn to the subject by a very serious accident in Brighton. The Bill had been drawn with great care, and similar provisions had been found to work very well in Scotland.

SIR FRANCIS GOLDSMID said, that several of the clauses were likely to cause great inconvenience. By one of the clauses a penalty of 40s., or imprisonment for fourteen days, was proposed to be inflicted on any master who permitted any one in his employment, not being a tradesman, to “stand, sit, or kneel” on the outside of his window, or to be on the outside of any window for the purpose of repairing or painting anything growing thereon, except such window was on the basement or sunk story. It was quite clear that the Bill required to be amended, for if it passed in its present shape a person would be liable to imprisonment for sitting on the sill of a window with his legs inside; or a man could be fined or imprisoned for permitting his gardener to trim flowers growing outside a window on a ground floor. He would suggest the hon. Baronet should be prepared with clauses to meet these cases before the Committee came on.

MR. EDWIN JAMES said, that as the representative of some thousands of house-maids he must express his opinion that some of the provisions of the Bill were the most preposterous he had ever heard of, which it would be a waste of time to pass. For instance, it provided that anybody who permitted his servant to get outside a window-sill to clean or paint anything affixed to or growing to the house should be liable to a fine or imprisonment. What that could mean he could not understand, though, certainly, in walking through the streets of Marylebone he had often noticed on the window-sills dingy geraniums, which would be all the better for a touch of paint to give a tinge of verdure to them. If the Bill passed, any gentleman who might direct his servant to get on to the window-sill and stuff up a pane of glass which might chance to have got broken during the night, might be hauled up before the magistrate, and imprisoned for fourteen days.

MR. PACKE said, he wished to point out that it was already the law in the metropolis that any person who ordered his servant to stand on a window, to the obstruction or danger of the passers by, was liable to a penalty or imprisonment. If, however, only the person himself was exposed to danger there was no penalty enacted, and it was to meet this defect and to extend the protection of the present law to servants and others who were employed on such duties that the Bill was mainly intended.

SIR GEORGE PECHELL said, he should be sorry to see any Bill brought in by the hon. Baronet who had been so long a Member of this House rejected in so summary a manner, and he hoped, therefore, that it would be allowed to pass a second reading.

MR. H. BERKELEY said, he hoped the House would not. It was one of the most vexatious and foolish Bills he had ever heard of, and would cause all sorts of quarrels between neighbours.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, the argument that the law already forbade occupiers to allow their servants to stand on window-sills to the danger of the passers-by was really against the second reading and not in favour of it. He was not aware how the hon. Baronet got his windows cleaned in the country, but if this Bill passed it would prevent any persons in the country, where professional window-cleaners were not easily got, sending his servant up a ladder, as was generally done, to clean the outside of a window. The Bill was open to many objections, and was scarcely one which the House would be disposed to sanction.

SIR CHARLES BURRELL said, he believed the Bill was a just one, and founded on humane principles, and that to reject it would be to do a great injury to society. Since he first brought in the Bill, no less than three persons had been killed from window-cleaning. If there were objections to the details of the measure, they might be met in Committee. The Bill had been drawn up with great care by one of the solicitors to the House, and he could not take on himself the responsibility of withdrawing it.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, that he wished the opinion of the House on the measure, and he should therefore move that it be read that day six months. He gave every credit to the hon. Baronet (Sir C. Burrell) for his humane intentions, but his Bill altered entirely the character of the present enactments on this subject.

set off against a petition presented on the other side. This monstrous system was resorted to alike by the agents of both political parties, but it was unknown in any other tribunal or court in the kingdom. At the last general election eighty petitions were presented against hon. Members for bribery and treating; but of these not more than thirty, perhaps, would be brought before the Committee on Elections. The object of many of these was to intimidate Members into giving up their seats, or to induce them to prevail on some other Members to give up theirs. It was constantly the case that when a petition was presented against the Member for a borough in the south, a cross-petition was presented against some Member for a borough in the north. This was a disgraceful abuse of the system of petitioning, and not only put Members to great and unnecessary expense, but was calculated seriously to injure the character of the House.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS remarked, that there was a difficulty in the trial of election petitions that did not affect actions in a court of law; there was a public as well as a private question involved in the trial of election proceedings. The right in litigation before the Election Committee was, in some respects, a public right; but the petition was carried on at the expense of a private individual, and the contest was also one of private right. It was, therefore, impossible to put the petitioner, or a Member defending his seat, exactly on the footing of a person defending a public right. If a Member was defending his seat, and making a determined fight against, perhaps, a wealthy opponent, it was unreasonable to saddle him at the same time with a public duty without the assistance of the public purse, and treat him as a champion of public purity and a guardian of the public against corruption at elections. It was the conflict between these two principles that produced the anomaly pointed out by the hon. and learned Member. It often happened that when the public interest required the petition to be proceeded with, and the corruption at the election to be probed and laid bare, the private interest of the party induced him to decline the contest, withdraw from it, and let the matter pass without investigation. He did not know whether it was possible altogether to reconcile entirely those two interests. It was a difficulty inherent in the question, and it was impossible to prevent an occasional failure of justice. The proceedings on a petition must be carried on by private funds; consequently, the House had no right to inquire into the private reasons for which a petition might be withdrawn. He should offer no objections to the second reading of the Bill, and, as the Select Committee appointed to inquire into the Corrupt Practices Bill must examine the mode of trying election petitions, the Bill might be referred to it with a view to see what remedy could be devised. It was impossible to dissociate the question of bribery from the question of the mode of trying petitions; the remedy to be obtained against corrupt practices depended essentially on the nature of the tribunal that tried the petitions charging them. He thought that the tribunal by which election petitions were tried admitted of improvement. He was a Member of the Select Committee, and he should be ready to place before it some material proposals in reference to the present system of trying petitions. He had no doubt an improvement of the tribunal would tend to check the abuses against which it was directed. He thought the House should agree to the Second Reading of the Bill, and then refer it to the Select Committee.

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, he entirely concurred with the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman. The distinction he had drawn between the trial of an election petition and a trial in a court of law was perfectly correct. He hoped the Select Committee would be able, in its Report, to propose some remedy for the defects of the present mode of proceeding. It was impossible not to see that election petitions, besides raising a question between the petitioner and the sitting Member as to the right to the seat, frequently involved a question in which the public had a direct and deep interest, and an interest, perhaps, directly opposed to that of the two parties. To impose on individuals the duty of prosecuting in all cases in which the public interest required it, would be a species of tyranny. He hoped the Select Committee would consider whether it might not be possible to adopt some means of prosecuting charges of bribery under the order of the House. He should support the second reading, and the reference of the Bill to the Committee.

MR. MELLOR said, the object which he had in view in introducing the Bill was simply to prevent the recurrence of an ad-

nished by the fact that petitions were brought before the House upon insufficient grounds, and frequently without any intention on the part of their promoters to proceed with them. Sham petitions were from time to time brought forward, and somebody found himself, as the result, seated in that House, while somebody else discovered that he was unseated, nobody knew how. Now, that was an evil which, in his opinion, required a remedy. It was, he believed, attended by a good deal of corruption, and, entertaining that view, he should give his cordial support to the second reading of the Bill. He might add that he concurred with the right hon. Baronet opposite (Sir G. Grey) that it was desirable to prevent the trial of petitions as far as possible from being mixed up with the proceedings of the House.

MR. E. P. BOUVERIE maintained that it was undesirable on general grounds to add to the labours which the Committee on the Corrupt Practices Act had already undertaken to discharge. At the same time he was of opinion that the best course to pursue with respect to the Bill under discussion was to take further time to consider whether it should be referred to that Committee or to another.

MR. STEUART said, he differed from the right hon. Gentleman who had just addressed the House, as he thought that the Committee on Corrupt Practices ought not to be charged with the further duty of inquiring into the question involved in the present measure.

MR. HUNT said, he would suggest that on the presentation of a petition some preliminary investigation as to whether a petition was or was not based upon frivolous grounds should be instituted. He would also recommend that the petitioner, before his petition was referred to the General Committee of Elections, be required to make out a prima facie case against the sitting Member. It would be very easy for him to lodge affidavits with his petition, and it might be referred to a sub-committee to report whether such affidavits showed a prima facie case, and if they did, the inquiry should not be conducted at the expense of the petitioner, but the matter should be taken up by the House; and if bribery and corruption to a great extent were proved to have existed in the particular borough to the return for which the petition related, a rate should be levied on the inhabitants of that borough to defray the expenses of prosecuting the petition.

Motion made and Question proposed, "That the Bill be committed to a Select Committee."

MR. EDWIN JAMES said, he would now move that the Bill be referred to a Select Committee.

MR. VANCE observed that the whole of the proceedings were directed against the successful candidate, whereas there was often quite as much bribery upon the part of the unsuccessful candidate. He quite agreed that when there was any charge of bribery and corruption the investigation should be on the spot, and that the costs of the inquiry should be paid by the corrupt borough. That suggestion was worthy of great consideration by the Committee to which the Bill was to be referred.

MR. E. P. BOUVERIE suggested that, as the Committee on the Corrupt Practices Act was to meet to-morrow, it would be desirable that they should have an opportunity of considering whether they could deal with the question raised by the Bill under discussion, as well as with the other important subject which they had been appointed to investigate. Being of that opinion, he should move the adjournment of the debate.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he adhered to the view which he had already expressed, that to refer the Bill to the existing Committee instead of appointing another was the preferable course to pursue. He had arrived at that conclusion, because it was extremely difficult to find a duplicate Committee consisting of some fifteen or sixteen Members to inquire with due efficiency into cognate subjects, and because he thought it better that two questions intimately connected should be dealt with by one body, whose recommendations would be likely to be founded on the same principle, than by two distinct bodies, who might arrive at their conclusions on each of those questions upon principles entirely different.

House adjourned at Ten minutes before Six o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Thursday, February 23, 1860.

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILLS.—1st Consolidated Fund (£407,649); Offences against the Person; Lar-

Criminal Court district comprised the City of London, the county of Middlesex, and portions of the counties of Kent, Essex, and Surrey, including the borough of Southwark. By Act of Parliament Her Majesty in Council was entitled to assign as the metropolitan police district any portion of the Central Criminal Court district (with the exception of the City of London), and any place within fifteen miles of Charing-cross. The effect was that there were various portions of the counties he had named which were within the jurisdiction of the Central Criminal Court, but over which no police districts had been established; and the difficulty he had in framing this measure arose out of the fact that the City of London and portions of those counties were entirely out of the metropolitan police district. His noble and learned Friend (the Lord Chancellor) had expressed some misgivings as to intrusting to the Lord Mayor or to a single Alderman of London functions superseding those of the grand jury. Now he had given his noble and learned Friend's objection the best consideration; but he could see no way of obviating it short of leaving the City of London entirely out of the Bill, which would have the effect of defeating its object. He would submit to their Lordships that the City police courts, like the other police courts of the metropolis, were open to the public, and there was no reason to complain of the mode in which justice was administered in them. They would in every respect bear comparison with the other police courts—indeed if the ratio of acquittals to committals was taken as the test it would be found to tell rather against the police magistrates than the civic magistrates—and this probably arose from the fact that the Aldermen had the valuable assistance of clerks learned in the law, who prevented any mistakes being committed. The Legislature had certainly shown no disposition to disparage the City police courts; for in 1848 an Act was passed which gave to the Lord Mayor or to any single Alderman, sitting in public court, the same power and authority which could be exercised by any two magistrates sitting in petty sessions. They had, therefore, not only the power of committing persons for trial, but of exercising individually the power of summary conviction. His noble and learned Friend (the Lord Chancellor) said nice questions of law might arise in cases of this description; but he (Lord Chelmsford) ventured to submit that in ninety-nine instances out of a hundred no such case would arise. Nice questions of law might arise in cases of summary conviction, and yet the Legislature had intrusted the Lord Mayor and the City magistrates with the power of summary conviction. It was quite impossible that he could proceed with the Bill if their Lordships should be of opinion that any distinction should be made between the City magistrates and the other police magistrates of the metropolis. With regard to the outlying districts it would be in the power of his noble and learned Friend (the Lord Chancellor), in case he disapproved of the working of the Bill, to advise Her Majesty to annex them to police courts. There was only one other objection to the Bill, namely, that it would cause persons to be put on their trial at the discretion of a single person for offences that left an indelible stigma on those who were accused of them. Now if the accused were guilty, that objection would of course have no place; and he should imagine there was no innocent man who would not infinitely prefer an acquittal after a public trial than to have the bill against him ignored, because if the latter took place there would always remain a suspicion that it had been brought about by some underhand contrivance to evade justice. The principle of the Bill had been recognized by their Lordships twice, and also by the other House of Parliament. It was a Bill which had met with almost universal approbation both in and out of Parliament, and he trusted there would be no objection interposed to prevent their Lordships' adoption of a measure which he believed would introduce a very great improvement into the administration of criminal justice within the metropolitan district.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he was still unconvinced of the propriety of empowering the City magistrates to send for trial without the intervention of a grand jury. He thought, moreover, there was an advantage in the grand jury system, for it was obviously a good thing that persons of all classes should be periodically brought together to administer justice. At the same time, it was a very serious thing to put a man in the felon's dock and cause him to undergo a solemn trial—it was a thing that ought never to be done lightly—but where the magistrate was a trained lawyer he should be content to leave in his hands the discretion of committing or not

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Thursday, February 23, 1860.

MESSENGERS OF THE CUSTOMS AND EXCISE DEPARTMENTS.

QUESTION.

MR. ASTELL said, he would beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether there is any sufficient reason why the Messengers at Her Majesty's Customs-house receive a lower rate of salary than the Messengers at Somerset House and other Public Offices where similar duties are performed; and whether their case cannot be taken into consideration, with a view to a re-classification of the same, by an additional grant for the purpose of £275 per annum?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, I am not aware of any reason whatever for altering the salaries received by the Messengers of Her Majesty's Customs-house. I believe there is no difficulty in finding an adequate supply of persons able and willing to do the work at the present salaries, and if I should hear of any such difficulty from the Secretary to the Treasury, I have no doubt I could find him a considerable number of persons who would be very glad to be provided with such situations. As I find from the terms of the question of the hon. Member that the Messengers employed at Somerset House are paid at a higher rate than those employed at the Customs-house, I shall certainly make it my business to inquire of the Chairman of the Board of Inland Revenue whether there is any reason why the Somerset House Messengers should not have their salaries reduced so as to equalize the two.

SUPERINTENDENTS OF POLICE.

QUESTION.

MR. BOWYER said, he wished to ask, Whether Superintendents and Inspectors of the Metropolitan Police are subjected to any, and what, examination previous to their appointment?

MR. CLIVE said, that the Superintendents of Police were not subjected to any examination whatever, and that they received their appointments from the Commissioners.

DRAWBACK ON FOREIGN WINES.

QUESTION.

MR. WOODE said, he would beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether, in the event of a further reduction in the Duty on Wines taking place in April, 1861, the drawback be allowed on Portugal and French Red Wines in stock at that date, pursuant to the terms of the Excise Orders of July 11, 1843, and July 20, 1852, and the Excise Letter of July 24, 1843?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I am, Sir, sorry that I had no opportunity on the evening of the financial statement of entering as much as I could have wished into detail on the important subject of the drawback on foreign wines as well for the information of the House as of the parties interested. As the matter stands, I have no choice but to put off the explanation of the general views of the Government until we come to discuss the duty on wines in the Resolution. But I have no hesitation in stating that the Government have no intention of proposing that any drawback shall be granted upon wine, except to the extent I have already announced, namely, the extent of the difference between the present duty and the duty of 3s., which we are about to propose, and that that concession will be limited to the parties who have complied with the conditions laid down in the Treasury Minute of 1843.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, he wished to ask, Whether the right hon. Gentleman recognized the Excise Letter of July 24, 1843, as investing any parties with any rights or claims?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he could not recognize that Letter, on the plain and simple ground that it was revoked and cancelled eight years ago, and had no reference, therefore, to any transaction which had taken place since.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, he wished to ask what would be the condition of those provincial wine merchants who

BILLETING—WINE AND BEER LICENCES. QUESTION.

MR. WYLD said, he would beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether in the event of the keepers of eating-houses and refreshment rooms receiving licences for the sale of Wine and Beer by retail, any measure to be introduced for that purpose will render them liable to have soldiers billeted upon them, as licensed victuallers now are?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, If my hon. Friend will permit me, I would rather lay on the table at once all the regulations which Her Majesty's Government may think fit to propose for the adoption of the House with regard to the conditions under which any licences for the sale of wine may hereafter be granted to the keepers of eating-houses. It would be inconvenient if I were to enter partially into that question. I have, however, no difficulty in answering my hon. Friend on one point, because it tends to narrow the field of discussion, and the field of any difference of opinion which may prevail, that is, by saying that Her Majesty's Government have no intention of making any proposal to the House on the subject of licences for the sale of beer. They think that that matter is so far provided for by the existing law, and is so mixed up with the conflict of interests between the beerhouse keepers and the licensed victuallers, that it had better stand over till the whole question with regard to licences can be dealt with. The proposal of the Government, therefore, will not have reference to the sale of beer, but only to that of wine.

ANNEXATION OF SAVOY TO FRANCE. QUESTION.

MR. KINGLAKE said, he wished to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs on what day the Papers completing the Papers called "Guarantee Treaties," which were moved for on Thursday last, and which are required for the purpose of the discussion respecting Savoy and Nice, now fixed for Tuesday next, will be laid upon the Table?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, he found upon inquiry that all the Treaties which were properly Treaties of Guarantee had been already laid before the House; but it was supposed that the hon. Gentleman was alluding to two Treaties—one of November 20, 1815, being a definitive Treaty between Austria, Great Britain, Prussia, France, and Russia, which laid down various provisions in respect of the boundary of the different States; and another being a subsequent Treaty between the same Powers of the same date. These Papers were laid before the House at the time, and were to be found in the 3rd. volume of the State Papers, to which no Gentleman could have any difficulty in referring; but, for the convenience of the hon. Member, they would be laid upon the table either to-morrow or Monday.

SALMON FISHINGS (SCOTLAND). QUESTION.

MR. STEUART said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Treasury what measures are contemplated in consequence of a recent decision in the House of Lords, affirming the right of the Crown to Salmon Fishings along the coasts of Scotland; and whether, if such rights are to be used by the Crown, an estimate has been formed of the additional revenue which will be gained?

MR. LAING replied, that in consequence of the decision referred to by the hon. Gentleman a Circular had been issued by the Commissioners of Woods and Forests calling the attention of the proprietors of certain fishings to it, and proposing that they should recognize the right of the Crown. The Returns to the Circular were by no means complete, and it was consequently impossible at present to form any estimate of the amount of revenue which might be derived from that source. As soon as sufficient evidence had been received to warrant ulterior proceedings, measures would at once be taken to render available for the use of the Crown the revenue which legitimately belonged to it.

CAVALRY COMMISSIONS. QUESTION.

SIR HENRY TRACEY said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for War if it be the intention of the Government to equalize the prices of the Commissions of Officers of Cavalry and Infantry of the Line; whether Cavalry Officers, having paid a larger sum as the price of their Commissions, and receiving only the same pay as Infantry Officers, will, on selling, receive the difference from the War Office; and whether, on not wishing to sell, they will receive pay in proportion to that extra outlay?

MR. NOEL said, before the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War gave his reply, he wished to know whether any decision has been come to on the question of stoppages and of forage for Cavalry Officers' horses, which he has been repeatedly told was under the consideration of the Government?

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT, in reply, said, with regard to the question which had been last addressed to him, he could state that the subject had been under the consideration of the Government for a considerable time—it was a matter which had been discussed between the Officers and the Government with—he would state frankly—very little prospect of a satisfactory result. It was the intention of the Government, however, to lower the price of Cavalry Commissions to the same rate as those in Infantry Regiments; but it did not follow, as the hon. Gentleman seemed to imagine, that any reduction would take place in the pay. If a Cavalry Officer sold his commission, he would receive from the War Office the difference between the former and the reduced price; and if he remained in the service, he would continue in receipt of pay higher than in the Infantry Regiments.

DRAWBACK ON BRITISH WINES.

QUESTION.

MR. T. DUNCOMBE said, he rose to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer if he has as yet made up his mind as to allowing a drawback on the amount of Duty paid in the manufacture of British Wines?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he had found little difficulty in making up his mind on this subject. Certainly he was not prepared to propose the allowance of any drawback on the amount of duty paid in the manufacture of British wines. He thought there were most conclusive reasons against any such measure.

INCOME TAX.—QUESTION.

MR. H. B. SHERIDAN said, he would beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether the Income Tax proposed by him in his Budget, is intended to be levied on the same plan as that at present in force, and, therefore, not upon incomes of less than £100 per annum.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, the intention is that the Income Tax shall be levied exactly as at present with regard to the amount of the income on which it is paid. The exemptions under £150 will be specified in the Bill, founded on the Resolutions of the Committee. The hon. Member had been very naturally misled by the form in which the Financial Resolutions were drawn; in all cases the Financial Resolutions in reference to an income tax have been drawn without the exemptions, which are subsequently introduced in the Act itself.

POOR RATES (ST. PANCRAS.)

QUESTION.

MR. JOHN LOCKE (in the absence of Mr. E. James) said, he would beg to ask the President of the Poor Law Board, Whether any, and if any, what decision has been come to by the Poor Law Board upon the question of the surcharges made by the Auditor of the parish of St. Pancras against the Collectors who acted in obedience to the orders of the Directors, and with the sanction of the Vestry?

MR. VILLIERS said, the explanation and decision of the Poor Law Board on the subject would be forwarded to the Directors before their next meeting.

CORRUPT PRACTICES PREVENTION ACT. (1854) &c.

COMMITTEE—ADJOURNMENT.

MR. T. DUNCOMBE moved that the Select Committee on the Corrupt Practices Prevention Bill (1854) do consist of sixteen Members, and that Mr. H. Berkeley be added to the Committee.

MR. E. P. BOUVERIE doubted whether the practice of adding to the number of a Select Committee, after it had been named, was desirable. The number of Members who could be required to serve on Committee was not too large. He objected to the nomination from no disrespect to the hon. Member for Bristol, who had done so much to promote reform in the electoral system.

Motion negatived.

MR. H. BERKELEY said, that in order to entitle himself to speak, he would move the adjournment of the House. As far as he was personally concerned he should certainly have asked the hon. Member for Finsbury not to press his Motion to a division on the Committee. Whether he was named on the Committee or not, his hon. Friend had done some service by suggesting that every section of Reformers should be represented on the Committee. He had been twenty-one years in the House, and during that time had taken an active part in endeavouring to repress various kinds of corruption in the electoral system; and he therefore felt he had some claim to be placed on the Committee. His hon. Friend had, therefore, some reason for proposing the Motion, though he (Mr. Berkeley) did not wish him to press it.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House do now adjourn."

MR. T. DUNCOMBE said, he had not anticipated that there would have been any objection to the Motion. The House had already appointed a Committee, and why should they object to name another Member for it? Out of the fifteen Members of the Committee thirteen were lawyers. He did not mean to say that lawyers were not as well qualified as other Members to inquire into Corrupt Practices at Elections. There were, however, other Members as well acquainted with such practices, and as well entitled to be on the Committee. If those thirteen lawyers would not make confusion worse confounded, he should be surprised. The House had decided that the hon. Member for Bristol should not be one of the Committee, although it was well known that he had a certain specific for corrupt practices, which he believed would be more efficacious than any which the lawyers were entitled to suggest. He believed that the refusal of the House to put the hon. Member for Bristol on the Committee, would occasion much disappointment to the public.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

ADJOURNED DEBATE. SECOND NIGHT.

Order read for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [21st February],—

"That this House, recognising the necessity of providing for the increased expenditure of the coming financial year, is of opinion that it is not expedient to add to the existing deficiency by diminishing the ordinary revenue, and is not prepared to disappoint the just expectations of the

MR. HUBBARD said, it had always appeared to him that the commercial policy adopted by this country should stand in one of two categories—either that the change proposed should be so obviously beneficial as to command adoption for our own interests; or if there were to be a Treaty, the concessions we made should find their counterpart and equivalent in engagements and concessions made by the other contracting party. Now if hon. Members carefully examined this French Treaty according to the first proposition, what were the features of it? They would find that on the part of England there were to be immediate reductions to the extent of one-half the duties upon two of the most important articles—wine and brandy—which were imported into this country from France, and there was to be an entire abolition of the duty upon several articles of minor importance. With the concessions thus made he was not disposed to quarrel in the abstract, nor in the event of our being able to make them as the result of superfluous revenue, or when the deficiency to which they would give rise could be supplied by the imposition of taxes as little onerous or as little inconvenient to the community as those which it was intended to remit. Now neither he nor any one could think that those remissions could be justified on the ground of our having a surplus revenue; while, when he came to the consideration of the taxes by which the proposed remissions were to be replaced, he failed to perceive that the substitutes submitted to the sanction of the House were in any way less objectionable than those from which we were to be relieved. He would, in the first place, with the permission of hon. Members, briefly call their attention to the consideration of the Treaty with France with reference to the question of equivalents. The concessions which it was proposed to make on the part of England might, no doubt, lead to a considerable increase of trade between the two countries, so far, at all events, as wine, brandy, and silks were concerned; but when we came to take into account the equivalent concessions which France engaged to make, he found that they consisted in replacing positive prohibitions by virtual prohibitions. Certain duties were specified, indeed, but the duties, in the first instance, amounted to 30 per cent on the principal articles of our manufacture. He was, of course, aware that that 30 per cent was, after the lapse of a certain time, to be reduced to 25; but when, he would ask, was that concession to come into operation? Not, he found, until October, 1864. So that while the concessions which we engaged to make to France were to take immediate effect, the remissions which France was to make to us were only promises to take effect four years hence. Now without at all questioning the good faith of the Government of France, he must say that the promissory note at four years' date of any Ruler of so impulsive a people as the French was not what would be called in the City a discountable security. When he said that France made no immediate concessions, he had forgotten that concession which we had obtained by the 11th Article of the Treaty. That Article appeared to him when he had first read it to be a mistake of print. That Article recited that the two contracting Powers bound themselves to levy no duty on the export of coals; but it seemed simply ridiculous that France should engage to levy no duty on the export of coal, inasmuch as she had no coal to export; and therefore an engagement on the part of France of that kind was mere surplusage. But the matter was very different to us, for we had coal and did export it. We undertook not only not to prohibit the export of coal, but we engaged not to levy a duty upon the export of coal. Now he took that to be a most objectionable engagement. He wished to know upon what policy or upon what commercial principle the Government had undertaken never to levy an export duty upon coal. The subject was one to which the noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs a few days ago alluded, and in doing so he observed that a tax of 2s. a ton on the export of coal had been at one time imposed by Sir Robert Peel, but that that statesman had subsequently deemed it expedient to relinquish the charge in consequence of the discontent the impost had occasioned. But why, he would ask, had it been so relinquished by Sir Robert Peel? Simply because it gave dissatisfaction to the coalowners, who had an interest in the export of coal. He (Mr. Hubbard) should, however, confidently appeal to the House to say whether the interests of a particular class should be allowed to operate, so as to prevent the Government from raising a not unimportant amount of revenue in a most legitimate manner. The noble Lord further proceeded to contend that, to impose a tax upon exports was opposed to the general policy of the country; but he (Mr. Hubbard) regretted to hear that stated, inasmuch as he was of opinion that a portion of the taxes of the State might very advantageously and very legitimately be raised in that manner. It was, however, he admitted, the fact that an export duty would be practicable in the case of comparatively few countries. Such exceptional facilities however did exist—the sulphur mines peculiar to the Two Sicilies enabled that country to tax the export of sulphur; the boundless plains of Russia, fertile in the production of grain, of cattle, and of sheep, justified her in raising a revenue by a duty on the export of grain, hides, and tallow. But how did England stand in that respect? She had been blessed by Providence with invaluable mines of coal, in which article no other country could compete with her, and which, he contended, were not only a great source of wealth to her own people, but which might very properly be made the subject on which to raise portions of the revenue of the country. Our export of coal was 6,000,000 tons, of which France took 1,250,000. It was very well for France to say to England, "Don't you levy an export duty on coal, and we promise to do the same;" but how any one could accept that as a fair bargain he could not understand. There was one part of the correspondence relating to the French Treaty which required some notice. It was a part of Lord John Russell's letter addressed to Lord Cowley and Mr. Cobden, which he would now read:—

"Adverting to the distinct nature and very much higher market value of French brandy, and more especially to the interests of the Exchequer, the Queen's Government consider 10s. per gallon to be the proper duty. If, nevertheless, you should find that by making a concession, even beyond what I have named, you can obtain from the Government of the Emperor satisfactory arrangements for early reduction of duty upon some important commodities, you are authorized to engage for the reduction of the duty on brandy to the same rate as that on British spirits brought from the Colonies—namely, 8s. 2d. per gallon."

He should be glad to learn at the proper time what were the important concessions in the reduction of duties we had received from France in consideration of the reduction of the duty on French brandy from 10s. per gallon—stated by Lord John Russell to be the proper duty—to 8s. 2d. per gallon. The concessions made on the other side were no equivalent whatever for what we gave up on this side of the water. Passing from the consideration of the concessions on either side as equivalents—he wished dispassionately to consider what the concessions made by France were really worth in themselves. The extreme concession made by France was the imposition of a duty of 25 per cent at four years' date. It was a perfect mockery. If it was not itself prohibitory, he was very much mistaken. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had told them as much in his exposition of the Budget. He said that in 1841 linens were exported to France, but that the raising of the rate of duty in 1842 to a much higher rate, completely extinguished the trade. If 20 or 27 per cent extinguished the trade then, it would not revive it now. But they were told they should consider this Treaty as a step to more enlightened legislation on the other side of the water. He (Mr. Hubbard) was glad to hear of that prospect. That eminent liberator of trade, Mr. Cobden, it was said, should have the glory of bringing the French Emperor and nation to substitute for prohibition what, although it might be a virtual prohibition in terms, still held out some hope for the future. In that saying, however, was said all that could be said in favour of the Treaty. He certainly congratulated Mr. Cobden on the progress his Imperial pupil had made; and he congratulated his Imperial pupil on his progress; but he could not congratulate the English people on the result, which imposed on them an additional 2d. in the pound of income tax as the price of a lesson in political economy given by Mr. Cobden to the Emperor of the French. Could that eminent individual have been prevailed to lay down a large portion of his immense armament—one-third—and we had done the same, sweeping off £10,000,000 from our Estimates, and so relieved ourselves from the necessity of paying a sevenpenny, not to say a tenpenny income tax—that would, indeed, have been a gain to the country, and a triumph to Mr. Cobden. He should now turn from the remissions of duty specially connected with the trade of France, and come to those which, ex proprio motu, the Chancellor of the Exchequer had made on this side of the water. Many of those were very excellent in themselves, and some of them would contribute to the production of cheap plum-puddings. The duty was reduced on butter, eggs, nutmegs, raisins and currants, and also on timber, in respect of which the reduction was an important one. The Government reduce duties approaching £2,000,000 in virtue of the French Treaty: remove another £2,000,000 professedly in favour of English commerce; add these remissions to the previous deficiency, and then of necessity have new and weighty impositions to propose. The countervailing impositions, if the object were to challenge opposition, were, he admitted, most ingeniously contrived. He would first take the contract stamps. The House had never had a perfect explanation of what those were; but he took the proposal to be this—that every document which recorded a bargain between two parties, whether issued to them from an official broker, or resulting from the direct negotiation of two individuals, must be subject to this taxation. Did the right hon. Gentleman see how wide was the field over which this new taxation would extend? Take the case of mere brokers. The broker had a book in which he entered every sale he made; he then sent each of the two parties for whom he acted a copy of his entry: was each of those copies to be taxed? If so, it was not one document, but two, which were to be taxed in each transaction, and the tax was not to be a penny, but a twopenny one. Then there were contracts made daily by letter between persons engaged in trade. Take the case of two parties living in different places—say Hull and London. The merchant in Hull wrote to his correspondent in London, saying that he would give a certain price for certain goods. The merchant in London wrote to say he would accept the offer. Those two letters, in law, constituted a contract. Were both to be taxed? If not taxed, what was the consequence? Some penalty, more or less grave, must attach to the neglect or accidental disuse of these penny stamps. Take, again, the case of a commercial traveller, who made a sale to a country shopkeeper, and entered a memorandum of that sale in his book. Was there to be a penny stamp plastered on to every such memorandum? Let them again consider the mode in which business is done at Manchester. The agent arranges transactions verbally between principals, no notes are passed, but an entry is made in his own book. Was that register of a bargain to be subject to a stamp? Take the case of Exchange brokers; their operations were of the most rapid and informal character.

At 'Change time you saw them running from one merchant to another, uttering a few hurried words, and distributing small slips of paper marked by a few strokes of a pencil. Those slips were contracts for the negotiation of bills of exchange, the medium by which thousands and tens of thousands were being paid by one country to another. Were these slips to be stamped? Were the House to be called upon to check this vigour of trade, this life-like proceeding, by the imposition of the paltry tax of a penny? He could scarcely keep his patience at such a proposition. He confessed, as a merchant, he did not know whether he should not have to get all his letter-paper stamped, for he could not tell what might not be called a contract under the new law. It appeared to him that while in one respect they were taking the duty off paper they were putting it on in another form, and in one that must necessarily have a most disastrous effect on commerce. The proposed stamp on contracts would not only give rise to annoyance and litigation, but to much pecuniary loss, for if one of those contracts was produced in a court of law it would be valueless unless it bore a stamp. Under the proposed system a merchant of the highest repute might be ruined by the accidental omission of a penny stamp on the contract. An essential characteristic of the present day was the respect paid to the saving of time, as indicated by the millions spent in railways and electric telegraphs. Why, then, waste the time of the traders of the country by these petty impositions? It was not the amount but the time lost by this penny stamp that made him so hostile to it. Traders would not care about paying the penny in some other form; but they objected to have their business impeded and their risks increased by so vexatious and annoying a tax as a contract stamp. It would raise only £100,000, and for the sake of such a sum it was not necessary to harass the operations of trade throughout the length and breadth of the land. He came next to the proposed tax on dock warrants. Would this impost apply to delivery orders as well as to dock warrants?—because the two documents ran very much together. If it did, it would work in a very oppressive manner. When a ship arrived the merchant in the first instance made out a delivery order for the whole cargo. That order was lodged; and then warrants were taken out for either the whole or certain portions of the goods, as was most convenient. If this tax was imposed then, and then only—if it extended only to the first Act by which property of great value came into the possession of the importer, there would be some limit to it. But that was not the case. These delivery orders or primary warrants having been lodged, subsidiary warrants were taken out; and the process of subdivision went on until it resulted very frequently in a separate warrant for every individual package. Thus by this multiplication of warrants the tax would go on multiplying itself as the goods diminished in value, until its pressure became very aggravated. An impost of 3*d.*, in the first instance, on a cargo of any commodity would be nothing; but when it came to be repeated on every small box or chest, it would prove very oppressive indeed. The tax, therefore, was one which, in the interests of trade, it was not expedient to establish. It was next proposed to levy a tax on the operations carried on in the bonded warehouses. Those operations were performed by the servants of the various dock companies, who, of course, made a charge upon their customers. But the Chancellor of the Exchequer now wished to make a charge for the services of the Customs' officer, who did nothing but look on while the work was being done. This tax would be most onerous in regard to some commodities; and as it was not regulated according to value, in certain cases it would absolutely absorb the entire margin of profit. Here again, therefore, he must suggest that the impost was not one that it was desirable to create. But a special charge of 1*s.* a package was also placed on removals from the bonded warehouses by the right hon. Gentleman's Budget. Thus, on a single chest of tea 1*s.* 4*d.* altogether would be charged for the services of the Customs' officers in looking on, and for the removal. This removal charge, he humbly submitted, was one that ought not to be levied at all, the Customs' authorities not rendering any real assistance in the operation. The proposed registration fee of 1*d.* on every package was equally objectionable. Any uniform charge of that kind would be utterly destructive of the importation of a great many small packages. It was no doubt most desirable that correct statistical information on the subject of our exports and imports should be obtained; but the object was one of public utility, and why should the merchant alone be called upon to pay for it? The Custom-house had already the machinery for ascertaining the value of everything that we imported and exported; and the collection of such statistics was for the advantage of the community in general,—not for the individual benefit of the merchant. There was not, therefore, a sufficient reason for the creation of a new impost for the purposes of registration. He now approached one of the most important parts of the Budget. It was to the income tax that the right hon. Gentleman looked for the principal means of filling up the chasm which his own remission of duties would create. No less than 3*d.* in the pound was to be added to the original income tax proposed by Sir Robert Peel, or 5*d.* more than the rate at which it would have stood but for this change in the right hon. Gentleman's policy. The Chancellor of the Exchequer said he wished to make his contemplated reductions of duty out of deference to the expectations of the public that the year 1860 would be an era marked by the relief it would afford the country from the pressure of its heavy fiscal burdens. The springs of industry were to be sensibly lightened. Very true; but what promise had been more distinctly held out to the people, or more cordially accepted by them—of what pledge had the fulfilment been more strongly insisted upon by the right hon. Gentleman himself—than that given for the total abolition of the income tax in 1860? If any promise was to be kept, let it be the chief promise. Let the Government keep that promise but for which they would never have had the income tax which now existed. The right hon. Gentleman had acknowledged the willingness with which the people bore their burdens. Indeed, he had said they might almost be accused—not of an ignorant “impatience,” but rather of an ignorant “patience” of taxation. But why had they displayed such a temper? Why had they so patiently borne the income tax from year to year? Because the English people had believed the word of statesmen, because they had believed that that very year of the tax would be its last. Now, however, it was to be renewed, and renewed in an aggravated form, and not one word of hope to reconcile them to the grinding exaction. Every successive Chancellor of the Exchequer, every great statesman had declared the impost intolerable in time of peace; for that reason they had said, “Never mind looking into its imperfections; it is very difficult to meddle with at all; it answers very well for raising the supplies for war; bear it now and you will get rid of it next year.” As it now stood the impost taxed fairly real property and dividends. But there its fairness stopped. It taxed the landowner on the money he laid out in repairs and agency; it taxed the householder on the necessary provision he made for the want of durability in his property; it taxed the annuitant, whether for life or for a term, not on his income, but on his capital. One single word had struck him as most inaccurate in the brilliant harangue of the right hon. Gentleman, remarkable as his diction usually was for its force and propriety. Speaking of the relief to be obtained from the falling in of Terminable Annuities, the right hon. Gentleman described it as a relief “in the payment of the interest on the national debt.” He knew not whether any other hon. Gentleman noticed the phrase, but he confessed that when he heard it it went to his heart. He regretted that his right hon. Friend, fully conversant with the subject himself, should have used language which sanctioned a mischievous error respecting Terminable Annuities. In them we not only paid interest, but we repaid the capital of large sums of money borrowed by the Government of this country seventy or eighty years ago. If the sums which the right hon. Gentleman called interest, which had been paid year from year for the Long Annuities, were really only the interest upon the loans, then the conclusion was inevitable that we had never repaid the capital. But if the sums which had been paid yearly were repayments of capital, then the income tax had, in respect of the Long Annuities, been levied on capital. The income tax was a tax not only on the interest of the capital embarked in trade, but on the capital created by the industry, the labour, and the ingenuity of the trader; and the interest of that new capital would be taxed the very next year. But the present income tax had other defects. It did not tax equally, as between man and man, those who constituted the commercial and trading classes. Two men might each make in ten years £100,000, and one might have paid double the tax of the other, although—and this was most curious—both should have made their returns to Somerset House with perfect accuracy, and according to law. Did this seem inexplicable? Here was the solution of the riddle. One man returned his profits and paid his tax upon £10,000 made year by year. The other returned his profits alternately £5,000, £25,000, and nil. For the more productive year he only pays the tax upon the average of three years—£10,000. For the year in which £5,000 were made he only pays on £5,000, and for the worst year he pays nothing. Now was this a satisfactory system to retain on the statute book? If Ministers had been as anxious to improve as they had been to impose the income tax he did not believe it would have remained in its present imperfect and unjust condition. Unfortunately, however, it was one of those subjects upon which party spirit produced an evil effect, for, if one Government proposed to retain the income tax, it was of course opposed on the other side; and if one party attempted to divest the income tax of its chief defects, the attempt was resisted by their opponents. Thus, from the party spirit which prevailed the income tax was allowed to remain in its present imperfect condition, which made it an absolute disgrace to the intelligence of the age. He could never believe that in a country like this it was indispensable to raise the revenue by means of machinery that had been condemned by statesman after statesman for its imperfections and its inequalities. Passing from the methods proposed to supply the deficiencies about to be created he would next consider the probable effects of the Budget—a Budget which some had declared to be second only to the great Budget of Sir Robert Peel. Some persons appeared to anticipate wonderful results, and the hon. Member for Montrose (Mr. Baxter) had declared it would give a great impetus to our trade, especially with France. He (Mr. Hubbard) had no doubt that some increase in trade of wine, brandy, and silks would take place; but he would remind the House that it was not for the reduction of duties upon wines, spirits, and silks that Sir Robert Peel's policy had become so famous. Sir Robert Peel's Budget stood upon different grounds; his glory was that he emancipated the industry of the country from inconvenient restrictions, and that he created fresh markets for our manufactures by destroying the old corn laws. It had been said that the repeal of the corn laws had not had any appreciable effect in lowering the price of bread. He did not think that remark well founded; but if it were, still free trade in corn had attained its object, and had made bread

dearer in other countries. It had, in fact, equalized the price of bread, and thus by making labour dearer abroad had enabled us to find markets for our manufactures which otherwise would not have been opened to us. If at the time we reduced the price of bread here, France, Germany, and other countries had been able to reduce it also, and thus cheapen their labour, so as to possess the same relative advantage over us, we should not have been able to obtain those new markets for our industry which were now open to us. Sir Robert Peel's mission had been a glorious and successful one. He removed the burdens which pressed upon the necessities of life, and allowed raw products to enter freely from other countries, which enabled our manufacturers to enter upon a widely extended and successful career throughout the world. But the countries with which we found the largest trade and from which consequently we derived the greatest advantages, were not such as France. Our best customers were the United States, from whom we took millions worth of cotton, colonies like Australia and India, and some of the new countries in the East, to which we sent enormous supplies of Manchester and Birmingham goods. Such were the countries with whom we carried on a really profitable trade. Under the new Treaty we might have more claret, brandy, and silk—and he did not intend to depreciate the advantages of cheap clarets, brandies, and silks—but it was not by the encouragement of the consumption of such articles that the wealth of England could be increased. He was aware he might be told that such an opinion was opposed to the principles of free trade, but he considered that free trade and political economy should be tested by the rules of common sense and experience. If any hon. Member found his tenant drinking more brandy-and-water, his wife wearing more French silks, his son sporting more French gloves, would he consider them any the richer? They could not be, for they did not make anything that would enable them to pay for those enjoyments. So, in respect of our manufactures which we were to supply to France in return for wine and silks, the duty of thirty per cent would really be a prohibitory duty, which would prevent us from paying our debts with our goods. He was aware that the commercial was not the only consideration that could be brought to bear on the Treaty, but that there were political advantages assigned to the conclusion of the Treaty into which he was not disposed to enter. It might be most desirable on political grounds, but if it had been entered into as a treaty of amity, and a means of promoting friendship and goodwill between us and our neighbours, let us not seek to support it by alleging commercial advantages which were purely imaginary. He wished to refer to the financial condition of the country in 1860-61, as described by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The right hon. Gentleman said the expenditure for the year would be £70,100,000. The ordinary revenue was £58,700,000; and assuming that the increased duties upon tea and sugar were maintained, there would still remain a deficiency of £9,700,000. The income tax at 10*d.* would reduce that deficiency to £828,000, which was to be met by anticipating the receipts on account of the malt and hop duties. He did not object to those receipts being called up, as he did not see why credit should be given to one class rather than another; but that did not constitute a source of revenue for the current year. There would still be a deficiency of £828,000 for the year 1861-2. The Chancellor of the Exchequer told them that he had abandoned all attempts to make provision for a term of years. He knew it was difficult, but he wished they had in 1860 a clearer and more hopeful prospect of the state of matters in 1862. It was impossible for any one not in possession of the information which was at the command of the Government to make satisfactory comments on future expenditure or revenue; but from the £70,672,000 which represented the whole available means of 1860-61 he would like to deduct the whole of the objectionable imposts to which he had referred, and 3*d.* in the pound of the income tax, while on the other hand he would maintain the whole of the duties which were to be remitted according to the Budget. Without being in the confidence of the Government there was no knowing how the deficiency might be provided for. But to impose more than 7*d.* in the pound of income tax would be a cruel disappointment, as the words of the Motion properly described it, to the just expectations of the country. With regard to the Treaty, as a matter of equivalent between the two countries it appeared to him to be thoroughly unjust: he thought the remission of duties most unwise, seeing that they were not made out of a redundant revenue, nor replaced by taxes of a less obnoxious character. He was not sufficiently inured to Parliamentary conflicts to be insensible to pain in offering any opposition to the measure which the Chancellor of the Exchequer had brought forward, no doubt with a single desire to promote the welfare of the country, but he did not feel himself justified in concealing from the House the opinion he entertained of the mischief and dangers of his policy; and he was desirous of protesting, solemnly protesting, against the aggravated imposition of the income tax, and the multiplication of trivial, but harassing and obstructing imposts, injurious to trade, but injurious not to trade only, but to the country, which, through the industry, intelligence, and enterprise of her traders, has acquired her widespread empire, her resistless power, and her unexampled prosperity.

MR. BAINES, as representing one of the largest manufacturing constituencies in the kingdom, asked permission to state, very briefly, the opinions he had formed upon the great financial and commercial scheme laid before the House. He regretted to have to follow a gentleman of such high financial and commercial authority as the hon. Member for Buckingham (Mr. Hubbard), whose authority, he also regretted to find, had been arrayed in condemnation of the measure before the House. But there was an authority higher, even in financial and commercial matters, than his—namely, the state of the public funds. Now he (Mr. Baines) observed that upon the first promulgation of the Budget and the Treaty, the funds experienced a rise, and that they experienced a second rise after the decisive division of last Monday; and as the opinion had gone on to prevail that the Budget and the Treaty would be carried by a large Parliamentary majority, so the funds had continued to advance. And it was not merely the funds of this country that had risen. Though we had been told that the Treaty was unpopular in France, there had been a most decided advance in the French funds also since its promulgation. He might also observe that the various Chambers of Commerce, and many public meetings in the largest manufacturing and commercial towns of the country, had expressed themselves as decidedly favourable to the great measure of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He might further say that, upon the whole, it had received the decided support of the press. He believed it had the assent of a considerable majority of that House, and he trusted, therefore, that notwithstanding the boldness of the measure, it would be generally pronounced to be one, safe as it was comprehensive, and wise as it was bold. If he (Mr. Baines) mistook not, the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Hubbard) had fallen into one or two errors, which he was sure could only have been unintentional. He understood him to say that the duties upon several articles of English manufacture would be raised, according to the new French tariff, to 30 per cent, although they were now admitted in some instances at lower rates. The hon. Gentleman could not have been in the House, or he would have known that a statement had been made by the Chancellor of the Exchequer this very evening, which entirely negatived that supposition. It was not the fact that the duties upon English manufactures, which were now below 30 per cent, would be raised by the new tariff. The duties would not be raised, according to the opinion of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, upon any article beyond what they were at present. This statement should at once allay the alarm felt by the flax spinners of England, Scotland, and Ireland. Looking at the comparative French tariff, the rates of duty there mentioned were the maximum rates; they were not the actual rates; but looking at the Treaty, it would be observed, from Article 13, that the ad valorem duties, fixed by the previous Article, were to be converted into specific duties, by a subsequent convention, to be concluded before the 1st July, 1860. So that, instead of English yarns and English goods being admitted into France at a duty of 30 per cent, there were several articles now admitted into France at a duty of 10, and even at 6 per cent, and the probability was that those duties would not be advanced, but would remain the same as they were now. When the subsequent convention came to be passed, it would establish no higher rate of duty upon any article exported from England into France than now existed. There was another misunderstanding into which the hon. Gentleman had fallen, of course most unintentionally. He stated that the cost of this French Treaty to England would be 2*d.* in the pound of the income tax. This was a great mistake. It would not be more than 1*d.* Although relief would be granted nominally to an amount approaching £2,000,000 a year, yet the loss to the taxation of England would be little more than £1,000,000, and £1,000,000 was 1*d.*, and not 2*d.* of the income tax. And here he hoped he might be allowed to do an act of justice towards his hon. Friend the Member for Montrose (Mr. Baxter). The hon. Baronet the Member for Stamford (Sir S. Northcote), commenting upon what his hon. Friend had said, observed that he had stated that all the favourable remissions of taxation in the Budget and in the Treaty were to be purchased only by an advance of 1*d.* per pound in the income tax. This was an unintentional, but gross mistake. His hon. Friend (Mr. Baxter) was alluding to the French Treaty alone; and it was in reference to that alone that he said the advantages it conferred would be purchased by an increase in the income tax of 1*d.*; and in that he was strictly correct. The hon. Member for Buckingham had also remarked that the effect of the repeal of the corn laws, which he had justly styled a "glorious measure," was not merely to lower the price of bread in this country, but to raise the price of bread abroad. Now, he asked the hon. Gentleman to apply that argument to the future competition between England and France, and to the effect of the Treaty upon the manufactures of England. It would have the effect of equalizing the price of labour in England and France. It would have the same effect upon the price of labour that the repeal of the corn laws had had upon the price of bread; and if it raised the price of labour in France, it would diminish the disadvantages under which the English manufacturers lay. It appeared to him that the objections of the hon. Member, though most candid, amounted, at the most, to a minute and microscopic criticism of a great plan. He was glad, however, to find that the hon. Gentleman candidly allowed that the principles of the Commercial Treaty were most just. As for himself (Mr. Baines), it was not upon any small grounds, but upon very great grounds, that he was prepared to give his assent to it. He would not, however, say he should give his unqualified assent to it, because there were points in it upon which he must reserve his approbation; but he gave his warmest support to it as a whole, because it was a great financial and commercial measure. The broad grounds upon which he supported it were these:—First of all, because it would complete the great system of free trade begun by earlier and most distinguished statesmen, and abolish all the shackles which now existed upon productive industry. The second reason which recommended it to his mind was, that in the taxes to be remitted regard was always paid to the interest of the consumer—that was to say, to the great bulk of the population. The third consideration which recommended it to him was, that it established new bonds of friendship and commercial intercourse between England and her nearest neighbour—that country which, next to the United States of America, it would be most disastrous to us to be in hostilities with, and which might be most profitable and valuable to us through friendly commercial intercourse. The Treaty had been blamed, first because it was said it was a treaty of reciprocity, and next because it did not include reciprocity. The first was an argumentum ad hominem addressed to Free-traders; the second was addressed to the fears of the Protectionists. It was, indeed, a treaty of reciprocity in one sense, inasmuch as both sides received benefits from it; but it was not a treaty of reciprocity in another sense—namely, it was not a higgling bargain for what the hon. Member called “equivalents.” It did not pretend to take an exact measure of the value of the concessions to be made on each side. Why? Because the two countries were in totally different and, indeed, almost in opposite positions with regard to the great principles of free trade. England went further than France towards a perfect system of freedom of trade; but she did not concede nearly so much as France did. We had a very little advance to make to attain the full goal of perfect freedom. France had to reverse the policy of two hundred years, and had to begin her course. It would be the glory of the right hon. Gentleman to have laid this, the top-stone of the fabric of free trade, in this country; but it would be the glory of the Emperor Napoleon to have laid the foundation-stone of free trade in France. Thus there was an entire and absolute difference of circumstances in the two countries, which made it impossible that the Treaty should be an exchange of equivalents. It never professed to be, but it was, nevertheless, reciprocity in the best sense of the word, which made valuable concessions one to the other; and if we made fewer, we still went further in reaching the full point of free trade. And let the words of the Chancellor of the Exchequer ever be remembered, “that all we gave to France

we gave to ourselves at the same time.” It was impossible to look at the comparative tariff without seeing what a mighty advance was made by France towards the total destruction of prohibition and the promotion of free trade. Let the House just hear the number of articles of the utmost commercial importance to this country, against which there was written the word “prohibited” in the existing tariff:—Pig iron of a certain description, prohibited; purified puddled iron under a certain weight—prohibited; forged iron in lumps—prohibited; cutlery, except articles charged as tools—prohibited; metal wares of cast iron, sheet iron, steel, zinc, and tin—prohibited; plated articles—prohibited; wollen yarns, manufactures of hair, of cotton, various kinds of lace—prohibited; manufactures of various kinds of silk—prohibited; manufactures of various kinds of cotton, prohibited; all kinds of woollen manufactures (with the exception of trimmings), cotton hosiery, fine stoneware, glass of various kinds—prohibited; ships and boats—prohibited; carriages—prohibited; cabinet ware—prohibited; manufactures of leather of all kinds, except pack-saddles—prohibited; refined sugar—prohibited; soap, except perfumed, and extracts from dye woods—prohibited. And this was not all. If the tariff were further examined it would be found that there were many of these articles, which were now admitted upon duties so enormous that even if 30 per cent were to be the fixed rate, which it was not, it would be a very great reduction. Take the article of iron. It would be found that bar iron was now charged from 54 to 79 per cent; machinery of various kinds, except steam engines, paid from 18 to 240 per cent. Taking woollen manufactures, it would be found that Brussels carpets paid from 42 to 60 per cent, and other kinds 43 per cent; earthenware varied from 48 to 235 per cent; kitchen ware was at the rate of 120 per cent; looking glasses from 21 to 195 per cent; and silvered glasses from 37 to 120 per cent. And so it was with many of our principal manufactures; so that the hon. Gentleman was labouring under a very great and grave misconception, if he imagined that upon the most important articles of English manufactures there was not an immense reduction of duties established by the Treaty. The hon. Gentleman had remarked upon the article of coal, and said he thought it would be almost suicidal for us to promote the export of coal. He (Mr. Baines) should like to know what right we had to inflict such a restriction upon the industry of many of the most important and populous counties in England, Scotland, and Wales? Many of those counties were upon great coal-fields; and what right had we to put a restriction upon their industry by taxing their exports, when we did not tax other exports? What right had we, and what sense would there be in denying ourselves the great advantage of the export of these various articles to our railway and our shipping interests? There were objections made to it of two kinds—one was commercial, and the other political. The commercial objection was, that coal was a raw material of manufacture, and that by supplying it to our competitors, they would be enabled to compete with us upon more advantageous terms. He (Mr. Baines) would remind the House of a very striking analogy to this export of the article of coal. There was one article of which it was the rule of this country to prohibit the export for a period of 500 years, and it was a most important article of agricultural produce. It was the article of English wool. From the time of Edward the First to the year 1824, the export of wool was absolutely prohibited; and such was the monstrous state of the law that persons who did export it were liable to mutilation, imprisonment, and even death, if they ran, as it was called, wool to the opposite coast. In 1824 the prohibition was entirely taken away, to the great advantage generally of the landed interest. He remembered the time when in Bradford, Leeds, and Halifax, it would have been thought something like high treason to repeal the prohibition, so important was it thought to be to the manufactures of those towns. What had been the result? Why, one continued course of prosperity from that day to this, so that their manufactures were now much more flourishing and more extensive than they were before the period when the abolition of the prohibition took place. What would they say if every other country denied to them the raw material for their manufactures? What would they say if the United States would not export them cotton; or if Saxony would not send them wool; or if Italy declined to supply them with silk? What would they say if every other country resolved to keep to themselves their own articles? They knew that by the adoption of that course of proceeding on the part of other countries the manufacturing industry of England would be entirely destroyed. A great objection had been made to the export of coal to France, because it supplied the means of making war; but that was the strongest argument in his opinion in favour of the free exportation of coal from this country to France. If they could make the country they most apprehended as an enemy dependent upon them for the means of making war, they could bind over that country to keep the peace with them. It was scarcely necessary to remind the House of the great advantages which had arisen from the system of free trade, of which the Budget was to be the consummation. He reminded them of the enormous expansion of the products of industry which had taken place since the years 1842 and 1846. In the year 1842 the declared value of British and Irish manufactures exported, amounted to £47,381,000; in 1847, to £51,105,000; and in 1859, to £130,000,000. The export of those manufactures was last year nearly threefold the amount in 1842, and more than double the amount in 1847. He admitted that the whole of this increase might not be attributable to free trade, but might be partly attributable to the supply of gold—to the development of their colonies—to the perfecting of their communications internal and oceanic—but he would say that, above all, the liberation of trade from the shackles upon it had contributed to bring about this great and enormous result. Let any Gentleman mention to him, if he could, one single article, which had been subjected to competition from a foreign article, and had suffered from the competition. He did not know of any article that had suffered, but, on the contrary, thought that the consumption of all had increased. Not one but all their branches of manufacture had greatly extended; and what hon. Gentlemen opposite thought was utterly impossible—wages had increased instead of diminishing, and every branch of trade flourished. But what was most remarkable was—that after the total abolition of the corn laws agriculture itself was in the highest state of prosperity it had ever known, the rents of the landlords were increased, and there was a large increase on the incomes of the farmers. The abolition of the paper duty was said to be a wanton throwing away of a source of income; but the fact was, the paper duty had become a duty utterly untenable in law and policy, and equally untenable according to the opinions of persons in and out of doors. There were commercial reasons, without number, for removing the duty on paper, because it was an article that entered into the consumption of every wholesale and retail trade in the country. It was known that when the trammels of the Excise were removed, the trade would receive an expansion from the freedom thus conferred much greater in value than the amount of duty taken off. And the manufacture would spring up to a degree of prosperity and activity that it had never before reached. It should be remembered that the paper duty was a tax upon the means of acquiring information at school, and on the correspondence of those who wished to keep up a communication with each other after leaving school. In fact, on various grounds the paper duty had become indefensible and untenable. The hon. Gentleman who spoke last contended that the income tax was not a pleasant tax, and that its imposition was attended with many inequalities. He (Mr. Baines) quite agreed with the hon. Gentleman that the income tax was far from being pleasant, and that it was attended with inequalities which he should like to see removed; but it should be remembered that the income tax was now retained for identically the same purposes for which it was originally imposed. It was retained to meet a deficiency in revenue, as it had been imposed to meet a deficiency in revenue. It was retained to liberate their industry, as it had been established, in the first instance, to liberate their industry. It could not, therefore, be said that there was any substantial difference between the conduct of the present Chancellor of the Exchequer in raising temporarily—as he hoped it would be temporarily—the income tax to 10*d.*, and the conduct of Sir R. Peel, in proposing the income tax in 1842. He trusted that, as the Estimates laid on the table were of a temporary nature, the necessity for retaining the income tax would be of a temporary nature also. Was it not known that two millions of the Estimates were proposed for the purpose of replacing the Ordnance, in consequence of the modern improvements in ordnance and small arms, which rendered them more effective and precise than those that existed before? That, therefore, was an expense which was forced upon the Government and the country. He had heard with much pleasure the remarks of the Chancellor of the Exchequer about one of the alterations which he intended to propose in the Resolutions he had laid before the House. It had reference to a proposition to which he (Mr. Baines) felt the strongest objection. He meant the proposal to extend the licences for beer. It seemed to him that such an arrangement would have an evil effect on the morals of the country, and, greatly as he valued wealth, he rated the morals of the country more highly. If a measure were adopted that would indefinitely increase the number of drinking-houses, under the guise of eating-houses, it would inflict a wound upon the morals of the country that no Budget would make up. To licensing the article of wine he had much less objection, because the use of the light unintoxicating wines of France might be a positive advantage to the morals of the country. On the whole, he must give his warm and strong approbation to the great financial measure before them.

MR. BLACKBURN said, that the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in developing his financial scheme, had declared that their choice lay between leaving impost duties as they were, and paying a 9*d.* income tax, or taking his plan and paying 1*d.* more. But was this the case? The Chancellor of the Exchequer said that a sum of £70,100,000 would be required for the expenses of the year. Of this amount £62,800,000 would be produced by the duties which it was intended to retain, and, with the hop and malt credits, would realize £64,290,000. An income-tax at the rate of 7*d.* in the pound would yield £5,930,000., which, added to the other items of revenue, would make £70,220,000, or an excess of £120,000 above the amount required by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The right hon. Gentleman further stated that he had struck off £640,000 for the losses which would be sustained by the French Treaty this year; so that, if this scheme of reduction were not adopted, and the revenue were left in its natural channels, there would be a surplus of more than £700,000. Consequently, if they adopted the financial proposals which had been submitted to them, the advantages must be bought by an addition of 3*d.* to the income-tax. He for one admitted that free trade had proved beneficial to the country; it had been universally adopted by the House, and he was at a loss to understand why hon. Gentlemen on the other side—who, if he did not mistake, had sat opposite to Sir Robert Peel—should take credit exclusively for the advantages it had conferred. It might be worth while to pay an additional 3*d.* for free trade; but when they came to consider what was called the free trade part of the Budget, he held that the term so applied was a misnomer. Free trade, as he understood the phrase, consisted not in free imports and the abolition of Customs' duties, but in the removal of everything which afforded protection to native industry—in other words, that the consumer should not be required to pay anything to the producer beyond the legitimate cost of the article. But the Chancellor of the Exchequer could scarcely have been serious in maintaining that duties on brandy and wine were protective duties because they were drinks, and other drinks were made here; the same might as well be said of tea. We could grow neither wine nor tea in this country. It was the same with brandy; though spirit—alcohol—was distilled in England, they could not produce brandy, and the duty on it was not a protective one. The same was the case with currants and other foreign fruits; they could not be grown in England. It was clear, then, that the reduction of duties that were protective only applied to the duties on manufactured articles, to the amount of £1,200,000. The genius of free trade required that they should sacrifice the constituents of the hon. Member for Coventry, in order to get ribands and other articles something cheaper at their expense; and to obtain this reduction of price twopence in the pound was laid on income, which would raise £1,500,000, or a surplus of £250,000 above the £1,200,000 lost by the remission of duties on manufactured articles. This was the price they had to pay for free trade in this particular. What was the other penny in the pound paid for? The £1,000,000 raised by this penny was paid to reduce the price of wine, and the other benefits supposed to be derived under the French Treaty. But it was not for the reduction of the price of wine and brandy solely. It was for something else—the benefit supposed to be gained to the manufacturers of this country, who would export more goods; and to the iron and coal masters, who would export more of their materials. Was that free trade? The great bulk of the nation was to pay additional taxes to buy this free trade for the advantage of the iron and coal masters, and the manufacturers of Manchester. This, he thought, was the very converse of free trade: in fact, they were falling into protection again by another and most extraordinary way. They were buying advantages for the producers and manufacturers. He did not grudge it them, if, in the natural course of things, the French Government chose to admit their coal, and iron, and goods, and they gained an extended market by the natural course of affairs, even if it raised the price of coal and iron at home. But the people were actually called on to pay more taxes to gain them this advantage. He perfectly agreed with the hon. Member for North Essex (Mr. Du Cane); they were to pay 3*d.* in the pound income tax for the purpose of buying an extended foreign market for a certain class of producers. He should certainly support the Amendment.

MR. MARSH said, that the repeal of a duty was not to be taken as the measure of the reduction in price of the articles from which the duty was removed. The seller of the article must, of course, get a profit on the capital he has expended in paying the duty. This was shown palpably in the case of claret. By a comparison with the cost of a bottle of claret at Rotterdam with the cost of the same at Dovor, it appeared that the difference was owing to the high duties on wine, and not to any scarcity in the commodity. That difference was 3*s.* 6*d.* per bottle. The cause of this was, firstly, as he had said that the seller had to get a profit on the duty; and next, that in Amsterdam one hundred bottles of claret were sold for one bottle that was sold in England, and the trader could, therefore, sell it for a smaller profit. It was the same with sugar. The grocer was satisfied with ten per cent on that article, because he sold large quantities of it; but on articles less in demand, such as allspice, he charged 100 per cent and upwards. In cases where the duty was very high, the Chancellor of the Exchequer got some of the duty, but in many cases he got nothing. To show how the removal of duty increased the demand for an article, he would instance the case of india-rubber, which, when a duty was imposed upon it, was used only for rubbing out pencil marks; but, when Mr. Huskisson removed the duty, the trade in the article immediately took an extraordinary development in a very short period. He (Mr. Marsh) had no doubt that the consumption of the various articles from which it was proposed to remove the duties would be enormous in this country. Numbers of persons on the shores of the Mediterranean lived upon dates, and grew strong on them, and though he did not believe dates would ever become the sole article of food for Englishmen, he was satisfied that they would add largely to the food of this country. It was the same with figs, a cheap species of which, extensively used as food in the Mediterranean, could be obtained at 1*d.* per lb. As regarded wine, the consumption of that article had been checked and destroyed amongst whole classes by the duty. In Scotland and England wine was once generally drunk. In the time of Queen Elizabeth her maids of honour were allowed two bottles of claret a day. Habits had changed, and neither maids of honour nor any other maids had allowances of claret. Even in the last century, after a considerable duty had been placed upon it, the consumption was considerable, as might be seen in that amusing novel, Joseph Andrews, when the hero calls for his bottle of wine along with his bread. But the question to which he looked was not what people did formerly, but what they did now. He had been in colonies where wine was let in at a moderate duty, and he could bear testimony that it was largely consumed; while, at the same time, it contributed greatly to keep the working classes sober. At Gibraltar, the soldiers drank wine at £5 per pipe, or at the rate of 2½*d.* per bottle—and drank a great deal too much of it. That wine, Benecarlo, was, he thought, the wine that would be most generally consumed by the working classes in this country, as it was strong and rough but well-flavoured. With respect to the income tax, he considered it unjust as it was at present assessed, and he suggested that the Chancellor of the Exchequer should capitalize it, and tax the sum so produced. For instance, in the case of a professional man with £1,000 a year derived from his profession, he would have that income valued; and suppose it was valued at ten years' purchase, he would take the 10*d.* tax on the interest of the income so capitalized. That would give a tax on £300, or something more per annum, instead of on £1,000 as it stood at present, and would bring in more to the Chancellor of the Exchequer. In fact, the tax was looked upon as unjust, and people would not pay it when it could possibly be avoided; and he believed that the Chancellor of the Exchequer was systematically cheated out of half the real amount of the duty. One could not take up The Times without finding acknowledgments of conscience money, which
